22. In fine: During that space of time of which we have just been speaking, many books were published which treated of the method of interpreting the whole sacred volume. Some of these, however, confined themselves solely to the critical part, while others, under the name of Introductions, embraced all those things which might be reckoned to pertain to the understanding of the contents, the authors, the composition, and the ancient versions of the whole of the Scriptures, and of each of its parts. Of the first sort, the most excellent are, Turretin's Tract on the Interpr. of Script., Seiler on Bib. Hermeneutics, and Meyer's Attempt at the *Interpr. of the O. T.*¹. Of the latter sort, it will be sufficient to mention Carpzovius's Introd. to the Canonical Books of the O. T., J. G. Eichhorn's Introd. to the Books of the O. T., Jahn's Introd., Berthold's His- toriae-critical Introd. to all the Canonical and Apocryphal Books of the O. and N. T., and Hug's Introd. to the N. T.². To these, which are all in foreign languages excepting Hug, translated by Dr. Wait, we may add such compendiums as Harwood's Introd. to the N. T., Marsh's Lectures on Bib. Crit. and Interpr., Gerard's Institutes of Bib. Crit., Horne's Critical Introd., &c., &c.³

SECTION III.

MORAL QUALITIES REQUISITE IN AN INTERPRETER OF THE SCRIPTURES.

The State of Mind required in a Student of the Bible: Gratitude for the Fact and Character of Divine Revelation — Humility — Devout Prayer — Ingenuousness and Declination of Purpose.

The moral qualifications of an interpreter of Scripture are of the first importance, and demand the most serious regard. Every person well knows that facts and circumstances take a high degree of coloring from the state of mind through which they are viewed, and that the particular impression they make is in a great measure dependent upon the disposition and habits of the recipient. That there can be no correct apprehension of moral truth, unless there be an unprejudiced and teachable frame of mind, most persons admit. If a man be not convinced of his want of information, and be not animated by an upright intention of submitting without reserve to the discoveries of truth, however opposed to his previous sentiments and pursuits they may be, it is not to be expected that the clearest statement or the most conclusive reasoning will exert any beneficial influence upon his mind. But if this be true in the ordinary affairs of human life, it is much more so in the acquisition of scriptural knowledge. The streams of revealed truth run in an opposite direction to the current of our fallen nature. Nor is this the greatest evil; the human mind is as destitute of ability rightly to apprehend the revealed will and purposes of God, as the human heart is opposed to their authority and control. 'The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.' 1 Co. 2:11. Hence arises the necessity of a preparation of heart to seek after God (1 S. 7:3, &c.), by a cultivation of those dispositions which accord, as well with the divine communications, as with our own relative and responsible character. The state of mind, constituting these moral qualifications, may be resolved into the following particulars:

I. DEVOUT GRATITUDE FOR THE FACT AND CHARACTER OF THE DIVINE REVELATION.

1. If we have any thing like just conceptions of the high and holy character of God, and of our own debased and abject condition, we shall not fail to approach the volume of inspiration with sentiments of profound gratitude to Him for having favored us, in such circumstances, with any communications of his will; but especially so, for the character and design of those communications which are presented to us in the Bible. Separated from the Author of our being by a course of sinful disobedience, and totally incapacitated, by the depravation of our will and affections, for his service and presence, He might have justly abandoned us to the imaginings of our own hearts, destitute of the guidance of any further light from Himself. In that case, how deplorable must have been our moral condition! Cut off from God — under the dominion of the powers of darkness — following the dictates of depraved affections, and subjected to the control of fierce and turbulent passions — we could only have proceeded from one stage of depravity and wretchedness to another, until we should have found ourselves placed beyond the reach of even the divine compassion itself. But 'the day-spring from on high has visited us'; the light of His truth has pierced through the gloom with which we were surrounded — 'they who sat in darkness, and in the region of the shadow of death, have seen a great light;' and in the midst of our rebellion, we are arrested by the voice of God, in accents the most tender and merciful — 'Unto you, O men, I call; and my voice is to the sons of men.' Pr. 8:4. 'How long, ye simple ones, will ye love simplicity? and the scorners delight in their scorning, and fools hate knowledge? Turn you at my reproach: behold, I will pour out my Spirit upon you, I will make known my words unto you.' ch. 1:22, 23. Now, if the mere fact of a divine revelation, intended to benefit our condition, be sufficient to excite our gratitude, and inspire us with reverential feeling, our obligations will appear to be greatly augmented, when we consider the merciful character it assumes in the Bible.

2. Let it be observed, then, that it is in the Holy Scriptures, only, that we have rational and influential discoveries of the character of God. In proof of this position, we need only refer to the state of opinion in those parts of the world where the light of revelation has not yet beamed, or where it has been quenched by the opposition of sin. Amidst all the speculations of philosophy, for which Greece and Rome were renowned, at what certainty did their most celebrated philosophers arrive, even on the simple but momentous fact of the existence of an intelligent First Cause? Doubt and indecision marked the conclusions of their profoundest investigations, and reduced them to the rank of the merest probabilities.⁴ With respect to the character and perfections of God, and the interest which He took in the moral government of the world, they were at a still greater loss, and involved in the most bewildering perplexities.⁵ In fact, the whole history of man, whether wandering in the wilds of savage independence, or enjoying the higher advantages of civilized society, abundantly confirms the humiliating truth, that 'the world by wisdom knew not God,' 1 Co. 1:21. But turn we to the Scriptures, and what sublime and influential discoveries are there made of the existence and perfections of the Deity! How demonstrative are the evidences of his being — how convincing the proofs of his moral government — and how endearing the character He is represented as sustaining towards man! Well might the regal prophet exclaim, 'The entrance of thy word giveth life' — 'It giveth understanding to the simple.' Ps. 119.

3. We have here, also, an intelligible account of the origin of moral evil. Nor let this be regarded as a matter of trifling moment: it is intimately connected with just views of the righteous system of God's moral government, and the final destinies of the human race. But this was never furnished through any other medium than the sacred volume. In confirmation of this assertion, as well as that on the former topic, we might confidently appeal to the speculations of those who have been left destitute of the guidance of revelation, or the monstrous notions of those who have rashly and impiously turned from its proffered assistance. But, in the Bible, this mystery, which had been hidden for ages, is made manifest; the conduct of God stands absolved from every imputation which infidelity has thrown upon it; and every part of his moral government is seen to harmonize with the perfections of his character.

§ 'The possession of the Bible alone,' said the amiable Montgomery, in a speech delivered before the Philosophical Society at Sheffield — 'The possession of the Bible alone — including treasures of history, jurisprudence, poetry, and ethics, capable above all other books of informing, expanding, delighting, and exalting the mind, while the heart is purified — the possession of the Bible alone, with the power of reading and understanding its wonderful and blessed contents, sets the humblest Christian among us above the most enlightened heathen philosopher, in the true knowledge of the true God.'

4. Through the same medium, exclusively, we learn the method by which the salvation of man is effected, and the medium of his approach to God. Living, as we do, in the midst of this light, we are not, it is to be feared, sufficiently impressed with a consciousness of its high importance, or its infinite value. But, looking towards those deprived of it, do not the cruel and degrading superstitions of the pagan world, both in ancient and in modern times, afford convincing proof that the great question which agitates the human mind, and presses its terrors upon the consciences of men, apprehensive of the wrath of some unknown but justly offended Deity, is this — ‘How shall man be justified with God?’ Alas! he knows not. The prophet has described, in language no less just than forcible, the fearful anxiety and distressing uncertainty which perturb the mind in such circumstances — ‘Wherewithal shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the high God? Shall I come before Him with burnt-offerings, with calves of a year old? Will the Lord be pleased with thousand of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? Shall I give my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?’ Mi. 6:6. On a mind thus agitated by an overwhelming apprehension of the divine displeasure, and without any well-grounded hope of averting its impending doom, what must be the exhilarating effects of the merciful announcements of the gospel? and what must be the thrilling sensibilities of the heart, when these discoveries are first made and apprehended? The design of this revelation is to announce the gracious purposes of God to save men from the guilt and punishment of sin; his purposes of pardoning the guilty — of sanctifying the unholy — of giving strength to the helpless, and power to them who have no might. It further informs us of the medium through which we may successfully approach the throne of God, and acceptably urge our petitions for an interest in these unspeakable benefits — ‘Seeing, then, that we have a great High-Priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus, the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession:’ ‘Let us come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need!’ — ‘Wherefore He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them.’ He. 4:14,16, 7:25.

5. But it may further be remarked, that in the Scriptures only are the truth and certainty of a future state revealed. It is true, that some efforts have been made to demonstrate the immortality of the soul, upon principles independent of Scripture; but, without any desire to depreciate the labors of those who have employed themselves in the investigation, we may be allowed to remark, that the mere circumstance of no one ever having arrived at any thing like certainty on the subject, until brought within the light of inspiration, is enough to justify a suspicion, that the superiority of modern rationalization over that of the ancients is in this respect derived, perhaps unconsciously, from the discoveries of the written word. We have been frequently reminded of the sentiments of Socrates, Plato, Cicero, and others, who, by the mere exercise of reason, it is said, discovered that the present is not the only state of being — that the existence of man does not terminate with this life, but that there remains a state where virtue will be rewarded and vice punished. But, granting that such discoveries have been made, we would ask those who boast of philosophy, for the purpose of derogating from the value of revelation, what it cost these individuals, in the pursuit of this knowledge, ere they could triumph in its possession. Did the oppugners of revelation ever follow those master spirits in their mental excursions? Did they ever make an effort to discipline their own minds to the same severe and laborious course of investigation, which these philosophers were obliged to prosecute through toilsome months and years? There is little risk of doing them an injustice, in saying, that they have not so done. They therefore are incompetent to determine how many could have attained to the same degree of assurance, on this truth, as the worthless to whom they have referred us. The process by which the truth was thus to be arrived at, was too complex to engage the attention of the great proportion of men; and therefore God, in his infinite compassion, made known a shorter way. That way is to be found in the Scriptures; and we are prepared for the sneer and the laugh of the witling, when we say, that the most illiterate man who can read his Bible, and avail himself of the information it contains, knows infinitely more about a future state of existence, than either Socrates or Plato; and, what is of far more value, his knowledge is more influential. So dubious did these philosophers hold the conclusions of their reasoning to be, that they were far from being satisfied of the certainty of those doctrines which they endeavored to impress upon others. In circumstances when the support of his principles was most needed, the confidence of the philosopher forsook him; and in the contemplation of death, he viewed the existence of a future state as a problem not to be solved. Even Cicero speaks of this doctrine as doubtful; and in his Treatise on Old Age, he introduces the elder Cato mentioning it as an opinion of which he was fond, rather than a doctrine which he could demonstrate; and after enumerating all the arguments of which he could think, he comforts himself with this reflection upon the whole — that, if the soul died with the body, the petty philosophers, who opposed themselves to the opinion of the soul’s immortality, ceasing to be, as well as himself, would not laugh at his credulity. Plato, in his Phædon, makes Socrates speak with some doubt concerning his own arguments, and introduces Simmias saying to him, ‘We ought to lay hold of the strongest arguments for this doctrine, that either we ourselves, or others, can suggest to us. If both ways prove ineffectual, we must put up with the best proofs we can get, till some promise or revelation shall clear up the point.’ The wisdom of Socrates and Plato, united, did, in fact, only produce such arguments for their favorite opinion, as they were themselves dissatisfied with. Cicero, being so attached to the same opinion, that, as he says, he would rather err with Plato in holding it, than think rightly with those who deny it, poorly echoes the arguments of his master, adds little to them himself, and, at the conclusion, virtually giving up the point, with all the arguments brought to support it, endeavors to comfort himself and others, against the approach of death, by proving death to be no evil, even should the soul perish with the body. Such were the conclusions of philosophy. We turn, however, to the Holy Scriptures, and every doubt is removed, and every objection silenced. That which unceasingly appeared as probable, and devoutly to be wished for, is here rendered indubitably certain, both by authority and sensible demonstrations. The speculations of philosophy give place to the certainties of revelation, and ‘life and immortality are rendered manifest by the gospel.’ 2 Ti. 1:10.

6. In view of such considerations, we cannot but feel our gratitude excited, when we approach to God, as speaking in that book — ‘Gratitude, not only expressing itself in proper terms, but possessing the mind with an abiding and overwhelming influence, under which it should sit impressed the whole duration of the interview; such an emotion as cannot utter itself in language, though by language it indicates its presence, but preserves us in a devout and adoring frame while the Lord is uttering his voice. Go, visit a desolate widow with consolation, and help, and fatherhood of her orphan children — do it again and again — and your presence, the sound of your approaching footstep, the soft utterance of your voice, the very mention of your name, will come to dilate her heart with a fulness which defies her tongue to utter, but speaks by the tokens of a swimming eye, and clasped hands, and fervent ejaculations to heaven upon your head! No less copious acknowledgment to God, the Author of our well-being, and the Father of our better hopes, ought we to feel when his word discloseth to us the excesses of his love. Though a veil be now cast over the majesty which speaks, it is the voice of the Eternal coming to our ear in soft cadences to win our favor, yet omnipotent as in the voices of his thunder, and overpowering as the rushing of many waters. With no less emotion, therefore, should this book be opened, than if, like him in the Apocalypse, you saw the voice which spake; or, like him in the trance, you were into the third heavens translated, companying and communing with the realities of glory, ‘which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor the heart of man conceived.’”

II. With this devout gratitude must be conjoined, A HUMBLING CONVICTION OF OUR OWN INABILITY RIGHTLY TO ESTIMATE THE VALUE, OR SUBMIT TO THE TEACHINGS, OF THE WORD OF GOD. This conviction is indispensably requisite, God having thus declared the constitution of his gracious government, and the mode of his merciful procedure: ‘He resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble.’ Ja. 4:6. 1 Pe. 5:5. And surely the disposition of mind of which we are now speaking, is one most befitting persons who are not only alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them’ (Ep. 4:18), but whose understanding is also blinded by the god of this world (2 Co. 4:4), and whose corrupt nature ‘is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be.’ Ro. 8:7. But how many are they, who, if they spurn not the heavenly visitant from their presence, and refuse to listen to the voice of God written in his word, yet come to its perusal with unblushing and haughty spirits, with high thoughts of their own importance, and deceitful notions of their own dignity! men who open the Bible, and read its humiliating and soul-abasing doctrines with the same thoughtlessness with which they peruse the pages of a romance, and never once think of the exceeding broadness of God’s command, or the exceeding riches of his grace! But would we profit by this employment, there must not only be a conviction of our ignorance of the deeply momentous truths of God’s word, but there must also be a sensibility of our want of spiritual perception, when those truths are laid before us, and of the hostility of our nature towards even those we do know. Such is the word of promise: ‘To that man will I look, to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and trembled at my word.’ Is. 66:2. When we are brought under the unrestrained influence of these sentiments — gratitude for the revelation, and deep self-abasement, from a consciousness of our own ignorance — it will induce,

III. DEVOUT PRAYER TO GOD FOR DIVINE ILLUMINATION, AND A RIGHT UNDERSTANDING OF SCRIPTURAL TRUTH. The original Author of the Holy Scriptures is alone able to open to our understandings their true meaning; and unless his Holy Spirit cast a ray of heavenly illumination upon our minds, no power of genius, no depth of erudition, can help us to a saving knowledge of their contents. Not, indeed, that there is any deficiency in the revelation itself: to suppose so, would be as absurd as for a blind man to maintain that the sun did not shine, because he was unable to discern its splendor. The defect is in our selves : we are by nature spiritually blind, ‘having the understanding darkened, and being alienated from the life of God, through the ignorance that is in us, because of the blindness of our hearts.’ ‘The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, because they are foolishness unto him ; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.’ But these declarations do not stand alone ; they are accompanied by an assurance, that ‘he which is spiritual discerneth all things’ ; and our blessed Lord appeals to us—‘If ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him !’ While men are entertaining so high a conceit of themselves, as to imagine that divine wisdom is attainable by the aid of their own unassisted reason, they are neglecting the chief means which God has appointed for securing it, and remain destitute of any other compass to direct them, in the perilous voyage of life, than their own changeable fancy. Is it surprising, that they should be constantly in danger of making ‘shipwreck’ ? They may read, and dispute, and put their ingenuity to the rack ; but they will still remain ignorant of the very rudiments of the gospel. The prayer of faith, however, offered from the humble and contrite heart of one who has learned to sit meekly at the feet of Jesus, will never fail to unlock the sacred treasury of heaven, and to enrich the happy suppliant with that inestimable pearl of great price—that which is ‘more precious than rubies, and with which all things in the world are not to be compared.’ It is the peculiar office of the Holy Spirit to ‘lead men into all truth.’ Most justly, therefore, did Luther, in commencing his career of triumph over the ignorance and superstition of Popery, thus express himself : ‘The sacred writings are not to be understood but by that Spirit by whom they were written ; which Spirit is never more powerful and energetic, than when HE accompanies the serious perusal of those writings which HE Himself has dictated. Setting aside an implicit dependence on human writings, let us strenuously adhere to the Scriptures alone.’ In perfect accordance was the practice of the holy psalmist, than whom no man, perhaps, has ever formed a juster conception of the value and blessedness of God’s truth. ‘Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law :’ ‘Teach me thy statutes :’ ‘Make me to understand the way of thy precepts.’ Ps. 119. Such were his convictions of the necessity of divine illumination, for the purpose of understanding the written word. Such, also, were the convictions and practice of the prophets and apostles, notwithstanding they were favored with extraordinary revelations from on high. No man, who is truly grateful to God for the revelation of his will, and who also feels his own inability rightly to understand that revelation, will fail to profit by these illustrious examples. He will thankfully avail himself of the advice of one who knew how to estimate its value—‘If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him.’ Ja. 1:5. And we may assure ourselves that no one, reading under the influence of such principles, and the exercise of such devotion, shall fail of his reward. Every annunciation of the Eternal will be sealed upon his heart, and be reflected in his temper and conduct. Humbly seeking to God for wisdom, and relying upon the word of his promise for grace to consecrate it to practical purposes, his word will become to such a one the divine seed, giving birth to ‘the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ, to the praise and glory of God.’ Phil. 1:11.

IV. THE SCRIPTURES MUST BE READ WITH A FREEDOM FROM ALL UNDUE BIAS OF SENTIMENT, AND WITH AN UPRIGHT INTENTION OF SUBMITTING TO THE WHOLE WILL OF GOD.

1. Where this is not found, all efforts will be lost ; and it is greatly to be feared that many, in whose hearts God has excited a desire for divine knowledge, suffer themselves to be deprived of the object of their labor and prayer, by not carefully attending to this rule. Preoccupied with some favorite notions, which are fondly cherished as the doctrines of the Bible, that book is resorted to, rather for arguments to confirm and support these previously-acquired sentiments, than to learn, with simplicity and without reserve, the whole will of God. Is there not reason to think, that there are but few, comparatively, who can adopt, in the integrity of their heart, the confession of the great, but [therefore] humble Boyle ?—‘I use the Scripture, not as an arsenal, to be resorted to only for arms and weapons to defend this party, or defeat its enemies ; but as a matchless temple, where I delight to be, to contemplate the beauty, the symmetry, and the magnificence of the structure, and to increase my awe, or excite my devotion to the Deity there preached and adored.’ There is, in consequence of the fall of man, a haughty spirit of independence so inseparably allied to our moral constitution, that we are more disposed to bring the truth of God to the level of our finite reason, than to receive it with that humility which our Lord inculcated, when he said, ‘Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven’ —a temper of mind to which the apostle also alludes, when he speaks of our ‘becoming fools,’ in order that we may be made wise. From this bitter root has proceeded much of that hostility with which a simple declaration of the doctrines of Christianity has in every age been met, as well as those various ramifications of false doctrine which frequently harass the seemingly penetrating, but really perplexed and vacillating mind. Much also of the theological warfare which has been maintained among those who have been agreed in the fundamental tenets of vital godliness, and into the lists of which the best of men have sometimes entered, has had its origin in the same cause. How common is it to see even persons possessing piety, so fondly attached to particular systems of doctrine, as to make no scruple of bending, by a labored explanation, any text which does not seem to favor their preconceived opinions, and thus refusing to embrace ‘the whole counsel of God’ ! * Were such persons deeply affected with right conceptions of the inconceivable greatness of that Being by whose inspiration the Scriptures were given, they would not easily fall into such snares. They would be certain that the perfect understanding of many of the subjects revealed in the sacred writings, especially whatever relates to their great Author, is far beyond the province of the human intellect. Every attempt to fathom, by our limited reason, the deep things of the Most High, or to reconcile, with systematic nicety, particular points, which, though clearly revealed, may not appear to our contracted eye perfectly accordant with each other, or with our idea of what is right and befitting the Almighty, must be utterly vain and futile. Humility, contrition of spirit, steady faith, implicit confidence, a disposition to receive, in its unsophisticated meaning, all that God says, because HE says it,—these are the dispositions which become man when his

Maker condescends to be his instructor, and in the exercise of which, alone, can we make any profitable attainments in spiritual knowledge. If we are willing to construe the words of a human author in their plain and obvious signification, surely we ought not to refuse to do so with regard to Him that ‘speaketh from heaven.’ ‘When I think on the grandeur of God,’ says Saurin, ‘when I cast my eyes on that vast ocean, consider that immense ALL, nothing astonishes me, nothing staggers me, nothing seems to me inadmissible, how incomprehensible soever it may be. When the subject is divine, I am ready to believe all, to admit all, to receive all, provided I be convinced it is God Himself who speaks to me, or any one on his part.... Either religion must tell us nothing about God, or what it tells us must be beyond our capacities ; and, in surveying even the borders of this immense ocean, it must needs exhibit a vast extent in which our feeble sight is lost. But what surprises me, what staggers me, what affrights me, is to see a diminutive creature, a contemptible man, a little ray of light glimmering through a few feeble organs, argue a point with the Supreme Being ; oppose that Intelligence who sitteth at the helm of the universe ; question what He affirms ; dispute what He determines ; appeal from his decisions ; and, even after God has given him evidence, reject all doctrines that are above his capacity. Enter into thy nothingness, mortal creature ! What madness fills thee ! How dost thou dare, thou who art but a point,—thou whose essence is but an atom,—to measure thyself with the Supreme Being ; with Him who fills heaven and earth ; with Him whom the heaven, even the heaven of heavens, cannot contain ? Canst thou by searching find out God ? Canst thou find out the Almighty to perfection ? ’ †

2. But the evil is not confined to those presumptuous persons who would reduce the truths of revelation to the level of their own intellect, and impiously offer their counsel to Him about whose word we are speaking. The picture, which has been drawn by an eloquent writer, of the too common practice of professing Christians, is not less faithful, we fear, than it is humiliating and distressing. ‘The points of the faith we have been called on to defend, or which are reputable with our party, assume in our esteem an importance disproportionate to their importance in the word, which we come to relish chiefly when it goes to sustain them, and the Bible is hunted for arguments and texts of controversy which are treasured up for future service. The solemn stillness which the soul should hold before her Maker, so favorable to meditation and rapt communion with the throne of God, is destroyed at every turn, by suggestion of what is orthodox and evangelical, where all is orthodox and evangelical : the spirit of the reader becomes lean, being fed with abstract truths and formal propositions ; his temper ungenial, being ever disturbed with controversial suggestions ; his prayers, undevout recitals of his opinions ; his discourse, technical announcements of his faith ; ... and the fine, full harmony of Heaven’s melodious voice, which, heard apart, were sufficient to lop the soul in ecstasies unspeakable, is jarred and interfered with, and the heavenly spell is broken with the recurring concents, sophisms, and passions of men.’ ‡

3. An authoritative message has been sent from the throne of God, accredited by the most ample and convincing evidence. Having, then, been visited with the light of revelation, the formation of our religious creed is no longer left to the dreams of imagination, or the speculations of philosophy ; but it is to be deduced fairly and honestly from

* There are few, indeed, who approach the interpretation of the N. T. with minds uncorrupted and unprejudiced. The greater part have already imbibed certain opinions. Some have become habituated to the ancient formulæ of theologians : others have learned to cast off all restraints, and are wonderfully delighted in the exercise of their own ingenuity. One party are led astray by the authority of some theological system ; the other, by the most recent form of philosophy. All, in short, forsake the plain and simple path, and have recourse to art in searching after truth. That rectitude of purpose, therefore, which sees and comprehends the truth directly and without evasion, is exhibited by few, in the interpretation of the N. T. And hence it naturally happens, that, as such interpreters are themselves wanting in simplicity, this virtue is also absent in their interpretations.—Professor Titmon, in Biblical Repository, No. 3.

the written record alone. And the same principle is to govern equally the learned and the unlearned. It is the office of a translator to give a faithful representation of the original. And, now this faithful representation has been given, it is our part to peruse it with care, and to take a fair and faithful impression of it. It is our part to purify our understanding of all its previous conceptions. We must bring a free and unoccupied mind to the exercise. It must not be the pride or the obstinacy of self-formed opinions, or the haughty independence of him who thinks he has reached the manhood of his understanding. We must bring with us the docility of a child, if we want to gain the kingdom of heaven. It must not be a partial, but an entire and an unexpected obedience. There must be no gabbling of that which is entire, no darkening of that which is luminous, no softening down of that which is authoritative or severe. The Bible will allow of no compromise. It professes to be the directory of our faith, and claims a total ascendancy over the souls and the understandings of men. It will enter into no composition with us, on our natural principles. It challenges the whole mind as its due, and it appeals to the truth of Heaven for the high authority of its sanctions: "Whosoever addeth to, or taketh from, the words of this book, is accursed;" is the absolute language in which it delivers itself. This brings us to its terms. There is no way of escaping after this. We must bring every thought into captivity to its obedience; and closely abide by the rule and the doctrine this authentic memorial of God sets before us.*

4. Having thus ascertained the revealed will of God, it must be our purpose and determination to fulfil it. "Not every one," says the Savior, "that saith unto Me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." Mat. 7:21. It were better for us to be placed beyond the light and influence of the divine revelation, than to enjoy its advantages, and yet withhold our obedience. Lu. 12:17,43.

* Dr. Chalmers on the Evid. and Authority of the Christian Revelation, p. 269. The whole chapter will amply reward a careful perusal.

† An interpreter ought, in the first place, to be acquainted with the differences and powers of words, in so far as they depend upon their grammatical form.* The differences here to be considered are those which arise from derivation, composition, inflection, end accents. Nor ought we less carefully to study the force and difference of forms in those words which grammarians have styled emphatically verba, verbi; together with the exceptions to each rule, either as to tenses or moods, which have been introduced by usage. Interpreters who have not acquired an accurate knowledge of these rules, and have not rendered their knowledge available by the habit of applying it, are liable to fall into great and serious blunders; and it is wonderful how many instances of such blunders are to be met with; whereas a little attention to grammar often clears away the difficulty, and enables us to interpret rightly, and to refute the errors of others.

2. But the knowledge of syntax is still more necessary, not only that we may ascertain the order in which the words are to be taken, which is often of great importance to the right understanding of the passage, but also, that we may know the proper construction of every word and particle separately, so as to be able to judge, in the N. T., whether the expression be pure Greek or not; and, finally, that we may know the force and sense of each particular construction from the true spirit of the language. For he who, being ignorant of these matters, proceeds to tr. word for word, from one language into another, most necessarily fall into great and frequent errors, from the dissimilarity of the idioms. The writings of the commentators are full of errors of this class; nor can any one, without the knowledge here required, detect and confute the mistakes of interpreters and critics. The reader who is conversant with critical writings need only be reminded of the important light that has been thrown upon several passages of the N. T. by the labors of Middleton, Sharpe, and others, in elucidating the doctrine of the Greek article. Ernesti's Institutes, pt. iii. ch. 10, § 8, 9.

GEOGRAPHIES AND LEXICOONS.—I. For the Old Testament. 1. A Hebrew Grammar, with a copious Syntax and Praxis. By Moses Stuart, Professor of Sacr. Lit. in the Theol. Seminary at Andover. 8vo. 5th ed. 1833. This work is founded chiefly on the Heb. grammar of Gesenius. The student should also procure, by the same author, "Diss. on the Importance and Best Method of studying the Original Languages of the Bible," by John, Gesenius, and Wytenbach; tr. from the original Latin.

2. A Grammar of the Heb. Language, comprised in a Series of Lectures. By the Rev. Samuel Lee, D. D., Professor of Arabic (and now Regius Professor of Hebrew) in the University of Cambridge. Second ed. 1832.

3. A Heb. Chrestomathy. By Professor Stuart. 1829, 1830. Designed to furnish a course of Heb. study.

4. A Manual of the Chaldean Language, containing a Chal. Grammar, chiefly from the German of Professor G. B. Winer; a Chrestomathy, consisting of Selections from the Targums, and including the whole of the Biblical Chal., with Notes, and a Vocabulary adapted to the Chrestomathy, with an Appendix on the Rabbinical Character and Style. By Elias Riggs, A. M. Boston, 8vo. 1832.

V. Such appears to be the preparation of mind, and disposition of heart, required in those who would derive from the study of the Scriptures those benefits which it is the intention of their Divine Author to impart. The Bible is the ordinary channel through which He conveys his blessings to man; and it is only by placing ourselves in a proper situation, and providing ourselves with suitable means, that we can rationally expect to become partakers of the waters of life.

SECTION IV.

THE LITERARY QUALIFICATIONS OF AN INTERPRETER.

The Hebrew and Greek Languages—Grammars and Lexicons—Rhetoric and Logic—Historical Circumstances—Their Intimate Connection with Interpretation—Civil and Political Geography—Natural History—Literary and Historical Circumstances pertaining to the Sacred Books.

The interpretation of the Bible, as we have already seen, calls for a large measure of various knowledge, to which we shall now more particularly advert.

1. An interpreter ought to be well skilled in both the Hebrew and Greek languages, so that he may distinguish between the idioms of each language, and rightly interpret both. The object of interpretation is the examination and explanation of words by grammatical principles; and as the sense thus discovered is the true and only proper sense, it follows that a grammatical knowledge of the languages of the text is indispensable to the task.

1. Ernesti and his commentator have well illustrated the value of grammatical knowledge, especially of etymology and syntax, to an interpreter, in the remarks given in the note below.†

2. But further, in studying the philology of the Heb., he must discover, by means of the helps that can be employed, its spirit, its character, its peculiarities, the significations of its words, and the very characteristics of its figures. Thus he must draw out its character from the analogy of the other oriental languages, which have sprung from it, or are connected with it, and the meanings of its

6. A compendious Lexicon of the Heb. Language. By Clement C. Moore. 2 vols. 12mo. New York, 1809. The first volume of this work contains an explanation of every word which occurs in the Psalms, with notes; the second volume being a Lexicon and Grammar of the whole language. It is a most useful work for a beginner.

7. A Heb. and Eng. Lexicon of the O. T., including the Biblical Chaldee, from the German of Gesenius, with Additions. By the Rev. Josiah W. Gibbs, A. M., of the Theol. Seminary, Andover. [Gesenius having extensively improved his Lex., it is translated by Prof. E. Robinson, and republished in Boston, 1839. The most complete of Heb. Lexicons.

A Heb. and Eng. Lexicon, with the Heb. also spelled in Eng., and so arranged as to answer the purpose of a concordance of the Heb. Bible. By William Le Roy. New York, 1837. Each inflection of a word occurring in the Bib. text, is given in alphabetical order, and its etymology and meaning annexed. Pr. Stuart says it is "worse than worthless." [D.]

H. For the New Testament. 1. A Grammar of the N. T. By Prof. Stuart, Andover, 1834. A singularly valuable elementary book for critical purposes.

2. A Gr. and Eng. Lex. to the N. T., in which the Words and Phrases occurring in those Sacred Books are distinctly explained; and the Meanings assigned to each authorized by References to Passages of Scripture; and fully illustrated and confirmed by Citations from the O. T. and from the Gr. Writers. By John Parkhurst, A. M. 4to, and 8vo. Prefixed to this Lexicon is a most admirable summary of Gr. grammar, adapted for the use of those who understand English only.

3. Novum Lexicon Greco-Latinum in Nov. Test. congesit et variis Obs. Philol. illustravit Johannes Friedericus Schleusner. 2 vols. 8vo. Lipsiae, 1819; Edinburgh, 1814; Glasgow, 1817.

4. A Gr. and Eng. Manual Lex. to the N. T., with Examples of all the irregular and more difficult Inflections. By J. H. Bass. 12mo. London.

5. Clavis Novi Testamenti Philologica, Usibus Scholarum, et Juvenium Theologicis Studiosorum, accommodata, auctore M. Christ. Abrahamo Wahl. Lipsiae, 1822. This is more accurate than Schleusner's, especially in the prepositions and particles. It has been tr. into Eng. by Edward Robinson, D. D., late of the Theol. Sem., Andover, now of the New York City University, and absent in the Holy Land, &c. It is in a single volume, royal 8vo., and will be found an invaluable work.

6. Remains on the Synonyms of the N. T. By John Ang. Henry Tittmann, D. D., first Theol. Prof. in the Univ. of Leipzig. Tr. by the Rev. Edward Craig, M. A. Vol. I, forming Vol. 3 of the Bibl. Cabinet. This is a most important work; it is much to be regretted that the death of the learned author prevented the completion of his design, which was to investigate the comparative force of all those words in the N. T. which appear to be synonymous; i. e. which range under a common genus, or having one generic idea in common; but which have each of them, additional to this, a specific difference of meaning. The student who uses Schleusner's Lexicon will do well to acquaint himself with Dr. Tittmann's work.

[See Ernesti, pt. iii. ch. ix. sects. 22-35.]

words and phrases, from a comparison of the various versions which we have of the Heb. Scriptures; since these are the only sources which can supply such knowledge respecting them as may be confidently relied on.

3. The ease is the same with the particular philology of the Greek text, which largely partakes of the Heb. structure, and abounds with those expressions in which the national and religious ideas of the Jews were ordinarily expressed; Hence the interpreter should be acquainted, not only with pure Gr., but with its various dialects, especially the Alexandrine.

4. In prosecuting this branch of his studies, the student will find the works mentioned in the note below § amongst the best.

H. Rhetoric and Logic furnish valuable assistance. That portion of rhetoric which treats of the meaning and nature of tropes, is most valuable to an interpreter. The rules laid down in rhetorical treatises, respecting the different modes and beauties of style, and especially respecting sublimity or beauty of sentiment, will also be found of great assistance in the interpretation of those instances that so frequently occur. Logic will greatly help him to distinguish between the ideas of things and the sounds of words; to form accurate notions of words, by collecting their scattered portions into an aggregate whole, or by deducing them from examples in which they may be found; as also in expressing those notions clearly and briefly; to distinguish between similar ideas, lest, being deceived by ambiguity, he should confound things that are essentially distinct; to analyze the arguments and reasoning of the sacred writers; and to detect and recognize apparent discrepancies.]

III. In order fully to avail ourselves of the aids for ascertaining the sense of the text, some previous acquaintance with HISTORICAL CIRCUMSTANCES is indispensably necessary. How can any one be competent to form a judgment on the nature of those examples which a writer may furnish of the signification of his terms, if he has no antecedent knowledge of the subjects to which such writer alludes? How can any one discover the scope of an author's reasoning, if uninformed of his subject? or without adequate and antecedent information? The thing is impossible, as any one may see by referring to Jud. 19:29. Ps. 84:6. 129:6. 133. Ez. 9:2. Zech. 5:1, 2. Mk. 2:4. Lu. 7:38. 1 Co. 9:24-27. He. 12:1-3, &c. Hence we perceive the value and necessity of a knowledge of the history, religion, manners, customs, civil and physical geography, chronology, and general archaeology, of the people to whom the Bible immediately and directly relates, as well as of the particular circumstances under which its several books were respectively written. The religion, manners, customs, and social and political condition of a people, necessarily exert a powerful influence on their literature; and this was preeminently the case with the Hebrews. With but an imperfect and confused knowledge of these things, therefore, we shall be impeded at every step, and strive in vain to unravel the sense of the inspired penmen.

1. How much of the point, force, and felicity of the Bible will be lost, for instance, if the reader of it is ignorant of geography and natural history? In the study of writings where there are so many allusions to natural scenery, and the reader is so often transported from one part of the country to another, he needs to become, as it were, an inhabitant of the land. To enter into the spirit of this narrative, he needs to be able to body forth in his own mind that scenery in all its beauty and prominence; to behold, as with his own eyes, 'the glory of Lebanon,' clothed with fir-trees and cedars, and stretching its lofty ridges along the sky; to dwell with delight on 'the excellency of Carmel,' crowned with verdure, and 'dipping its feet in the Western sea'; to gaze on the beautiful lake, and hills, and valleys of Galilee; and to rove in imagination over the mountains, and among the dells, which surround the sacred city, the queen of nations, and 'the joy of the whole earth.' Here, too, the climate is to be taken into the account; — the early and the latter rain; the seed-time and harvest; the dry and scorching days of summer, contrasted with the coolness and deep serenity of the nights, in which the heavens seem lighted up with living fires; the parched earth, which drinks up the streams, and converts the mountain-torrent into a bed of sand; — all these are to be known and felt, ere we can understand, in their full force, the frequent references, like those to 'a dry and thirsty land, where no water is'; to 'the shadow of a great rock in a weary land'; or like those in our Savior's parable of the sower, or in his conversation with the woman of Samaria.

2. The civil and political geography of that age, though not less important, is more difficult to be ascertained. The grand natural traits of scenery and climate are permanent and unchangeable, and present at this day almost the very aspect which they bore 2000 years ago; but all those features which depended on the will of monarchs, or the power of nations, have, like those monarchs and nations, passed away. The mutations of Palestine, in this respect, have been great; and they appear particularly so, when we trace the local division of the territory, from that first partition under Joshua, which is now, perhaps, inexplicable, down through the changes which took place under the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel, and then through those which occurred after the exile, in respect to the Jews and Samaritans, until, at length, the whole became subject to the Roman power. At that time, Herod the Great was king over all the territory of the 12 tribes; but at his death, Judea and Samaria were given to Archelaus; Galilee and Perea to Herod Antipas; and the country N. E. of the Jordan to Philip. When Archelaus was banished, on account of his cruelties, to Vienna, in Gaul, Judea became a Roman province, and was governed by a succession of procurators, under the control of the proconsul of Syria. It was then assigned, as part of his kingdom, to Herod Agrippa the First, whose miserable fate is narrated in Acts 12. After his death, it was again governed by procurators, among whom were Felix and Festus. During all this time, the boundaries of the province were often varied, by the addition or abstraction of different towns and cities. If we add to this the state of Asia Minor, where it is, perhaps, impossible to trace with accuracy the limits of the different provinces; and also the changes made by the Romans in the general divisions of Greece Proper and Macedonia, where they affixed the ancient names to provinces and regions of far different limits; — we may well suppose, that it is not the uninformed reader who can accompany the sacred writers in their geographical details, or follow the great apostle to the Gentiles in his various journeys.*

3. It may be that the necessity of an acquaintance with the circumstances just enumerated, is far from being apparent to the minds of many otherwise intelligent persons; but it is certain, that how much soever such persons may love and venerate the Bible, they must rest satisfied with a very limited and imperfect knowledge of its contents. It not infrequently happens, as every diligent student knows, that the whole force and beauty, and, very often, the most important meaning, of certain passages, can only be perceived by a perfect knowledge of the things to which the writers allude; and the circumstances and peculiar character of the different objects mentioned in Scripture, are most frequently those not likely to strike a careless or unskillful observer. It should also be remembered, that the language itself in which these ancient books are written, is of such a nature as almost utterly to forbid its being well understood without the knowledge of which we are speaking. Simple, and confined in its vocabulary, its very idiom is metaphorical; and there is scarcely a sentence composed in it, without some allusion being made to the objects of external nature, and their peculiar habits or qualities.

4. On these several topics we should seek for information, primarily, in the Scriptures themselves; and, secondarily, in those authors who have most judiciously written upon them.† On the sacred and civil antiquities of the Hebrews, the works of Josephus, Godwin, Jennings, Lewis, Lowman, Shaw, Michaëlis, Jahn, Fleury, Dr. Browne, [and Dr. Palfrey,] will furnish abundant materials for the use of the student; nor should we omit to notice Dr. James Townley's tr. of Maimonides on the Reasons of the Laws of Moses, which contains several learned and judicious dissertations on Jewish subjects, by the translator, as well as copious illustrative notes. On the customs and circumstances of the various nations whose history is connected with that of the Jews, the writings of Rollin, Shuckford, Prideaux, Gray, Russell, [Pococke, De Sacy, and the Universal History,] will contribute ample information.‡ The physical geography of Palestine is best learned from the observations of modern travellers. That country is becoming every year more and more accessible; and the light which has been thrown upon its natural features by the reports of Seetzen, Burkhardt, Legh, Buckingham, the American missionaries, Richardson, Jowett, Lamartine, and Camie, in the delightful 'Letters from the East,' has contributed much to impart spirit and interest to our conceptions of the scenery so often alluded to in the Bible.

5. With reference to Scripture Natural History, we scarcely know how to speak, for the information of unlearned readers. The 'Physica Sacra' of Schenckher is too voluminous and expensive for ordinary purposes, and in Latin; [so of Bochart's Hierozoicon;] the 'Hierobotanicum' of Celsius is extremely valuable, but in its original form not of general use; the 'Illustrations' of Professor Paxton are very judicious and satisfactory, as far as they extend, but are incomplete as a Natural History of the Bible; the 'Fragments' to Calmet comprise much valuable information, but it requires to be digested and arranged by a skillful hand, and, moreover, to be purged from much fanciful hypothesis. The only work [of extensive research], at all complete, and accessible to the generality of readers, was Rev. Dr. Harris's 'Natural History of the Bible' [from which most subsequent writers largely borrow, originally published in America, and reprinted in England; one edition, with ents, notes, and corrections, by the author of the 'Modern Traveller'.] This volume furnishes valuable materials to assist the student in his investigations; but its disquisitions are extremely dry and critical, and its natural history somewhat scanty; while from its conjectural criticism, and [the absence of incitements to devotion, it is not a good] medium of religious instruction, [neither so intended.]§

IV. Let us also advert a little more particularly — for the purpose of demonstrating its value — to that historical knowledge respecting the sacred books themselves, that we have spoken of as a desideratum with the biblical student. The circumstances of which this is made up, have been thus enumerated by an old writer: || — (1) The order of the several books, and the relation of their parts. — (2) The title or denomination of the several books. — (3) The authors of the respective books. — (4) The persons to whom the several books were immediately or especially addressed. — (5) The scope or principal design of each book. — (6) The chronology of the respective books. — (7) The principal parts or divisions of each book. An acquaintance with these circumstances, as he justly remarks, 'will promote the solid and judicious understanding of the whole Bible in a short space of time. For, (1) Hereby you shall have the very idea or character of every book, lively describing the nature and contents of it before your eyes, as in a map, before you begin to peruse them. — (2) Hereby you shall have a clew to conduct you, a compass to sail and steer by, in the perusal of any book. — (3) Hereby, also, you shall have a summary recapitulation or recollection of the chief aim and subject-matter of every book, much tending both to help judgment and strengthen memory, after the perusal of any book of the O. or N. T. And therefore this course must needs be as a useful key, to unlock the rich cabinet of the Holy Scriptures, and to discover the precious treasures thereof to you.'¶ A word or two on each of these topics:

1. An attention to the order of the several books, and the relation of their various parts, will materially elucidate the different histories, and the allusions made to them by the inspired writers; it will also help us to discover the force and propriety of many directions and exhortations scattered throughout the Bible. Let Ps. 42 be read as the composition of David, penned when he was fleeing from Absalom, and on the night when he was about to pass over Jordan; and an accurate survey he also taken of the existing circumstances of the pious monarch, and the character of the surrounding scenery; and that beautiful and affecting composition will appear doubly beautiful and affecting. The prophetic writings, and the Epistles of the New Testament, are also susceptible of the same kind of illustration; indeed, without connecting them in this way with the several parts of the history to which they are related, the meaning of many passages of the Bible will remain locked up from our comprehension.

2. The real titles of the several books, as given by their authors, sometimes declare the design proposed by the author, and therefore assist in understanding his reasoning, &c., as Mat. 1:1. Mk. 1:1. Lu. 1:1-4, &c.

3. The authors of the respective books may generally be ascertained from the titles in our tr.; and it is obvious that a knowledge of the principal features of their character, circumstances, and style, will materially conduce to our improvement in perusing their works.

4. The persons to whom the books were respectively and primarily addressed. The circumstances, customs, and usages, and the other remarkable things by which they were distinguished, are to be minutely and accurately marked. Previously to the critical examination of an epistle sent to Rome, to Corinth, or to Ephesus, we should inquire what customs were prevalent in those places; for what such a town was principally celebrated; and what peculiarly enabled and signalized such a city. Because, in writings addressed to the inhabitants of such places, there must be frequent allusions to their distinguishing circumstances, a knowledge of which will illustrate many passages, and place them in a beautiful and striking point of view. In such figurative allusions consists a considerable part of the elegance and effect of fine writing; for they do not merely soothe and charm the imagination of the reader—they fix the deepest impressions on his mind and memory. For example; we find an epistle inscribed to the Romans. Antecedently to our attentive and critical perusal of it, let us consider what customs eminently distinguished this people. As an instance, we find in their historians frequent mention made of adoption. Their poets are full of it; and it is the perpetual object of the ridicule and banter of their satirists. Families of distinction were continually settling mutual adoptions; and they were ratified with scrupulous and most solemn formality. There was no custom more prevalent at Rome; it was regarded as the cement of indissoluble friendship and union among families. Paul knew this; and, in his Epistle to the Romans, he makes many beautiful allusions to it. Thus he speaks of the distinguished privilege of being adopted into God's family, and of the signal happiness of being constituted heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ Jesus of a heavenly inheritance. The Romans would perfectly understand him, and his words would have all their effect upon the mind, when he told them, that they had not received the spirit of bondage again to four, but that they had, through the benignity of God in the gospel dispensation, received the spirit of adoption, and could, with liberal and filial confidence, cry out, Abba! Father! So, of Corinth, its profligacy, voluptuousness, and games. With what peculiar propriety did Paul, in writing to the Corinthians, use every argument and persuasive to deter them from these vices! and with what appropriate elegance does he address them (in whose neighborhood the games of universal Greece were solemnized) in agostic terms, admirably applied to our spiritual contests, the Christian race! With regard to the Epistle to the Ephesians, also, we know that the temple of Diana at Ephesus was one of the most superb and magnificent edifices the world ever saw; and from this temple the apostle borrows some beautiful imagery, in addressing them. ch. 2:20-22.*

5. The scope or principal design of the writer is treated of in Sect. VIII.

6. An acquaintance with chronology, justly regarded as one of the eyes of history, is as necessary for the right understanding of Scripture, as of any other kind of history. 'Distinguish well between times and times, and you dissolve many knots.'†

7. A knowledge of the principal parts or divisions of each book, is also indispensable; as a particular analysis of a book will not only afford a clear view of the chief subjects discussed in it, but also of the methodical and orderly coherence of all its parts. Books looked upon confusedly, are but darkly and confusedly apprehended.‡

V. Now, we would impress upon the reader's mind the great advantages to be derived from a steady and persevering effort to collect for himself the various information, introductions, analyses, &c., of which we have been treating. To rely wholly upon the compendiums or treatises furnished by others, is bad; though these, if judicious, are good in their places, for the purposes of repetition, and for forcibly impressing upon the memory what has been previously learned, and for references [and as suggestion of hints which may be usefully followed out]. Those who spend a large portion of their time [only] in wading through commentaries, or in forming selections, and digesting them into common-places, may appear to themselves to make wonderful progress in scriptural knowledge; but when they come to apply the information thus obtained to biblical exposition or illustration, it will be found too superficial and evanescent to be of much service. The ability, then, for an accurate interpretation of Scripture, can only be derived from a personal and attentive study of the Word itself.

SECTION V.

GENERAL RULES FOR BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION.

The Nature and Object of Interpretation — Used Methods of treating the Science — Proposed Method of discussing it here — Verbal Language — Difficulties of Interpreting written Language — Requisites in Literary Composition.

I. Interpretation is the art of exhibiting the real sentiment contained in any form of words, or of effecting that another may derive from them the same idea that the writer intended to convey. All interpretation, therefore, depends upon two things—the perception of the sense contained in certain words, and the explanation of that sense in proper terms. Interpretation is both grammatical and historical. By the former is meant that kind of interpretation that is made out by the aid of the principles of grammar merely; by the latter, that which, although built upon the grammatical sense, is modified by historical circumstances. This is now designated grammatico-historical interpretation, and is that to which our attention will be chiefly directed. There is another division made by those writers who have formally treated of the science of interpretation, namely, into Hermeneutics and Eregesis; the former denoting the theory or science of interpretation, and therefore comprising the rules by which the process is to be conducted; the latter signifying the application of those rules, in bringing out the sense of the author. Hermeneutics is the science of interpretation, and is therefore preceptive; Eregesis is the act of interpreting, and is therefore practical.

II. Instead of laying down a few necessary and obvious rules, most biblical writers have so multiplied and distributed the number of them, that the mind of the inquirer is strangely bewildered. This evil, at least, we hope to avoid.

III. The same principles of interpretation are, of course, common to both sacred and profane writings. In Scripture interpretation, however, distinctions have been multiplied, by the most refined critical ingenuity; and rule has been added to rule, with the utmost industry and labor. One evil consequence of this is, that many have been deterred from entering upon a subject deeply interesting to all; and another, that, bewildered by the multiplicity of canons obtruded upon their notice, in works on Scripture interpretation, not a few have been driven to the opposite extreme, and absurdly denied the necessity of any human aids for discovering the sense of the text. But those who refuse to subject the Bible to the same process of interpretation as that which applies to merely human compositions, do not pretend to lay down any other principles, by the aid of which its meaning can be ascertained, and by which those perversions of its sense that may result from a heated imagination or an exuberant fancy, can be effectually guarded against. The consequence is, that, instead of speaking with precision and certainty, that volume, which is the gift of inspired wisdom, the rule of all faith, and the ground of all hope, is made to mean any thing or nothing, according to the caprice of those who claim the privilege to discover its meaning, independent of all human aids. 'If the Scriptures be a revelation to men,' says Pr. Stuart, 'then they are to be read and understood by men. If the same laws of language are not to be observed in this revelation as are common to men, then they have no guide to the right understanding of the Scriptures; and an interpreter needs inspiration, as much as the original writers. It follows, of course, that the Scriptures would be no revelation in themselves; nor of any use, except to those who are inspired. But such a book the Scriptures are not; and nothing is more evident than that, when God has spoken to men, He has spoken in the language of men, for He has spoken by men, and for men.'|| But this doctrine must not be pushed too far. It is freely admitted, that divine assistance is really necessary to the spiritual perception of Scripture; although it is not conceded, that this aid is intended to supersede the ordinary means of knowledge, but only to render those means efficient.

IV. We may then safely lay it down, as a general maxim, that the great object of solicitude with the biblical student should be, to discover the genuine signification of the individual words, comprising the sacred text. Letters and words are but arbitrary symbols; they possess nothing in common with the ideas they represent; their meaning is not inherent, but accidental, or conventional; i. e. certain persons agree to employ certain words as the indicative marks, or palpable representatives, of certain impalpable ideas; and it is only by ascertaining the exact nature of that agreement, or, in other words, by obtaining a knowledge of the powers which the persons using the words have attached to them, that oral or written language, as a medium of communicating thought, can be rendered intelligible. It is true, that an acquaintance with the general principles of language, which are evidently founded upon the mental operations, and are, therefore, common to the whole human family, in proportion to the intellectual refinement and perfection of its individual parts, will greatly facilitate the study of particular languages or dialects; but then it will only facilitate that study; it will not supersede it; there must be, in every language, the acquisition and remembrance of terms, because these are arbitrary, notwithstanding that they may be connected together, and be governed in their relation by certain principles which are more or less universal in their operation. The meaning of words, then, is altogether conventional, and is therefore only to be ascertained by a certain process of inquiry, involving a number of particulars which it becomes our duty to consider.

V. The facility and certainty with which the understanding of any author is to be attained, will depend much upon the relative situation in which he stands to us, and also on the subject of which he treats. If he writes in our vernacular language, on a familiar subject, and is not far removed from us by time, we shall have little difficulty in ascertaining the sense in which he intended his words to be understood. If he writes on a scientific or abstruse subject, our difficulties will be in the ratio of our ignorance of the principles of such science, and of the nice shades of meaning attached to the terms employed. If he writes on morality and religion, which involve mixed modes, not easily defined, and presupposes a certain degree of information on the part of his reader, then the difficulties will be greatly multiplied; and especially so, if the topics be treated of in a poetical diction. But if the author writes in a foreign language, we shall have to encounter not only these difficulties, but the additional difficulty of understanding the language itself, which will be in proportion to its antiquity and other accidental circumstances.* Now, all these difficulties, united, present themselves in the Bible, which, as Burke has eloquently described it, is 'most venerable, but most multifarious, collection of the records of the divine economy — a collection of an infinite variety of cosmography, theology, history, prophecy, psalmody, morality, apologue, allegory, legislation, and ethics, carried through different books, by different authors, in different ages, for different ends and purposes.' Hence it is not only the most valuable of all books, but the most difficult book to be understood. Its interpretation demands an extent and variety of knowledge, and a degree of application, attainable only by those who feel the value and importance of scriptural studies. Of the nature and sources of this knowledge it is our present business to treat.

VI. It has been judiciously remarked, that two things are essential to the excellence and moral character of any writing which professes to give instruction on subjects of importance; namely, that the words employed should be in the commonly-received sense; and that its figures of speech, if any be adopted, should be framed to place in stronger light the sentiment to be conveyed, and to give it greater force with the judgment, by calling in the aid of imagination.† Where these qualities are not found, the writing is not only bad in a literary sense, but in a moral sense also. If it is not the production of ignorance, it is intentionally deceptive and misleading. In the Bible both requisites must be found, because it is 'written for our learning' — the learning of the body of mankind, — and because it is the result of perfect wisdom and perfect sincerity.‡ It may be said, that the great diversity of meaning attaching to most individual words, in all languages, renders it very difficult, if not wholly impossible, to determine the particular sense in which any one word is employed. But the significations of any one word, however diverse, may be distinctly marked by its relation to other words in the sentence; i. e. the proximate words or context may strictly define the sense in which any particular word, having more than one signification, is to be understood, wherever it is employed; § and we may be sure that if a writer is desirous to be understood — as the sacred writers undoubtedly were — he will observe those rules of composition that will prevent the obscurity or ambiguity here supposed.

SECTION VI.

OF THE SIGNIFICATION OF WORDS.

Direct Testimony to the Signification of Words — Examples — Rules for Interpreting Words — Literal and Metaphorical Sense — Historical Circumstances; Their Value in the Interpretation of Scripture.

This section will consider the means necessary for attaining the object desired in the preceding section; viz. a knowledge of the sense in which words are employed by the sacred writers.

1. As the signification which usage attaches to words is a plain matter of fact, it is evident that our inquiries should be first addressed to the testimony, direct and indirect, of those persons by whom the language was spoken; and especially to that of the writer whose works may be under examination. This may be ascertained,

1. By the definitions of words formally or incidentally given by the author; — as He. II:1, where faith is defined to be 'the evidence of things not seen' &c. The value of secondary testimony, i. e. of scholars, lexicographers, and translators, is to be estimated by the era, knowledge, and known judgment of the writer.

2. By the examples the author gives of the signification attached to the words he employs. This source may, possibly, be as satisfactory as the former; but in availing ourselves of it, we are thrown much more upon the resources of our own skill and judgment. Thus, in Ga. 4:3, we find the apostle speaking of the elements of the world — an expression of which we can discover no definition in any part of his writings. In v. 9, however, of the same ch., he furnishes us with an example of the sense in which he had used the phrase, equally satisfactory with a formal definition: 'But now after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements? i. e. the external rites and ceremonies of religion. In Ro. 4:1-5, the meaning of the word dikaiosune, justification, is illustrated by the example of Abraham; and in Jn. 14:6, the word parakletos is similarly illustrated.

3. The drift of the writer's discourse, and the nature of his subject, is the last resource of this description that remains to us. For example: — The verb sōzō, to preserve or save, and sōzomai, to escape, to be preserved or saved, occurs, perhaps, more than 100 times in the N. T., and very frequently in different senses, which Bp. Malthy, of undisputed eminence as a Gr. scholar, classes under 4 general heads.

1. To preserve generally from any evil or danger whatsoever. 2. To preserve from sickness or any bodily disorder; to heal. This sense, he remarks, is perhaps the most easy to distinguish; yet our trs. have not uniformly given it due attention. In Mat. 9:21,22. Mk. 5:23,23,34. 6:56. 10:52. Lu. 8:36,48,50. 17:19. Jn. 11:12. Ac. 14:9, it is rightly tr. to heal, or make whole. — In Lu. 7:50. 18:42. Ja. 5:15, although the same word is applied to the same circumstances, yet it is rendered by the indefinite word save. The 3d sense in which the verb is used is, to preserve from the temporal anger of the Almighty; such as was manifested in the destruction of Jerusalem. The 4th sense has a strict reference to future salvation in heaven. But which of these senses sōzēin has in any particular passage, is only to be determined by the nature of the subject and the scope of the writer.

II. Again, the student will be assisted in interpreting, by understanding that,

1. The grammatical signification of the words is the only true signification.

(1) By the grammatical, is not meant a signification in opposition to the tropical or figurative (because, in many cases, this is the grammatical signification), but one not allegorical or mystical. For instance, in Lu. 21:24, it is said, that Jerusalem should be 'trodden down of the Gentiles,' where it is evident that the phrase trodden down is figurative or tropical; i. e. the words are diverted from their natural meaning, and signify desolated, destroyed, not absolutely trodden down by the foot, but something analogous to it. But then the tropical sense is evidently, in this case, the grammatical or proper sense, because the words cannot be understood in any other manner, without doing violence to the language. Compare, too, Jn. 5:35. The grammatical, or what interpreters call grammatical-historical sense || of a passage, is, then, the true sense.

(2) By this it will be seen, that the natural figures of thought and of diction are not excluded from the sacred writings. But, then, it is important to remark, that whatever figures do occur, are employed for the purpose of making truth more plain to the understanding, and of impressing it more deeply on the heart; and that, therefore, the process of the association which connects the figurative object with the writer's meaning, may be easily disengaged, and rapidly seized. Our rule holds good, therefore, under every circumstance which can be conceived; and attention to it will guard us against that system of interpretation which assumes the Scriptures to be written in such a style of hyperbole, metaphor, and allegory, that when the critical operator has brought out what he deems the sober sense, the reader of plain understanding and simple piety is astonished at a result so diminutive, jejune, and disproportionate to the general use and purpose of words.||

2. The literal meaning of words (using the term in its usual acceptation, as opposed to figurative or metaphorical), *is always to be preferred, and not to be departed from without weighty and sufficient reasons.

(1) The necessity of this rule will be found in the fact, that words are usually employed by all persons in their obvious or proper sense; and no good writer will adopt them in an improper or figurative sense, without a sufficient intimation of it.

(2) Where there is a plain necessity for departing from the lit. sense, then we must evidently admit the tropical; but in no other case whatever. Thus, in Ps. 19:4,5, the writer expresses himself in the following language, in reference to the sun: —

In them He hath set a tabernacle for the sun; Who, as a bridegroom, cometh out of his chamber; He rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race.

Compare a still bolder image in Is. 41:15,16. And compare Ps. 104.

(3) In such cases as these, it is impossible to mistake, for the grossest mind could not construe the passages literally; their metaphorical sense is immediately perceived, and the understanding spontaneously acquiesces in such an interpretation. The same may be said of other passages, where a single figure of thought occurs; as in Jn. 6:51, where our Lord declares Himself to be the 'living bread,' and affirms that his flesh shall be 'eaten.' In ch. 15:1, He says, He is the 'vine,' and his Father the 'husbandman'; in ver. 5, that his disciples are the 'branches'; in ch. 10:7, that He is the 'door'; and further on, that He is the 'shepherd,' and his disciples the 'sheep'; each of which passages is to be understood figuratively, for which there is an obvious reason, and because, as before remarked, such a sense is the proper, the real, or the grammatical sense. For it is to be observed, that in so construing the language, we are no more at liberty to attach to it an arbitrary sense, than if there were nothing tropical in it; and there is, therefore, no uncertainty attending its meaning. It is the peculiar design of the figurative style, to exhibit objects in a clearer or more striking, in a sublimber or more forc-

* Dr. Cook has some admirable observations on this subject, in his 'English in the Books of the N. T.' pp. 42—80.

† Every writer wishes to be understood naturally; consequently, he will not only always employ his expressions in the sense which his readers will connect with them, but in the ideas which he communicates to them; he will always be governed by their ability to comprehend, and will pay regard to their particular manner of forming conceptions of subjects; and this either intentionally, or because, as it is common to his whole age, it is also to his own mind. — Plenck's Sacr. Philol. pt. ii. ch. 2.

‡ Dr. Pye Smith; but we do not recollect where.

§ 'Reason enjoining the rule always to use the same words, when they stand in the same connection, in one and the same sense.' — Seilor, Bib. Hermen. p. 32.

|| I. e. the grammatical sense, modified by historical circumstances.

¶ See Dr. J. P. Smith's Script. Testimony to the Messiah, vol. i. p. 19.

 Not to depart from the literal sense, unless in cases where the literal sense is tame, ridiculous, or contradictory. Luther anticipated this canon, when he asserted that 'no trope is to be admitted into Scripture, unless the context manifestly requires it, or the lit. sense be manifestly absurd, and repugnant to some article of faith.' Opp. t. iii. Latin, Jena, f. 195.

cible, manner; and it is plain, that this object could not be attained, unless there were an obvious resemblance or analogy subsisting between the object itself and that whence the figure which is employed for its representation is derived; and it is by tracing these analogies that the meaning of words is to be fixed.

(4) It must be admitted, however, that there are some passages in the sacred writings, relating to the Divine Being, to the future state of the righteous and the wicked, and to one or two subjects of a like description, the signification of which it is extremely difficult to ascertain with certainty; for the subjects treated of are such as cannot be subjected to the examination of our senses; and we have, therefore, no criteria by which to judge of their real qualities or attributes. Here, analogy will be found to be the only guide; and none but those who are intimately acquainted with the contents of Scripture, and have imbibed much of the spirit by which it is pervaded, are competent to determine these nice and delicate points. The subjects are far removed from that grossness of perception which characterizes the carnal mind; and no language that could have been employed would bring them within the grasp of the natural man.

(5) But then we must be careful not to reject the literal sense of a passage, and adopt a figurative sense, upon a partial or imperfect view of its meaning; because, if such a case, we may conceive that there is a repugnance of things where no such repugnance exists. This mode of proceeding has been the fruitful source of much and pernicious error among certain classes of religionists. Instead of gathering the sense of Scripture from the sacred writers themselves, according to the ordinary modes pursued in reading other literary works, these persons usually imbibe certain notions from other and independent sources, and then, wherever a literal interpretation of the words of Scripture would contradict such notions, resort is had to a figurative exposition. This is 'wresting the Scriptures.'

(6) To determine, at once, whether a word is to be taken tropically or not, Ernest suggests that we should examine the object spoken of, either by the external or the internal senses, or by renewing the perception of the object; and it cannot be doubted, that, where the object spoken of is such as may be examined by the senses, the decision may be easily made. Thus, when, in the passage already cited, Israel is said to be a 'threshing wain,' and in others, when our Savior is said to be a 'door,' and a 'vine,' we easily perceive, by comparing the objects spoken of with our senses, that to construe the words literally involves an impossibility. So in 1 Ch. 16:31. Ps. 98:8. 77:16. 'The Deep uttered his voice; and lifted up his hands on high.' Isa. 3:10, &c. In each of these cases, by renewing the perception of the objects, as the heavens, the earth, the floods, the waters, the mountains, the deep, we easily perceive that the literal meaning of the words employed to predicate their several actions, is incongruous with them, and therefore that they must be figurative or tropical expressions.*

III. For the interpretation of the figurative language of Scripture, a great number of precepts have been framed; and the most popular work in our language (Horne's Introd.) which treats on the interpretation of the Bible, presents us with thirteen rules on this subject, independent of six-and-twenty additional rules, which are applied to the interpretation of the different kinds of figures; thus making, in the whole, no fewer than thirty-nine distinct and independent maxims, which are said to demand our attention, when interpreting the figurative language of the Bible! This is most injudicious. If persons will but exercise their understandings when they read the Bible, in the same manner as they do when any other book engages their thoughts, these numerous rules will be unnecessary; and if they will not do so, all rules will be useless.

A subsequent section will give directions for the detection and interpretation of tropes. We could not avoid the incidental discussion of them here.

SECTION VII.

SCRIPTURE PARALLELISMS.

Value of Parallel Passages as a Source of Direct Testimony to the Meaning of Words—Verbal Parallelism—Real Parallelism—Rules for comparing Parallel Passages—The Rhythematic Parallelism; Various Descriptions of this; Assistance derivable from it in the Art of Interpretation—Common References another Aid to Interpretation—Examples.

1. A careful and diligent comparison of parallel passages is a most efficient aid to the right understanding of Scripture. The doctrinal parts of the Bible, especially, will be the most satisfactorily explained and illustrated, 'not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth, comparing spiritual things with spiritual.' 'Nature must be compared with itself, and the Scripture must be compared with itself, by those who would understand either the one or the other.'† 'It should be a rule with every one,' says Bp. Horsley, 'who would read the Holy SS. with advantage and improvement, to compare every text, which may seem either important for the doctrine it may contain, or remarkable for the turn of the expression, with the parallel passages in other parts of holy writ; i. e. with the passages in which the subject-matter is the same, the sense equivalent, or the turn of the expression similar.'—'It is incredible to any one who has not in some degree made the experiment, what a proficiency may be made in that knowledge which maketh wise unto salvation, by studying the Scriptures in this manner, without any other commentary or exposition than what the different parts of the sacred volume mutually furnish for each other. I will not scruple to assert, that the most illiterate Christian, if he can but read his English Bible, and will take the pains to read it in this manner, will not only attain all that practical knowledge which is necessary to his salvation, but by God's blessing he will become learned in every thing relating to his religion in such a degree, that he will not be liable to be misled, either by the refined arguments or the false assertions of those who endeavor to ingraft their own opinions upon the oracles of God. He may safely be ignorant of all philosophy except what is to be learned from the sacred books; which, indeed, contain the highest philosophy, adapted to the lowest apprehensions. He may safely remain ignorant of all history, except so much of the first ages of the Jewish and of the Christian church as is to be gathered from the canonical books of the O. and N. T. Let him study those in the manner I recommend, and let him never cease to pray for the illumination of that Spirit by whom these books were dictated, and the whole compass of abstruse philosophy and recondite history shall furnish no argument with which the perverse will of man shall be able to shake this learned Christian's faith. The Bible, thus studied, will indeed prove to be, what we Protestants esteem it—a certain and sufficient rule of faith and practice; a helmet of salvation, which alone may quench the fiery darts of the wicked.'‡

II. Parallelisms have been divided into real and verbal. The former embrace the matter of doctrine and history; the latter regard words and phrases, modes of arguing, figures, and style. They are further divided into adequate and inadequate: adequate, when they affect the whole subject proposed in the text; inadequate, when they affect it only in part: the former of these are of course the more important, but the latter should not be undervalued.§

I. THE VERBAL PARALLELISM. It not unfrequently happens, as will be seen from the remarks already offered, that the meaning of words is sometimes ambiguous or doubtful; neither the subject nor the context affords the means of determining the sense. Now, it is evident, that in such a case, another passage, in which the same word or its synonyme is introduced, accompanied by those attributes by which it may be defined, will furnish a verbal parallelism of the utmost value for fixing the sense of the doubtful word or phrase. Thus, in Ro. 16:25, the apostle speaks of 'the mystery which was kept secret since the world began,' without enabling us, by any subjoined remark, to understand the precise sense to be attached to the phraseology. But if we refer to Ep. 1:9, 10, 3:4, 5, and Col. 1:27, it will be rendered manifest, that it means the admission of the Gentiles to the privileges of the church and people of God, without subjecting them to the laws of Moses; and when it is found that this sense perfectly accords with the subject on which he is writing to the Romans, we need not hesitate to adopt it there also. Thus 'anointed,' in 2 Co. 1:21, is explained by 1 Jn. 2:20.

2. THE REAL PARALLELISM next claims our notice. This means a parallelism of subject or sentiment, and does not necessarily imply that the same words should be employed. It occurs, indeed, more properly, where the same object or sentiment is expressed in other words more perspicuous, or with fuller and more numerous words, the meaning of which is plain.|| It is chiefly with reference to doctrinal subjects that this kind of parallelism will be found important; for it is on the faithful, skillful, and diligent comparison of the different parts of Scripture which treat of these, that our right conclusions in regard to the real doctrines of religion will be found to depend. Thus in Ac. 2:21, where Peter applies a passage in Joel to our Savior, which affirms 'that who ever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved.' It is scarcely possible to read this declaration without a recurring of the mind to Mat. 7:21, where our Lord avers, that 'not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord,' i. e. who invokes my name, 'shall enter into the kingdom of heaven'; or, in the words of Joel and Peter, 'be saved'; and unless we could find, from some parallel passage, that the speakers meant different things, it would be difficult to avoid concluding that they held contradictory doctrines. As it is, however, this consequence does not press us, for, upon referring to Ro.

* The rule usually laid down in such cases, is, that those words or phrases are tropical where the subject and predicate disagree; as where corporeal and incorporeal, animate and inanimate, rational and irrational, are conjoined; and also species of a different genus. Things that cannot possibly exist in any particular subject (as above), cannot be logically predicated of it; for the fundamental rules of logic, in respect to tis, are inherent in the human mind. If, then, such things appear to be predicated, the phrase must be tropically understood. See Stuart's Elts. p. 111. See also, Jahn, Enchiridion, p. 103.

‡ Nine Sermons, pp. 121—128.

§ Gerard (Instit. of Bib. Crit.) divides Parallels into the following classes: (1) Passages in which, either with or without a quotation, the same thing is said in the same or nearly the same words; as, Ex. 20:2—17 is parallel to De. 5:6—18. The comparison of such texts often serves to correct a false reading. (2) Passages which relate the same subject in different terms. (3) Passages in which the same terms or expressions are used in speaking of different things. (4) Passages which treat of the same subject in different expressions.

|| The popular and unsystematic character of the sacred writings makes it the more unsafe to dwell on detached portions of them, instead of comparing each part of Scripture with the rest. Not merely incomplete knowledge, but actual error, will often be the result; because it will often happen (as might be expected in an unscientific discourse) that the author has in view, in some particular passage, not the full development of any truth, but the correction of some particular mistake, the inculcation of some particular caution, or the enforcement of some particular portion of a doctrine or precept; so that such a passage, contemplated by itself, would tend to partial, and consequently erroneous, views. Dr. Whateley's Essays on some Difficulties in the Writings of Paul, &c. p. 291.

10.11—14, and I Co. 12, we ascertain that the phraseology adopted by Peter, from Joel, implies an admission of the Messiahship of Jesus, and a belief and reliance in all the doctrines He has revealed.

III. The comparison of parallel passages demands great attention and care; the following suggestions, particularly, should be constantly borne in mind.

1. Those are of the first importance which were penned by the same author on a parallel subject.

Each writer has his peculiar and prevailing style, and those who are in the habit of closely studying the original Scriptures, well know that a word is sometimes used by a writer in a sense peculiar to himself; in which case its meaning can only be derived from a careful comparison of passages in other parts of his works. So of modes of arguing, and the methods of illustrating doctrinal truths. And although person unacquainted with the original languages is deprived of the high advantage of comparing the writer's own words, inasmuch as he is obliged to have recourse to a tr., yet our version is in the main so faithful, and the translators have so far seized the spirit and soul of the original, that the rule laid down for the scholar may be beneficially adopted by the unlearned. Little need be said on the latter part of the rule.

2. The next most valuable passages for comparison are to be sought for in those books which were written at or near the same period.

The reason is obvious enough, especially as to the books of the O. T., written during a period of nearly 1000 years, in which time the signification of many words was necessarily more or less altered.

3. The similarity in passages should be real, in order to be compared, and not merely verbal.

(1) For real likenesses between them cannot exist, unless the idea of each be the same; nor, of course, can the one throw any true light upon the other, except there be a real similarity. When this point is settled, the interpreter must consider which of the two is the most perspicuous and definite, and regulate the exegesis of the more obscure by the more perspicuous passage.

(2) You determine, says Pr. Stuart, what idea is conveyed, in each of the passages to be compared, independently from the context, the design of the writer, or the nature of the case. You then bring them together; and the one, being expressed more fully, or with more explanatory adjuncts, than the other, confirms its less certain meaning. A comparison of two passages, then, in which the parallelism is real (that of ideas), and not merely verbal, can never be made to any purpose, where the obscurity of either is so great, that you can attain no tolerable degree of satisfaction about the meaning. It can never be used for any higher degree of evidence, than for the confirmation of a sense not improbable in itself, and not contradicted by the context.

(1) This subject, in the view just taken of it, becomes fundamental in regard to the validity of testimony to the meaning of words; and the nature and strength of the evidence, and the proper mode of its application, are all illustrated by the above considerations. Unless the student forms ideas of this subject which are correct, and grounded upon principles that will bear examination, he is liable to be carried about 'by every wind of doctrine' in hermeneutics, and to be cast upon the opinion, or conceit, or confident assertion, of every commentator, or lexicographer, who has over-rated the authority of passages called parallel, in deciding upon some particular word or phrase, or who has no definite views of the exact nature and application of the evidence in question.*

4. Passages which are the seats of subjects are always to be preferred to those in which a subject is only casually or incidentally introduced.

By the seat of a subject is meant, any place in the Scriptures in which such subject is formally treated; whether primarily or in subordination to another subject; or, more especially, where it is regularly discussed and illustrated by the obvious appointment of the Holy Spirit. This is termed its proper seat. It is to be remarked, however, that the same subject may be thus treated in more than one chapter and book of Scripture; and hence there is an evident difference even between the proper seats of the same subject. The doctrine of justification, for instance, is considered in Phil. 3 ch. as in its proper seat; but the Epistles to the Romans and to the Galatians are more eminently the seats of that doctrine.†

5. In comparing passages supposed to be parallel, the writer's scope and design should be carefully regarded.

Thus, in Phil. 2:12, the apostle exhorts us, 'Work out your own salvation, with fear and trembling;' whereas John declares, 'there is no fear in love,' but, on the contrary, 'perfect love casteth out all fear.' 1 Jn. 4:18. So, in one place, we read of the Samaritans, that 'they feared the Lord,' 2 K. 17:32,33; but in the following v. it is said, 'They feared not the Lord.' Our Savior declared, 'If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death,' Jn. 3:51; while it is elsewhere affirmed, that 'it is appointed unto all men once to die.' He. 9:27. So Jn. 14:28 seems contradictory to Phil. 2:5,6; Jn. 5:31 to Jn. 8:14; Is. 9:7 and Lu. 1:33 to 1 Co. 15:24; Ro. 3:21 to Ja. 2:24. Now, in these, and many other passages, where there is an apparent contradiction in speaking of the same thing, a careful attention to the design and scope of the writer will make it evident, either that he is speaking of several parts of the same thing, or of the same thing in different respects.

6. In comparing passages of the N. T. with others in the O. T., the import and obligation of the precepts in the latter are to be interpreted and limited by those in the former, and not vise versa. For the Mosaic dispensation was introductory and subordinate to the Christian, to which it pointed, and in which it had its summation. It was the dawn of that light, which, by the coming of Jesus Christ, has arisen on the nations in all its glory. Things necessarily obscure in the former, are therefore cleared up by the latter. From this, also, we learn to distinguish things of perpetual obligation. It happens in several instances, that what was incumbent under the weakness of the first economy, is superseded by the perfection of the second.‡

7. Many parallel passages should be compared.

To compare two passages only, is often insufficient, whether we are endeavoring to find the usus loquendi by the aid of parallel passages, or by testimony derived from the nature of the subject and from examples. Especially is this the case when we are investigating the sense of words that have a complex or generic meaning made up of various parts. In this case, comparisons should be made from numerous passages, until we perceive that what we are seeking is fully and entirely discovered.§

8. As the prevailing usage of words may be ascertained with the greatest certainty from contemporaneous parallel passages, the preference should be given to that signification of a word which is confirmed by such parallel passages, beyond that which the word may derive from an etymological source.

9. Such are the principal rules in availing ourselves of parallel passages, to discover the sense of words. To the observance of these principles frequent practice must be added, so that the interpreter may easily discern what passages are similar, and how he may rightly compare and judge of them. 'The books of the N. T.', says Pr. Stuart, 'present more inducement to repeat this exercise very frequently than any other books. For, (1) They are of all books the most important. (2) They are not only all of the same idiom in general, but they have reference to the same subject; namely, the development of Christianity. They originated, too, from contemporary writers, possessed of views, feelings, and language, that were alike. Hence comparison has more force in illustrating the N. T., than in the illustration of either Greek or Latin authors, many of whom that agreed with each other in all the circumstances just stated cannot be found. But, (3) to all who admit that the Holy Spirit guided the authors of the N. T., and that their views of religion, in consequence of this, must have been harmonious, the inducement to comparison of various parts and passages with each other, in order to obtain a correct view of the whole, must be very great; and the additional force of the evidence arising from comparison, on account of the really harmonious views of the writers, must make this exercise an imperative duty of every theologian.'||

10. If the student can command the time, and will submit to the labor, he will reap the benefit of making for himself a collection of such passages of Scripture as are really parallel. The practice will induce a habit of careful reading and of minute research, which will be found of the utmost consequence in his studies. But where this cannot be done, resort must be had to the references in the margin of our larger Bibles.

IV. Another species of parallelisms opens, if not so extensive an inquiry, yet an equally important source of testimony to the sense of words, viz. rhythematic parallelism.¶

1. The rhythematic parallelism consists in a certain proportion between the various members of a period, not consisting in the measure of the syllables, but in the thought. Bp. Lowth (whose Lects. on the Hebrew Poetry, and Prelim. Diss. to his translation of Isaiah, should be read and studied by every one desirous to enter fully into this subject,) defines this parallelism to consist in a certain equality, resemblance, or relationship between the members of each period; so that in one or more lines or members of the same period, things shall answer to things, and words to words, as if fitted to each other by a kind of rule or measure; and in this sense the term has been employed by Bp. Jebb, in his equally beautiful and valuable work, on the Parallelism of the N. T. The doctrine is now extended, not only to couplets, clauses, parts of verses and members of sentences, but to complete sentences, entiro vs. and paragraphs of considerable length.

2. The rhythematic parallelism is of different kinds, according to the different laws of the association of thoughts,* and divides into,

(1) The gradual or synonymous parallelism. In this, the second, or responsive clause, so diversifies the preceding one, as generally to rise above it, forming a sort of climax; and sometimes, by a descending scale in the value of the related terms and periods, forming a sort of anti-climax; but in all cases with a marked distinction of meaning. It is the most frequent of all, prevailing chiefly in the shorter poems, in many Psalms, and very frequently in Isaiah. It has the appearance of art and concinnity, and a studied elegance, and discharges the difficult and critical function of discriminating between different degrees of truth and good on the one hand, of falsehood and evil on the other; as in Is. 55:6,7 —

Seek ye JEHOVAH, while He may be found;
Call ye upon Him, while He is near:
Let the wicked forsake his way;
And the righteous man his thoughts:
And let him return to JEHOVAH, and He will compassionate him;
And unto our God, for He abounding in forgiveness.

GUIDE TO THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

Here, in the first line, men are invited to seek JEHOVAH, not knowing where He is, and on the bare intelligence that He may be found; in the second line, having found JEHOVAH, they are encouraged to call upon Him, by the assurance that He is NEAR; in the third line, the wicked, the positive and presumptuous sinner is warned to forsake his way, his habitual course of iniquity; in the fourth line, the unrighteous, the negatively wicked, is called to renounce the very thought of sinning; while, in the last line, the appropriate and encouraging title, our GOD, is substituted for the awful name of JEHOVAH, in the preceding line, and simple compassion is heightened into overflowing mercy and forgiveness.*

(2) The Antithetic Parallelism is that in which two lines correspond with one another, by an opposition of terms and sentiment; when the second is contrasted with the first, sometimes in expressions, sometimes in sense only. This is not confined to any particular form; and hence the degrees of antithesis are various; from an exact contradiction of word to word, singulars to singulars, plurals to plurals, &c., through the whole sentence, down to a general disparity, with something of contrariety in the two propositions. This species of parallelism is admirably adapted to adages, aphorisms, and detached sentences; and abounds in the Proverbs of Solomon, much of the elegance, acuteness, and force of which arise from the antithetic form, the opposition of diction and sentiment. Thus, Pr. 27.6—

Faithful are the words of a friend;
But deceitful are the kisses of an enemy.

Every word has its opposite: faithful, deceitful; words, kisses; friend, enemy. It will sometimes be found, that the latter line is to be rendered complete by supplying a word from the former; as Pr. 12.17; also 14.3. The wisdom of the prudent is to understand his way;

But the folly of fools is [to understand] deceit. Not that their folly is deceit, as the words would seem to imply, without a reference to the parallelism of the lines.

(3) The Synthetic Parallelism is that species in which the sentences answer to each other only by the form of their construction. In this kind, word does not answer to word, and sentence to sentence, as equivalent or opposite; but there is a correspondence and equality between different propositions, in respect of the shape and turn of the whole sentence, and of the constructive parts; such as noun answering to noun, verb to verb, member to member, negative to negative, interrogative to interrogative.† Thus Mat. 7.7,8, consists of two triplets, forming a constructive or synthetic parallelism.

Ask, and it shall be given unto you;
Seek, and ye shall find;
Knock, and it shall be opened unto you:
For every one who asketh, receiveth;
And every one who seeketh, findeth;
And to every one who knocketh, it shall be opened.

In the first triplet, the encouragement is individual, or specific: 'given unto you; ye shall find; opened unto you.'—In the second, generic, or, rather, universal: 'Every one who asketh, . . . seeketh, . . . knocketh.' May not this advance, from promises to principles, from particulars to universals, have been designed at once to elicit the faith of our Lord's immediate followers, and to establish the confidence of all succeeding generations? Had the assurance been merely of a general nature—had it wanted the personal specificity of the first triplet—sufficient provision might not have been made for the doubts and hesitations of early converts, of whom it is repeatedly asserted, that they were dull in apprehension, and slow of belief: had the assurance been merely specific—had it wanted the principal extension of the second triplet—it might, in after-ages, have been difficult to prove that it was not a peculiar privilege of our Lord's original disciples: as the passage stands, both purposes have been abundantly attained; the timidity of Christ's infant followers was encouraged, and the skepticism of prayerless rationalists was met by anticipation.‡ The degrees of the correspondence of the lines in this kind of parallelism must, as Bishop Lowth observes, from the nature of it, be various. Sometimes the parallelism is more, sometimes less, exact; sometimes hardly at all apparent. It requires, indeed, particular attention, much study of the genius of the language, and much habitude in the analysis of the construction, to be able, in all cases, to see and to distinguish the nice rests and pauses, which ought to be made, in order to give the period or sentence its intended turn and cadence, and to each part its due time and proportion.§

We must not omit to notice, that of each of the preceding kinds of parallelism, there is a variety, which is called the alternate parallelism, in which the 1st line answers to the 3d, the 2d to the 4th, and so on; as in De. 32.25.

From without the Lord shall destroy;
In the innermost apartments terror;
Both the young man and the virgin;
The sucking, with the man of gray hairs.

Here the 3d line forms a continuous sense with the 1st, and the 4th with the 2d: the youths and virgins, led out of doors by the vigor and buoyancy natural at their time of life, fall victims to the sword in the streets of the city; while infancy and old age, confined by helplessness and decrepitude to the inner chambers of the house, perish there by fear, before the sword can reach them.||

The next passage is very striking; it is Ro. 2.28,29.

For he is not a Jew, who is one outwardly; neither is circumcision that which is outward in the flesh; but he is a Jew, who is one inwardly; and circumcision of the heart, in the spirit, not in letter; whose praise is not from men, but from God.

Here it will be seen that the 1st, 3d, and 5th lines are not only parallel, but keep up a continuous sense, though that is twice suspended, by the intervention of the 2d and 4th lines.¶

(4) The Introverted Parallelism is that which is so constructed, that whatever answers to the last, the second to the penultimate, or last but one, and so on. Thus Ps. 135:15-18. [See Pref. to Poetical Books, vol. ii. p. 592.] It is this kind of parallelism which Mr. Boys has shown to prevail so generally in the sacred writings; not only in doctrine and discussion, but in narration and dialogue; not only where we might expect to meet with something like stanzas, but where poetry, according to our ideas of it, is out of the question. This ingenious writer has reduced, not only many long passages, which are strictly historical, to the form of single parallelisms, but also several of the psalms, and four of the epistles in the N. T. Of each we give a specimen. The first is Mk. 5:2-6.

* And when He was come out of the ship, immediately there met Him out of the tombs a man with an unclean spirit; b | Who had his dwelling among the tombs.
c | And no man could bind him, not with chains;
d | Because that he had been often bound with feters,
e | And chains: b
f | And the chains had been plucked asunder by him,
g | And the feters broken in pieces.
h | And always night and day he was in the mountains, and in the tombs, crying, and cutting himself with stones;
a | But when he saw Jesus afar off, he ran, and worshipped Him, &c.

Here we have, in e and e, the chains of the person possessed; in d and d, his feters; in c and c, the difficulty of binding or taming him; in b and b, his places of resort and usual habits; in a and a, his meeting with Jesus. Ps. 30 is, according to the arrangement of Mr. Boys (Key, p. 127), an introverted parallelism of six members, thus:

A 1. Thanksgiving promised.
B { a 2. The Psalmist's cry to God.
b 2, 3. The relief obtained.
c 4. Song of praise.
C { S. Sudden change from adversity to prosperity.
C { S. Sudden change from prosperity to adversity.
B { a 10. The Psalmist's cry to God.
b 11. The relief obtained.
c 12. Song of praise.
A 12. Thanksgiving promised.

The Epistle of Paul to Philemon is an introverted parallelism of eighteen members, thus: †

- A. 1-3.—Epistolary.
- B. 4-7.—Prayers of Paul for Philemon—Philemon's conversion.
- C. 8.—Authority.
- D. 9.—Supplication.
- E. 10.—Onesimus, a convert of Paul's.
- F. 11, 12.—Wrong done by Onesimus, amended by Paul.
- G. 12.—To receive Onesimus the same as receiving Paul.
- H. 13, 14.—Paul, Philemon.
- I. 15.—Onesimus.
- J. 16.—Paul, Philemon.
- G. 17.—To receive Onesimus the same as receiving Paul.
- F. 18, 19.—Wrong done by Onesimus, amended by Paul.
- H. 19.—Philemon, a convert of Paul's.
- D. 20.—Supplication.
- C. 21.—Authority.
- B. 22.—Philemon's hospitality—Prayers of Philemon for Paul.
- A. 23-25.—Epistolary.

(5) The Parallelism of Rhythm. This consists simply in the form or construction of the period; it affects not the internal thought, but merely the external dress: it consists in a certain measure in the words and lines; as 2 Co. 11:21-29.

In whatsoever any one is bold, I also am bold. Are they Hebrews? So am I. Are they Israelites? So am I, &c. In labor and toil; in watchings often; In hunger and thirst; in fastings often; &c.

The simply rhythematic parallelism holds the most prominent place in the book of Lam.

V. The assistance a regard to this kind of construction gives the interpreter is unquestionable. The correspondence existing between the different parts of these compositions has been seen to be of various kinds: sometimes it lies in affinity, sometimes in antithesis; sometimes in words, sometimes in ideas, sometimes in construction; but of whatever kind it may be, it is generally very marked and decisive, except in the constructive parallelism, which, as already noticed, is sometimes very subtle and obscure, and must be developed by art and labor. The great use of the Scripture Parallelism is, to aid in ascertaining with precision what are the leading topics of a passage; the points the sacred writer intends to urge, and those he only introduces in connection with them; as well as to indicate in what sense an obscure or ambiguous word ought to be taken in a particular place. And the conjecture of Bp. Jebb is by no means unreasonable—indeed, it has been borne out by facts—that these parallelisms may have been provided, among other purposes, as so many moulds and forms, by means of which shape and consistency may be given to passages at present, if not wholly unintelligible, at least hard to be understood.

VI. Very nearly allied to the rhythematic parallelism, in its principle, and therefore furnishing similar aid in discovering the sense of language, is what is properly termed the COMMON REFERENCE. Their chief difference is, that the parallelism more particularly relates to the meaning of words; the common reference, to that of sentences.

1. This topic, but recently brought forward, judging from the silence observed about it, has not been very favorably received. But we have little doubt it will ultimately be numbered among the direct aids in elucidating Scripture phraseology.

2. That one clause in a sentence has a common reference to two or more clauses in the same sentence, is, indeed, often too obvious to fail of being perceived; but the extent to which such a construction of sentences prevails in the sacred writings, has hitherto escaped the attention of critics. See, however, Macknight and Boys. But it is the latter to whom we are more particularly indebted for having brought it under notice. To the 2d of the Appendices to his Tacita Sacra we are chiefly indebted for the selections that follow.

3. Our first example is from Ro. 6:11. As pointed in the common version, the first member of the sentence is severed from the last, but the second is united to it; it therefore reads thus:—

Likewise reckon { to be dead indeed unto sin, ye also yourselves } but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord.

But the apostle, as is evident from numerous other passages in his writings, intended to represent our 'death to sin' as resulting, equally with our 'living to God,' from Jesus Christ our Lord.

Likewise reckon { to be dead indeed unto sin, { through Jesus Christ ye also yourselves } but alive unto God, { our Lord.

V. 8 of the ch. confirms this view, and we find a further confirmation of it in Col. 3:1, comp. with 2:20. A comma, then, must be inserted before the last clause, 'through Jesus Christ our Lord'; and never, as Mr. Boys remarks, did a comma make a more important difference. So, in another passage, 15:7, the 3d clause has a common reference to both the preceding ones, and this pointing alone gives the true sense.

Gal. 4:7 furnishes another example—

Thou art no more a servant but a son, { of God through Christ.
And if a son, then an heir,

Though our com. vers. errs in following the punctuation of the Greek text. In all these examples, it is very observable that the two clauses to which the third refers, are in a greater or lesser degree parallel. Sometimes, however, there is a common reference of one clause to three others; and in such

Now there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit;
And there are diversities of administrations, but the same Lord; { which
And there are diversities of operations, but the same God; } works all in all.

The only alteration here made in the text is the omission of est, it is, in the last clause; and the word is rejected by Griesbach on good authority. The parallelism confirms his decision.*

SECTION VIII.

THE SUBSIDIARY MEANS FOR DISCOVERING THE SIGNIFICATION OF WORDS.

Direct Testimony not always available or satisfactory — Subsidiary Means; Scope of the Writer; Context of the Passage; Analogy of Scripture — Emphasis — Detection of Emphasis.

The two preceding sections have been devoted to a consideration of those sources which furnish direct testimony to the signification of words and the sense of particular expressions in the sacred writings. A very little consideration will suggest to the student that such testimony will not always be found adequate to the necessities of the interpreter. The usus loquendi, i. e. the meaning which usage has attached to words, cannot always be found by these means. As Ernesti remarks, 'Proper evidence respecting the usage of language is sometimes wanting; sometimes usage is variable or inconstant, even in the same age, or in the same writer; or there is an ambiguity of language, or of grammatical forms; or as obscurity covers the subject or thing treated of; or novelty of language occurs; or a neglect of the usus loquendi, which sometimes happens, even in the most careful writers.'† In these exigencies, other means must be resorted to. Of these, the most important are, an examination of the scope of the author, of the context of the discourse, and of the analogy of Scripture.

1. THE SCOPE, OR DESIGN OF THE WRITER.

To compare the design or scope of an entire passage with the particular part of the composition under consideration, will often be found an important aid to discover its meaning, for every part of the sacred volume was penned for the attainment of a specific object; and a judicious writer will not often be found to say that which is inconsistent with his design.

2. The use of this aid requires particular care, and must never supersede the employment of the means already discussed, which must have the first place, since they relate to direct and positive testimony; and no meaning they have fairly elicited must be set aside by another meaning derived from the supposed scope or design of the author. The aid derivable from the scope will not be in such frequent requisition in the interpretation of the historical books as in that of the Psalms, the Prophets, and the Epistles; the method of the historian, in those being determined by the order of time, or by the similarity of events. Nevertheless, it is not to be altogether laid aside, even in the study of the Gospels, elucidating, as it sometimes will do, those beautiful discourses and parables of our Savior, which were called forth by surrounding and local circumstances, and which had special reference to the character and pursuits of his immediate hearers.

3. The general or special scope of an author may usually be ascertained from his own express or implied statement, or from contemporaneous history.

(1) Where the author states the design of his writing, it is, of course, most satisfactorily ascertained; and this is frequently done.

(a) Sometimes, at its commencement; sometimes, near its close; and at other times, in both. Thus Jn. 20:31. So Peter, 2 Pe. 3:1; and John's First Epistle, 2:14. Sometimes the scope is suggested by the title of the book; as in Prov. 1:1-4. Now, if these books be read with an eye steadily fixed upon the scope, thus pointed out by their respective authors, much force and beauty will be perceived, which would otherwise be lost.

(b) More attention and care will be required where the scope is only implied in the historical circumstances mentioned by the writer. Thus in the Epist. to the Col., its scope is to be gathered from the circumstances referred to by the apostle. (1) He expressly mentions (v. 3-5) the conversion of the Colossians, effected under the ministry of Epaphras; and the accounts which had been given to him by that servant of God, concerning the present state of their church. (2) He declares, in express terms (2:1), that he endured a great conflict for those churches which he had not seen in the flesh; and amongst the rest, for this church. No means, therefore, could have been adopted, better calculated to strengthen the Colossians, than letters from himself, who was now absent, and a prisoner. (3) He intimates (2:7,8), that the church was at that time troubled with 'enticing words, philosophy, and vain deceit, after the rudiments of the world.' He also shows, by borrowing arguments from evangelical doctrines, in order to combat legal teachers, and by the inferences which he draws from those arguments, that certain Judaizing teachers burdened the consciences of the Colossian converts, by enjoining on them the observance of the ceremonial law, the necessity of circumcision (v. 11), of keeping particular days (v. 16), and of abstaining from divers kinds of meats (v. 16-21); from which, as an intolerable yoke, the apostles had deemed it necessary to deliver the Colossian church. Comp. Acts 15 with Gal. 5:3,4, &c. (4) If we rightly consider what is said of Epaphrus, at the commencement and conclusion of the epistle, we shall probably infer, that while he was earnestly commanding Paul the faith and love of the new converts, and while glowing with holy zeal for their welfare, he moved the apostle, by his entreaties, to despatch this letter to Colosse and Laodicea. 13. 4:12,13. These points being premised, it is easy to ascertain the scope of the whole epistle; which was, that Paul, in obedience to his duty as an apostle, might confirm the Colossian converts in the doctrines of faith, and in seeking after that holiness which flows from them. It was also that he might seasonably heal the breaches made by Jewish errors, which had spread, and were perhaps still prevailing; and that he might deliver the church from the evils which those errors had induced, as well as avert from it those which he foresaw would be consequent on this via deceit. It very evidently appears, from the whole structure of the epistle, that the reason the apostle had for so carefully confirming the Colossians in the purer doctrines of the faith, was a fear lest they should be injured by the pernicious opinions of heretical men; and the apostle himself makes all the doctrines stated have a reference to it, when he says, 'This I say, lest any man should beguile you with enticing words!' 2:4. The declaration contained in these words should be well considered, as we recognize in it the true and genuine scope of the whole epistle, expressed in Paul's own words.§

(c) Here it may be remarked, that the Acts, and particularly ch. 15, is of special assistance in attaining to a right understanding of the epistles of Paul. The historical books of the Old Testament render the same assistance in reading the Prophets and the Psalms; and the books of Moses elucidate the writings of both Testaments.

(d) The rules for applying the aid afforded by an examination of the scope, to the investigation of particular passages of Scripture, must be nearly the same as those employed in the investigation of entire books. The whole context should be carefully examined, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the scope is expressly stated or fairly implied in the writer's own words. Thus, if we would understand the design of the apostle in 1 Co. 10:25-29, we must refer back to ch. 8:1, where his purpose in this part of the letter is clearly pointed out. Sometimes the design of a particular passage is ascertained by the concluding inference which the writer deduces. So Paul, Ro. 3:28 — 'Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law' which defines the scope of the passage. Particular attention, then, should be paid to all the connecting particles, 'wherefore,' 'therefore,' 'then,' 'seeing that,' &c. Considerable care, and some practice, will be requisite, to enable us to distinguish between the principal and subordinate conclusions; but the benefits derivable from the practice will abundantly repay the labor.

(2) Where no assistance can be derived from any expressed or implied declaration of the writer's scope, we must endeavor to ascertain, from other authentic sources, the occasion on which the book was written; and the particular circumstances, at that time, of the persons to whom it was immediately addressed. To know, for example, that at the time John wrote his Gospel, the Gnostic heresy was spreading itself through the church, and to be acquainted also with the leading features of that corruption of religion, will materially assist in understanding many passages in that important document, which it would seem probable must have had some reference to their errors. A knowledge of the state of the church at Corinth will throw considerable light upon the epistles directed to it by Paul, in which it is natural to suppose he would refer to their mistakes and dissensions. So also we may perceive the force and beauty of many of the expressions in Ps. 96 and 105, when we ascertain, from 1 Cor. 16, that they were sung on occasion of the ark being brought up to Jerusalem by David. The same remarks will apply to the prophetic writings, which may be materially elucidated by observing the circumstances that called forth many of the predictions, and the state of things to which they had an immediate reference. Should both these sources of information fail to ascertain the scope of the author, we must,

* On this subject of Parallelisms, the reader may consult, in addition to the Tacita Sacra, Bp. occur more frequently than in the Psalms.

(3) Attentively and repeatedly read the whole book, with a view to discover its scope from a general and connected view of its contents. In the epistolary parts of the N. T. especially, great light will be derived to the sense of the text, if this kind of reading be adopted; and, indeed, it should never be dispensed with, in the study of these important, and in many respects difficult, letters. They should be read, and re-read, from beginning to end; and it is preferable to use a copy where the text is not divided into chs. and vs. Each one should be read as we would peruse an epistle from a friend; and that three or four times over, without interruption (not so many verses to-day, and so many to-morrow), until we have fully apprehended the meaning, and the subject of the whole letter becomes clear. From this perusal, re-perusal, and repetition, we shall obtain a right knowledge of the scope of the author, and an acquaintance with the general argument of the epistle.* Nor should this examination be restricted to separate books of the O. or N. T.; it should be extended continuously to all those books as a whole; as every part of the divine revelation has an ultimate reference to one great subject, which is carefully pursued throughout; and conclusions as to that revelation should not be drawn till the joint amount of the whole can be thus collected. Not thus to gather, from all the different books, what each has said of their common subject, must be to narrow the grounds on which it was designed that our opinion of the revelation should be formed†.

(4) It should be borne in mind, that the whole design of the Scriptures is to treat of Christ, in his mediatorial capacity. The Redeemer is the sum and substance—the very soul—of Scripture; and every part of it has a reference to Him, and his mediatorial kingdom. Some passages treat expressly of Him, inculcating faith in his promise, and obedience to his will; some contain prophecies concerning Him, fulfilled, or remaining to be fulfilled; others exhibit types and figures; while some are to be referred to Him by the analogy of faith, which is entirely founded upon Him. Hence the necessity of keeping the eye of faith constantly fixed upon the Redeemer in reading every part of Scripture. ‘In Him all the promises of God are yes and amen.’ 2 Co. 120. To Him all the genealogies refer, all the times relate, all the ceremonies point; and as the sun imparts his light to all the heavenly bodies, so Christ, ‘the Sun of Righteousness,’ gives light and meaning to every part of the Bible.

5. Having pointed out the principal rules for discovering the scope of a writer, it only remains to offer a suggestion or two, by way of caution, in the use of this aid.

(1) There must be an evident and necessary connection between the sense given to a passage and the scope of the discourse, and not only some tolerable agreement. For it will sometimes happen, that several interpretations may agree with the scope of the writer. Thus Tit. 2:11 has been interpreted in three different ways—as referring to slaves and their masters—to Jews and Gentiles—and to all men, indiscriminately; but if the scope of the apostle’s argument be examined, it will be found difficult to say what real connection there could subsist in the apostle’s mind between the duties of slaves (which is the subject of the exhortation in v. 9, and for which the fact stated in v. 11 is assigned as the motive) and the salvability either of all men or of the Gentiles, as in opposition to the Jews. The only interpretation of the words, therefore, which gives them a necessary connection with the scope of the passage, is that which refers them to the persons spoken of in v. 9, namely, slaves.

(2) But how are we to know when the sense given to a passage has an evident and necessary connection with the scope of a discourse? The following negative precepts have been given by Pr. Stuart: [note § 3] and a meaning which does not infringe upon them will be found to harmonize with the subject of which the sacred author is treating, unless he has violated all the rules of language and reasoning; which cannot be admitted.

(3) The meaning, as discovered by the scope of the writer, should be compared with that which the usus loquendi affords, for the purpose of forming a judgment on their agreement.

(4) A proposition occurring in the course of an argument, is not necessarily to be taken in the widest sense which the words will bear. It may be subject to various limitations, which the writer did not think it necessary to express, because they did not affect the course of the argument; and we should ever bear in mind, that our Savior and his apostles adapted, for the most part, their instructions to the occasion, without attempting to treat religion in a systematic order.

(a) The following passages will at once illustrate and confirm the rule. In Lu. 9: 50, our Savior says, ‘He that is not against us is for us;’ but in Mat. 15:30, it is, ‘He that is not with Me is against Me.’ How are these propositions to be reconciled? Why, by taking one of them in some limited sense; and the occasion on which the first was delivered evidently points out the limitation it requires. John, having seen one, who was not associated with the apostles, casting out devils in the name of Christ, had forbidden him to do so. Jesus said to him, ‘Forbid him not; for he that is not against us is for us.’ ‘Forbid him not,—that is the precept; forbid him not to do good in my name;’ and the reason follows,—‘for he that is not against us is for us;’ he who does not oppose Me promotes my cause;—let my gospel be preached, even though of strife and contention. Here our Savior inculcates forbearance towards those who, from whatever motives, promote the progress of his kingdom; but in the place in Mat. He teaches us, that mere indifference will not avail to our salvation; that they who would obtain the reward must possess the character of his disciples; that they who do not confess Him before men, and espouse his cause in this world, will be treated as his enemies at the day of judgment.

(b) The manner in which Paul and James have treated the doctrine of justification, will furnish another illustration of this canon of interpretation. James says, ‘Ye see how by works a man is justified, and not by faith only, ch. 2:24; whereas Paul says, ‘Therefore we conclude, that a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law;’ and it is a little singular that each of the apostles illustrates his position by the instance of Abraham. But the apparent discrepancy will be removed, if we examine the course of their reasoning. James is laboring to prove that faith without works is a dead faith, a faith which will not avail to salvation.—‘What doth it profit, though a man say he hath faith, and have not works? Can faith—can such a faith—save him? If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them, Depart in peace: be ye warmed and filled: notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body; what doth it profit?’ What sincerity, what worth is there in such professions of kindness! What benefit do they confer on those who are the objects of them? ‘Even so faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone.’ All professions of faith, which do not evidence their truth by a holy life and conversation, are false, vain, and unprofitable. ‘Yea, a man may say,’ to such a professor, ‘Thou hast faith; or pretendest to have it, and I have works: show me thy faith without thy works,’—give me, if thou canst, some other proof of it,—‘and I will show thee my faith by my works. Thou believest there is one God: thou dost well; the devil also believe and tremble! Wherein doth thy faith differ from theirs, if it produce not the fruits of righteousness and holiness? But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead? wholly unprofitable to salvation? ‘Was not Abraham, our father, justified? did he not show forth a living faith unto justification, ‘by works, when he had offered Isaac, his son, upon the altar?’ Did he not, by that act of holy obedience, prove and display a living faith in the truth, and power, and promises of God, which ‘was imputed to him for righteousness?’ ‘Seest thou how faith wrought with his works? producing obedience to the commands of God, however apparently severe and irreconcileable with his promises; and by works was faith made perfect,’ brought forth into action, and shown to be a lively and efficacious principle in the soul? ‘And the Scripture was fulfilled, which saith, “Abraham believed God, and it was imputed to him for righteousness;” and he was called the friend of God. Ye see, then, how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only—by works evidencing that faith which is imputed to the believer for righteousness; by such works a man is justified, and not by faith only—not by a mere barren profession, or even a mere speculative belief, which does not influence the life and conduct. Such appears to be the course of James’s reasoning. Paul, on the other hand, is proving to the Jews, that they, as well as the Gentiles, must be saved by faith; and his argument is this: ‘All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God;’ all have broken the moral law of God; no one, therefore, can be saved by that law, which exacts a perfect obedience; and thence he concludes, ‘that a man is justified by faith, without, apart from, distinct from, ‘the deeds of the law.’ In order to be justified before God, he must have that faith which God will impute to him for righteousness—a faith, however, which works by love, and makes those who are influenced by it zealous of good works. This passage will furnish us with another rule.

(5) A proposition must be understood in a sense sufficiently large to bear out the conclusion which it is intended to prove. Thus, in the first part of Romans, Paul’s object is to show that the Jews, as well as the Gentiles, need the salvation which is by Jesus Christ; and his argument is this: ‘All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God; therefore all, both Jews and Gentiles, must be justified freely through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus.’ Ro. 3:23,24. But this conclusion will not follow from the premises, unless we understand the apostle to lay it down as a universal proposition, that ‘all have sinned.’¹

II. The second mean for judging of the sense of words, this section was to consider, is AN EXAMINATION OF THE CONTEXT.

It is certain, that many of the controversies which have been carried on in the Christian church, have arisen in consequence of their authors having overlooked this rule, which is of the very broadest extent in biblical interpretation. Every theological doctrine that has been broached, however absurd or monstrous its character, has been surrounded and supported by a multiplicity of texts, which, having been forcibly ascertained from their respective contexts, were pressed into a service for which they were never designed. Mr. Locke has somewhere said, that 'if the Holy Scriptures were but laid before the eyes of Christians in their due connection and consistency, it would not then be so easy to snatch out a few words, as if they were separate from the rest, to serve a purpose to which they do not at all belong, and with which they have nothing to do. But as the matter now stands, he that has a mind to it may, at a cheap rate, be a notable champion for the truth; i. e. for the doctrines of the sect that [birth] chance or interest has cast him into. He need but furnish them with verses of sacred Scripture, containing words and expressions that are but flexible (as all general, obscure, and doubtful ones are), and his system, that has appropriated them to the orthodoxy of his church (of whatever denomination it may be), makes them immediately strong and irrefragable arguments for his opinion. This is the benefit of loose sentences, and Scripture crumpled into verses, which quickly turn into independent aphorisms. But, if the quotation in the verse produced were considered as part of a continued, coherent discourse, and so its sense were limited by the tenor of the context, most of these formidable and warm disputants would be quite stripped of those which they doubt not now to call spiritual weapons, and they would often have nothing to say that would not show their weakness, and manifestly fly in their faces.'

2. That such a perversion may be guarded against, the rule merits constant attention. We are aware that some persons, who are far from being lawless interpreters, do not hold this aid in very high estimation, conceiving its use to be confined within very narrow limits. But, as Pr. Stuart has suggested, 'the immediate context, either preceding, succeeding, or both together, is a rule for judging of the meaning of words of the very broadest extent. In very many cases, indeed, the evidence of the usus loquendi is itself built upon the context. We adopt the opinion, that the usus loquendi sanctions this or that particular sense, because the context clearly shows that such a meaning is to be assigned to it, and that no other can be given without rendering the sense frigid and inept. Moreover, the general scope of an author does not forbid the admission of a great variety of arguments, illustrations, and episodes, into the intermediate parts of a discourse; so that one is far more certain of giving a sense that is congruous, by consulting the immediate context, than by immediately consulting the general scope of the whole.' Both, no doubt, are to be regarded; but of the two, the former is by far the most important means of assistance. 'Indeed,' adds this enlightened critic, 'I should doubt whether there is any one rule in the whole science of hermeneutics so important, and of so much practical and actual use, as the one in question. Great care, indeed, is necessary, to decide, with certainty, what sense the context requires that a word should have, especially when the immediate subject is briefly stated. But this care is as easily practised as any other rule that hermeneutics prescribe. Violence must not be done to words by forcibly subjecting them to the context, against etymology, analogy, the rules of grammar, and the nature of language. But in every thing short of this, all good lexicographers and commentators adopt the meaning of words to the context, in cases too numerous to need my specification.'^{*}

3. It is greatly to be desired, that our present method of breaking the Scriptures into chapters and verses were superseded by the adoption of a continuous text; or, at least, one only divided into such sections as would be obviously suggested upon a critical examination of the order of the sacred writers. According to our present distribution of the text, the continuity and completion of many discourses are broken in upon, in a way most injurious to their sense, and most prejudicial to ordinary readers. If, therefore, a Bible be used in which these common divisions occur, it is indispensable that they should be altogether disregarded; at least, in the examination of the context. Dr. Gerard has offered the following suggestions upon the use of the context:

(1) General terms being often used only in a part of their extension, it is the connection that shows to what part of it they ought to be limited. In He. 11:6, it is said, 'Without faith it is impossible to please God.' But that this is not saving or Christian faith, is evident from the words that follow, and by which the expression is limited, 'must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him.'

(2) In like manner, ambiguous expressions must be restricted, among their several significations, to that one which suits the connection. In Mat. 23:23, 'judgment, mercy, and faith' certainly not belief of any kind, but fidelity, as the connection shows. In Ro. 14:23, the word is employed in another sense: 'Whatsoever is not of faith, is sin'; i. e. — not justifying faith, not a warrant from Scripture, but a full persuasion of the lawfulness of the action.

(3) Every term should be considered as it stands in the proposition, of which it makes a part, and be explained, not by itself, but so as to bring out the real sense of that whole proposition. In Mat. 8:21, we read, 'Whosoever heareth these sayings, and doeth them [subject], I will liken him to a wise man, which built his house upon a rock' [predicate]. The sense is plain: 'He who practises as well as hears, builds his hope of salvation on a sure foundation.' But Dr. Gill thus interprets it: 'The subject of the comparison is, "Whosoever cometh to Christ by faith, being given him of the Father" [supposed without ground], such a one hears his words, not only externally, but internally, and he doth them, exerciseth faith on Christ, his grace and righteousness held forth in them, and performeth all duties without any view to obtain eternal life thereby, which he expects only from Christ, as his savings direct him. Every such believer builds the salvation of his soul; he digs deep, till he come to a good foundation, a rock, Christ, the Rock of ages; and he lays the whole stress of his salvation on Him.' Here, plain expressions are explained by metaphorical ones; a meaning is put on a word, inconsistent with its place in the sentence; the sentence destroyed, being all turned into a predicate for a subject gratuitously supposed; the real meaning explained away, turned into an insignificant assertion, 'that he who expects salvation only from Christ, lays the whole stress of his salvation upon Him,' or, 'he who believes on Christ believes in Christ.'

(4) In a piece of reasoning, every proposition must be considered in its connection with the whole argument; if it be a principle, or medium of proof, in relation to the point intended to be proved; if an inference, in relation to the premises whence it is deduced; if only an illustration, in reference to the purpose for which it is brought.[†]

4. The extent of the context will, of course, be found to vary, according to circumstances: sometimes it embraces only a few verses; at other times it includes a whole chapter or more, and even the entire book.

To determine this will require attentive examination; but if the scope or design of the writer be first ascertained, by the methods already suggested, there will be but few difficulties to encounter, except those arising from the frequent parentheses occurring in the writings of Paul. Many of these are pointed out by the characteristic marks in our English translation; but it has not always been done, nor is it always correctly done even where it has been attempted. To the unlearned reader it will sometimes be a task of considerable difficulty to determine a parenthetical passage; but much may be done by perseverance and caution. In any doubtful case, recourse must be had to a judicious commentator, whose decision may be adopted, if recommended by its probability, though we may not be able to decide upon the grounds of it. In some cases, the writer himself points out, in a manner sufficiently obvious to an attentive reader, the extent of the parenthesis into which he has been led, by a repetition of his words on the return to his principal subject. Thus, in Eph. 3d ch., the writer, after entering upon his principal topic, with 'For this cause, I Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles' (v. 1), diverges, upon the mention of the Gentiles, to a consideration of their call to the blessings of the covenant; and in v. 14, again returns to his topic, with a repetition of the same words: 'For this cause [I say] I bow,' &c. From an inspection of the passage, it will appear more natural to insulate only these 13 vs., than to extend the parenthesis to the first v. of the subsequent ch., as our trs. have done. In very few cases, however, is the parenthesis so strongly marked; but only to be ascertained by a close attention to the scope and line of argument pursued by the writer. In 1 Ti. 1, we have a parenthesis from v. 8 of ch. 1 to v. 17, incl. Taking occasion from the false teachers, Paul speaks of the true and proper use of the law, according to the gospel committed to him; and having given vent to the feelings of his heart, he returns, in v. 18, to the scope he had in view in v. 3, where he intimates, by using the comparative particle as, that the completion of the sense was to be expected in the subsequent vs. The whole of the discourse connects thus: 'As I besought thee to charge some that they teach no other doctrine, but seek after godly edifying; and that the end of the commandment was love, out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned, &c. — so now I commit the same charge unto thee — that thou mayst hold faith and a good conscience,' &c. Another instance we have in Phil. 1:27, to 2:16, incl. It is proper to observe, however, that words thus insulated are never superfluous, but arise either from some pressing necessity, or from the ardent and overflowing love of the writer. In Eph., for instance, how forcibly does the description of the subject insulated by the parenthesis, elucidate the point which Paul had to prove! For, if God had committed to the apostle a dispensation of grace for the Gentiles, and the revealed mystery of Christ, that the Gentiles were co-heirs, members of the same body, and partakers together with the Jews of the promise in Christ, Paul undertook the ministry through the gospel, and conformably with the gift of that grace (which is all contained in ch. 3); and thence it clearly follows, that the Gentiles were not to be excluded from communion with the Jews in Christ.[‡]

III. THE ANALOGY OF SCRIPTURE, or of FAITH, as it is usually called, must be constantly regarded in the business of interpretation.

1. It is much to be regretted, that this rule, from having been injudiciously treated of, has fallen greatly into disrepute. But it is neither so vague as some, nor so important as others insisted.

2. The analogy of faith has been defined to be 'the uninterrupted harmony of Script-

ture in the fundamental points of faith and duty; or the proportion which the doctrines of Scripture bear to each other.¹ But it is very clear, from this definition, that unless there be a total freedom from prejudice in favor of any particular opinions or theological system (which is really impossible, however we may talk of it), every part of the divine revelation will be interpreted with reference to that standard which is assumed as correct, and which will be considered as the analogy of faith, to which the whole of Scripture is to be rendered subservient. Hence there will be as many analogies of faith assumed, for the standard of Scriptural interpretation, as there are shades of opinion in the Christian world. For who is to decide what is the harmony of Scripture on the fundamental points of faith and doctrine? But (another objection, still more formidable) this doctrine requires a previous and perfect acquaintance with the whole scheme of revealed religion,² and therefore can afford no aid to the student, except in the confirmation of the doctrines already ascertained. Dr. Campbell justly inquires, ‘What is the reason, the principal reason at least, for which the study of Scripture is so indispensable a duty?’ It is precisely, all consistent Protestants will answer, that we may thence discover what the whole scheme of religion is. Are we then to begin our examination with taking it for granted, that, without any inquiry, we are perfectly acquainted with this scheme already?³ Is not this going to Scripture, not in order to learn the truths it contains, but in order to find something that may be made to ratify our own opinions?⁴

3. In laying it down as a rule, then, that regard must be had to the analogy of faith in the interpretation of Scripture, we mean not a sectarian, but a scriptural analogy; we mean that the obvious and incontrovertible sense of clear passages, affords a rule by which we may reason analogically concerning the meaning of obscure passages; or, at least, by which we may show what obscure passages cannot mean. According to this rule, where an expression is either dark or equivocal, an interpretation is not to be adopted, if it contradict other passages, where the sentiment is manifestly declared in clear and unequivocal terms. Proposed in this way as a canon of scriptural interpretation, the analogy of faith will direct us to the sense of some passages which in themselves will admit of more than one sense.

4. If we carefully test the Scriptures by this principle, we shall find that passages which have been construed literally, should have been interpreted metaphorically; and vice versa. For example: Our Lord, on the evening of his passion, while He sat at table, ‘took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave to his disciples, and said, Take, eat; this is my body’ (Mat. 26:26); but according to the analogy of Scripture, this must be understood figuratively—the sign being put for the thing signified, by a very common metonymy; for Christ’s human nature has ascended into heaven, where it will remain until the restitution of all things. Ac. 3:21, &c. So we are commanded to eat our Lord’s flesh, to pluck out our right eye, and cut off our right hand. Jn. ch. 6, in several places; and Mat. 5:29,30. But to understand these passages literally, would be to destroy the analogy of Scripture, according to which violence must not be offered to ourselves or others. On the other hand, there are passages that some persons interpret metaphorically, which, according to the analogy of Scripture, should be understood literally. Thus the passages in which Christ is said to ‘bear the sins of many,’ to ‘bear our sins in his own body on the tree,’ &c., have been interpreted figuratively, to mean, only, that he occasioned their forgiveness, by introducing the Christian system. But this is an unwarrantable departure from the literal meaning of words, and violates the analogy of Scripture, according to which Christ suffered as a vicarious atonement; or carried the punishment of our iniquities.

5. In the use of this aid, then, it must be seen that we apply those passages which have a clear and obvious meaning to the interpretation of such as are obscure and doubtful; and, if two passages relating to any doctrine or duty appear to be contrary to each other, that one of which the meaning is apparent, must be brought to explain the other, which, taken separately, would admit of a contradictory sense. The same rule also requires that those passages in which a topic is but incidentally introduced, should be interpreted according to those in which the subject is professedly treated. But this requires an attention to the scope or design of the writer, of which we have already spoken. Upon this topic, the following considerations are worthy of notice:—

(1) No doctrine can belong to the analogy of faith which is founded on a single text; for every essential principle of religion is delivered in more than one place.

(2) Texts which treat professedly of a subject have greater weight than such as only touch it incidentally; and texts which express it absolutely, and as it is in itself, are clearer, and more decisive, than such as have a reference to particular occasions; without a perfect knowledge of which they cannot be understood, but may be totally misapprehended.

(3) In forming the analogy of faith, all the plain texts relating to one subject, or article, ought to be taken together, importunately compared, the expressions of one of them restricted by those of another, and explained in mutual consistency; and then the article should be deduced from them all in conjunction. It is too commonly the practice, that one set of texts which have the same aspect, are selected and explained in their greatest possible rigor; and all others, which look another way, are neglected, or explained away, and tortured into a compatibility with the opinion, in that manner partially deduced.

6. If these rules be strictly observed, the comparison of particular passages with the general tenor of Scripture will be of the greatest use; particularly in preventing the overstretching of figurative and metaphorical expressions, and in enabling us to restrict general expressions; for setting aside opinions hastily deduced from a few separate texts; and for giving every doctrine its proper limitations.†

IV. Another topic pertaining to the interpretation of language, may properly be noticed here.

1. Besides the principal idea contained in a word sometimes obtains, through its combination with other words, an accompanying idea, which disappears as soon as the word is removed from its connection, and is considered by itself. This is called emphasis, and consists in the argumentation of the significations of a word, arising from its combination with other words. In such cases, it is said that a word or phrase has altogether a peculiar emphasis. If many such phrases occur in a composition written in a state of mental agitation, the composition is termed emphatic. Hence it will appear, that emphasis arises principally from a peculiar position, combination, or repetition of certain words, by which more is said and expressed than the words otherwise signify by themselves, or in other combinations.

2. It should never be assumed, without reason, that there is any thing emphatic in a passage: the emphasis, as being something adventitious, must be proved by inquiry.

(1) Whether it be the object of the speaker or writer, in this passage, to say more than the words at other times convey of themselves. His object may be to excite attention; to give its due weight to an important preposition; to express mental agitation; to imprint a truth deeply on the mind; to say much in a few words; or to give additional elegance to the discourse. Thus the verb chay, to live, is frequently used to express a happy life; and the verb yald, to know, is applied either to that knowledge which implies in it a benignant care, or to that knowledge with which is joined a most immediate sense of merited punishment; or, lastly, to that knowledge which expresses decorously the conjugal conjunction. The context will readily point out to an attentive reader, not unacquainted with the Heb. idiom, emphases of this sort.

(2) Whether the words, taken by themselves, or placed in another connection, have the same force.

(3) Whether the emphasis ceases, when the same thing is expressed in other words; as by a periphrasis.

(4) Whether the speech does not give a feeble and inappropriate sense, unless it be admitted that the speaker or writer meant to say more than the words of themselves express. Thus, in Ep. 6:13,14, strati, to stand, means to stand firmly and boldly, like a Roman soldier, without shifting his ground, or retiring. In 1 Co. 4:3,4, anakrinēti is thrice used, and always with emphasis; for, in the first place, anakrinesthai means to be approved of by the judgment of others; next, anakrinēti means to assume the right of judging and approving; and, lastly, v. 4, it means to have the right of judging, or to be able to judge rightly. If, therefore, in all these cases we render it simply to judge, the sense will be frigid, and unsuitable to the whole context. So, also, the subject and context show that, in Col. 1:4, pistis is used with an emphasis of constancy, greatness, and fruitfulness; for there was no need that Paul should bear by report of the faith siroop of the Colossians, since he had known that, personally, when he founded their church. The same holds good in Ro. 1:1, where the greatness of the apostle’s joy would seem unreasonable, unless we adjoint some emphasis of greatness to the simple idea of faith. So, also, in Mat. 4:2, epineuse means he was vehemently and intolerably hungry.‡

3. As commentators have sometimes, under the guidance of erroneous principles, sought for emphatic phrases in many passages of the Bible where they do not exist, Ernesti, Michælis, and other men of learning, have attempted to fix, with greater accuracy, when an emphasis is to be acknowledged in the Bible, by the following canons:—

(1) No word is in itself emphatic, but becomes so by a peculiar use of it.

(2) Emphatic words should be carefully distinguished from such as have a comprehensive sense; for example, the word philosophy, how much it includes; regeneration, &c.

(3) An emphatic should be distinguished from a sublime expression, which is contained as well in the things as in the words.

(4) No emphases are to be deduced from etymology.

(5) Not every uncommon Hebrew or Greek phrase is emphatic.

(6) It would be a prejudging of the case, to find an emphasis in all compound Greek words throughout the N. T. (In some such it cannot be denied, as hyperopse. Phil. 2:9.)

(7) Neither is there always an emphasis when an abstract term is put for a concrete.§

(8) Finally, an emphasis should not be looked for in prepositions, particles, or numbers; nor in every tropical expression.||

SECTION IX.

OF THE INTERPRETATION OF TROPICAL LANGUAGE.

All words originally used in a Proper Sense—The Tropical Sense—Means of detecting Tropical Expressions—Rules for interpreting Tropical Expressions: Examples.

The tropical use of words has been incidentally discussed in a preceding section, in which the necessity for adhering to the literal signification of words, in all cases where this could be done without being led into the adoption of a frigid, absurd, or contradictory sense, was insisted upon and explained. It now becomes necessary to consider the subject of tropical language somewhat more particularly, for the purpose of pointing out the right method of distinguishing scriptural tropes, and also of giving some directions for their proper explanation.

I. All words were originally employed in a proper sense; i. e. they were formed and invented to express certain things, to which they were confined. A necessity soon arose, however, as the number of subjects was increased, of using these words in various senses; i. e. they were primarily employed to denote one thing, and secondarily to denote something else, having an analogy or likeness to the primary idea. Here is the literal and the tropical sense. But this transference of words is often used when it is not of necessity required by the novelty of the thing. In all human operations, gratification is studied more than necessity. Tropes, therefore, were invented, to produce variety in language, by preventing the too frequent recurrence of a word; of which sort are metonymies, synecdoches, and the weaker metaphors. Tropical words, especially metaphors, were also introduced, to ornament style. For as in these, which are the most frequent, there exists a simile compressed into a single word, the mind is gratified by them, through its natural love for similes and images; especially such as are drawn from objects possessing something of sensible splendor or beauty. In proportion, therefore, as an author is desirous of adorning his style, the more does he abound in tropes, as appears in the practice of poets and orators, to whom the more frequent use of tropes is allowed, because they have the highest effect in ornamenting the style. It is important to keep in view this distinction, between the transference of a word from necessity, and its transference from any other cause. In the former, the transference is made that a thing may have a proper name; in the latter, gratification and ornament are the sole objects. The former, therefore, is grammatical; the latter, rhetorical. In the former, the ground of transference rests on the analogy of the nature of things; in the latter, on some sensible resemblance. And since every thing ought to have a name, either proper or common, it follows, that a word grammatically transferred does not cease to be proper, while a word rhetorically transferred does."

II. These general observations premised, we may treat of the rules for DETECTING TROPICAL EXPRESSIONS; as,

1. The nature of the subject must be well considered, in order to determine whether that which is enunciated respecting it is to be taken in a proper or in a figurative sense. In following this rule, we must compare the subject and the predicate, in order to see whether it be possible that the words and phrases used by the author can, in their proper sense, be predicated of the subject taken in its proper sense. If the subject and predicate be completely heterogeneous, it is evident that the words of the author must be interpreted figuratively. Of this case we have clear examples in the following phrases: gird up the loins of your mind (1 Pet. 1:13); the sincere milk of the word (2:2); the breastplate of righteousness (Ep. 6:14). Compare Wisd. 7:14, 1 Th. 5:8; a horn of salvation (Lu. 1:69); living stones (1 Pe. 2:4); the armor of light (Ro. 13:12); to which are opposed, in the same passage, the works of darkness. Under this head may be classed every grammatical conjunction of things which appear to be naturally incongruous; as, for example, the phrase thou shalt catch men, in Lu. 5:10. This observation throws light upon many passages of the N. T., the true sense of which will appear plain and easy by the application of the rule; as when Paul addresses Ananias the high-priest in these words: "God will smite thee, thou whitened wall;" when he says to the Corinthians, "Be ye washed . . . in the Spirit of our God," 1 Co. 6:11;† when he prays for the Ephesians, "That the eyes of their heart may be enlightened;" and, finally, when the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews calls God consuming fire; it is manifest, that in these, and in all such cases, we must admit the existence of tropes.

2. To distinguish, accurately, between proper and tropical language, we must carefully attend to the nature and context of the writing.

(1) If the whole book bear a poetical character, and be replete with tropes and images, as the Apocalypse, for example, no one would deny the probability of a tropical sense in particular passages. If, on the other hand, in a prose composition, we meet with a passage intimately connected with the whole scope and argument of the book, and a question arise, whether it is to be interpreted properly or tropically, there can be little doubt that the former supposition is to be preferred. For this reason, the remarkable passage 2 Pet. 3:3-13 must be interpreted as describing the conflagration of the visible universe, in opposition to those who imagine a figurative reference to certain political or moral revolutions. It is also clear, that the same principle applies to the shorter sections of any book. Thus, since the passages Jn. 4:35-38, 6:34, seq.; Ro. 6:3-11; Ep. 6:11, seq., all abound with figures and images, we must of necessity incline to a tropical interpretation of the particular phrases contained in them. Nor is the form of the expression to be neglected. For those texts which, according to oriental custom, embrace a short moral truth in a condensed and figurative form, are to be interpreted tropically; as, for example, Mat. 7:6, Lu. 6:41-43 (comp. v. 39), and others of the same class. But, above all, we must consult the context, and observe whether, in what goes before, or follows, we can detect the presence of tropes. And these marks are various, as we are taught by many passages of Scripture. When the author himself uses words which clearly show that a comparison is intended, the case is clear; as (Lu. 12:35), "Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning;" i. e. be always ready.

(2) Nearly allied to this class of texts are those in which the proper and improper forms are so united, as that the one shall involve the interpretation of the other. Of such we shall produce a few examples. When Jesus (Mat. 11:29), admonishing his hearers 'to take his yoke upon them,' adds, "and learn of me," he clearly shows that the word yoke is to be taken figuratively, and that it means nothing more than the precepts which he taught. Compare Wisd. 5:1-26. The apostle Paul (Ro. 6:21), after inquiring of those who had once been devoted to the practice of vice, "What fruit had ye then?" by immediately adding, "for the end (τέλος) of these things is death," shows that fruit must here be taken tropically, as meaning result or payment. The same inspired author, in Phil. 3:2, says, "Beware of dogs;" and the tropical application of the word dogs to false [noisy] and impudent teachers, is proved by what follows — "Beware of evil workmen." Comp. Re. 22:15. In like manner, in Ja. 4:4, the words ye adulterers and adulteresses, are to be understood, not properly, as referring to actual adultery, but figuratively, to an undue attachment to worldly things; as appears, not only from the context generally, but also from what immediately follows — "Know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God?"

(3) Light is also frequently thrown upon the proper or improper signification of a word by comparing it with some contrasted word; thus, Ro. 6:23, if we compare the phrase for the wages of sin is death, which many theologians understand in a proper sense, as referring to natural death, with the opposed phrase but the gift of God is eternal life, we shall perceive that the tropical sense is to be preferred, and that the word thanatos [death] is to be interpreted by mortality of every kind.

(4) We shall show, in the last place, by a few examples, the importance of the subsequent context, in determining the proper or improper use of a word. Commentators are divided as to the meaning of ἡ ζῶ αὐτὸν (Lu. 12:15), whether it ought to be understood tropically of happiness, or property, of the natural life of man. The former rendering is to be preferred, for this reason, principally, that the parable of the rich man snatched away by death, which immediately follows (v. 16-21), is in favor of this opinion. For a like reason, in Ja. 9:4, the expressions while it is day — the night cometh — must be interpreted of the duration of man's natural life, and the death which terminates it, because our blessed Savior immediately adds, as long as I live among men, I am a light to them; i. e. I promote their happiness.

3. Having thus disposed of the context, we must, in the next place, examining the use which may be derived from parallel passages, in which the same subject is treated in other words or phrases, either proper or tropical; and the greatest attention is always to be paid to any explanation afforded by the author himself. A striking example is Jl. 11:14, when Jesus openly says, Lazarus is dead; from whence it appears, that the words he had before used, at ver. 11, — our friend Lazarus sleepeth, — were not to be taken in their proper sense, but to be interpreted tropically of death. Of the same nature is the passage (Mat. 16:6), Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees; the true sense of which words the disciples did not apprehend, supposing that their Master spoke of leaven in its proper sense. But Jesus, by reminding them, at v. 7, of his having provided food for

* Ernesti, Institutes, pt. i. ch. ii. Mr. Terrott, the translator of Erneste, remarks, that diabolos affords a good example of the proper sense of the trope by grammatical, and of the trope by rhetorical, transference. Thus diabolos, an accuser, is the proper sense; by grammatical transference, it means the chief of evil spirits, Satan; and by rhetorical transference, a wicked man, Jn. 6:70. So, also, huic diabolou, Ac. 13:10. Satan is also used in the same sense in Mat. 4:10, 16:23, Mk. 8:33. Seiler has pointed out the following, as the connections or relations which are the ground of grammatical tropes:—

1. Either a purely imaginary and arbitrary connection, which depends on our subjective conceptions; and is,

1. A resemblance, whence arises the metaphor; or,

2. A difference, a relation of its opposite; whence arises, (1) Irony.

(2) Antithesis.

II. Or it is a real, objective relation. Here the one word is used in place of the other, insomuch as the things for whose signification they originally served stand in a real connection with those to denote which they are now used; which connection does not depend on our thoughts, and is,

1. Either a union of the whole with its parts — (1) A physical or psychological union; (2) A logical; for example, genus and species. Both furnish the synecdoche.

2. Or it may be another species of connection and relation, in which two things stand: this is the metonymy; whose principal species are, (1) When the cause is put for the effect, or the effect for the cause; for example, a person, an instrument or means, a thing or an action, for their effects or fruits; and vice versa. (2) When the subject is taken for the adjunct, the thing containing for the contents; the possessor for that which he possesses; the object or subject for that with which it is occupied, or which is otherwise conversant about it; the sign for the thing signified. (3) Or, finally, this change of words takes place on account of some other union, whether logical, psychological, or natural; for example, in the metonymy of the adjunct; ns, the time, for what took place therein; the place, for the thing placed in it; the opinion, for the men who hold it; or when the abstract is put for the concrete name of a subject, in order to denote a person; for example, "O God, thou art my hope, my refuge," &c. Bib. Hermen. pp. 49, 50.

(The reader will find advantage in noting down from the SS, a clear example of each of these tropes; and so, indeed, of all the rules or canons given. Eo.)

so many thousands, showed clearly, as they themselves afterwards understood, that zume was to be understood, not of natural leaven, but tropically, of the doctrines of the Pharisees and Sadducees. We must also apply what is said in express terms by each apostle; by Matthew, at v. 12; by John, at v. 13; from which the tropical sense of the words is completely proved.

4. Finally, we must not neglect the light that history throws on difficult passages.

III. We may now proceed to consider the PROPER INTERPRETATION OF TROPE, and inquire,

1. How to discover the sense in which the author intended them to be understood.

(1) There can be no doubt in those cases where the intention is laid open by an explanation afforded by the speaker or writer; as Mat. 23:27, explained by v. 28. So Paul, in his valedictory address to the rulers of the church at Ephesus, shows, in the proper and tropical terms he alternately uses, that, by flock, he means the church of Christ, the associated body of Christians; and therefore it follows, that the verb poimainein must be interpreted to rule, to direct, to provide for their spiritual safety; and the grievous wolves, by the express interpretation of the apostle himself (v. 30), mean false teachers, who should introduce false doctrines into the church.

(2) Finally, to produce, also, one instance of what some interpreters consider to be allegory, i. e. a connected series of tropes (so the Germans), or a method (so Morus) of expressing an entire sentiment in such a way as that, instead of the thing meant, something resembling it is expressed. The same apostle (Ep. 6:13-17), in exhorting his readers to constancy and fortitude, so explains 'the whole armor of God,' that each portion of it corresponds to some habit of a truly Christian mind, or some external support against those dangers which threaten destruction to the faith and holiness of the Christian. Comp. 1 Th. 5:3.*

(3) In cases, however, where no explicit interpretation of tropical language is afforded by the author himself, we may sometimes determine the meaning by the help of the contrasted expressions. Thus, in Mat. 7:9, our Savior does not expressly say what he means by a stone, instead of bread, and a serpent, instead of a fish. But at v. 11, he explains bread and fish as meaning, generally, useful, voluntary gifts; hence, from the opposition, the stone and serpent must mean objects either useless or pernicious.

(4) Where there is no explanation, either direct or indirect, we must then have recourse to the context. Sometimes the narrator introduces an observation to explain the language of a discourse which he narrates; of which we have an example in Jn. 7:38,39, where the evangelist himself explains the rivers of water, which should flow from the body of the believer, to mean the gifts of the Holy Spirit, which were to be conspicuous in those who had attained a fuller and more intimate knowledge of Christian doctrine.

(5) Sometimes the sense of a tropical expression may be inferred from the antecedents or consequents. Every reader of our Lord's discourse in Mat. 7:3-4, must have inquired the meaning of the note in thy brother's eye; and of the beam in thine own eye; and of these images no express interpretation is afforded. But if we refer to vs. 1, 2, and consider that the object of the Divine Teacher was evidently to warn men against forming rash or uncharitable judgments of others, it must immediately appear that note is used for the minor faults of others, and beam for greater faults in ourselves. In like manner, if we consider attentively the tropical language of our Savior in Luke 9:62, — no man, having put his hand to the plough, &c., — we must see that it is an answer to the request made at ver. 61 — 'permit me first to bid farewell (rather give orders) to my household'; i. e. arrange my concerns; a great temptation to give up his good intention of following Jesus, and therefore refused. It appears, then, that by the man, who, having put his hand to the plough, looks back, is meant one who, while he ought to be supremely engaged about some one important engagement, allows his attention to be distracted by minor and irrelevant concerns.

(6) We occasionally meet with passages in the N. T., where the context throws no light upon the signification of the figure employed; and, in such cases, the interpretation is certainly more difficult and perplexed. Here we must not neglect the use of really parallel passages, which throw much light on the sense of tropical expressions. Thus, in our Lord's discourse, Mat. 6:22,23, it may be inquired what is figured by the eye, and the light of the body; of which terms no express interpretation is given in the context. But the parallel passage (Lu. 9:34,35), by adding, in the way of explanation, the light that is in thee, shows clearly that by these terms we are to understand human reason, and specifically that innate sense of right and truth which is implanted by God in our hearts.

(7) There is also another class of texts, which, though they cannot be considered as strictly parallel, may still be advantageously used in discovering the sense of tropes. Thus the denunciation of Paul to the high-priest (Ac. 23:3), God will smite (i. e. punish) thee, thou whited wall, may have some light thrown upon it by the text above quoted (Mat. 23:37), where our Savior compares the Pharisees, generally, to whited sepulchers. Hence it appears that the notion intended in both the passages, is that of the worst hypocrisy.† In the same way, Noeselt has shown how the several images in the beautiful parable Jn. 15:1 may be explained by reference to similar passages in the N. T.; to which elucidation it may be sufficient to refer the reader.‡

[8] Under this head the Ed. would mention the assistance to be derived from ascertaining the sense given to similar words and phrases, colloquial or classic, by nations educated in the same or a cognate language; in the times, country or neighborhood of the writer, or in a similar civilization. Lightfoot's copious collections, from the Rabbinic writers; Wetzstein's, from the Greek; and Schultens's, from the Arabic; also Roberts's Illustrations of Scripture, from E. Indian life and phrases, are all, when cautiously used, exceedingly helpful in determining the exact meaning of a proverbial dictum, or colloquial anomaly or idiom, couched in tropical language. For an example, see note, 1 Chr. 29:24. Ed.]

2. The second point of inquiry, in the interpretation of tropical language, is, the similitude existing between the sign and the thing signified.

(1) The principal point and object of comparison may be determined from the interpretation given by the writer or speaker himself. When Jesus (Jn. 6:35) says, 'I am the bread of life,' adding, by way of explanation, 'He that cometh to Me shall never hunger, and he that believeth in Me shall never thirst.' — He plainly indicates that He would make provision for all the spiritual necessities of men; so that whatsoever should be united to Him, by faith and obedience, would enjoy true happiness, together with all necessary safeguards to his salvation, and would neither want nor desire anything else. The point of comparison lies, therefore, in the quality of bread to nourish men, preserve life, and support the sinking strength. Compare, too, 1 Th. 5:2 with Mat. 24:43. Lu. 12:39.

(2) The point of comparison may be deduced from the context of the discourse. Thus, for example, when Peter, in his first epistle (4:12), speaks of the fiery trial by which they are to be tested, and explains these figurative expressions, both generally, by adding (v. 13) that they had come into a participation of Christ's sufferings; and specifically, by adding (v. 14) that they would be reproached for their profession of Christianity, — it is clear, from the adjuncts, that the point of comparison lies in the painful feelings which are common to those whose bodies are affected by extreme heat, and those whose minds are affected by reproach and contempt.

(3) The point of comparison may be determined by the collating of parallel passages. Thus, when Jesus, in his address to the woman who followed him (Lu. 23:31), after denouncing a miserable fate to the city of Jerusalem and its inhabitants, adds, 'For if these things be done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?' it is clear, from Ez. 20:47 and 21:3, — comparing also, for the sense, 1 Pe. 4:17, — that by the green tree is meant an innocent person, the cause of safety to others; and by the dry, a wicked person, the cause of injury to others. And if we examine more carefully the passages of Ez., we shall easily find what is the point of comparison between men and trees — that it lies in their good or bad qualities, as being the cause why they think a dry and barren tree ought to be cut down, and why a worthless and hurtful man is deserving of destruction.

(4) By the assistance of these rules, we may generally determine what is the proper object signified by a tropical expression, and what is the nature and degree of resemblance between the sign and the thing signified. A few passages, however, are to be found in the N. T., which admit of various interpretations, as, for example, the much-disputed passage Mk. 9:19,50. Nor does the cause of comparison always lie upon the surface; on the contrary, it sometimes requires very careful examination. As an instance, we may take Ja. 1:18, where we read that 'God of his own will begat us by the word of truth, that we should be the first-fruits [ἀρχαῖν] of his creatures.' Almost all the interpreters agree that the reference is to the first-fruits, which were solemnly offered to God in sacrifice. But they differ as to whether the simile, τές ὄφαρες, is to be referred to the superiority of those who had been reformed by the reception of Christianity, so as to make the sense, 'that we might be rendered the most excellent among his creatures'; or whether the comparison is derived from this, that the first-fruits were a pledge and earnest of the future harvest, limiting the reference to the time of the conversion of those to whom the epistle was written, so as to make the sense, 'that we might be the first in order of time among those whom God hath begotten by the preaching of the gospel.' The latter interpretation is to be preferred; for James appears to refer to the Jewish Christians, who had come to the knowledge and profession of Christianity before the Gentiles. Comp. Ro. 16:5. I Co. 16:15.||

IV. It is hoped that attention to these rules may lead the student into such a habit of investigation as will relieve him from at least the most formidable difficulties in the detection and interpretation of tropical language.

I. There has been much and able controversy respecting the nature of the Hebrew poetry. The laborious investigations of Carpzov and Lowth were deemed to have put an end to the dispute; but it has been again revived by Herder, Geseains, De Wette, and other German critics, who have

Heb. poetry. The poets avail themselves of uncommon, antiquated, difficult words, forms and phrases, and allow themselves many poetical licenses, which lead us to the conclusion that they were under a metrical constraint, without which we cannot explain these appearances.³ This argument is particularly dwelt upon by Lowth.* But De Wette thinks that these peculiarities of the poetical language were something more than the offspring of necessity. They are sometimes evidently chosen for the sake of their antiquity, of their solemnity, and of their elegance; sometimes they seem to have sprung forth unconsciously in the fire of inspiration, in the bold flight of thought, and in the struggle with language. The only certain indication from which Lowth justly draws the conclusion that there must have been something like a rhythmical division and measure of the Hebrew poetry, is the alphabetical arrangement found in a few of the psalms and some other poetical pieces. Here we observe a regular periodical cadence and return, somewhat resembling strophes or verses; but it is, nevertheless, questionable, whether they are real strophes or verses. De Wette agrees with Michaelis in thinking that, if there were a Heb. metre, the vestiges and proofs, if not the very laws of it, might be discovered. There are some very strong proofs, according to this writer, of the genuineness of the Heb. punctuation; among others, its peculiarity—a circumstance which distinguishes it from the other Semitic dialects, especially the Arabic, with which learned rabbins were well acquainted, and which would doubtless have been imitated in the Heb. punctuation, were it of a spurious character. But according to the present Heb. punctuation, there is no metre in the poetry of the O. T., nor so much as a numbering of syllables, as may be clearly seen in the alphabetical poems, where the several verses are of unequal length. Comp. Ps. 251, 2, 5, with vs. 4, 18, 19. According to the systema morarum, which makes all the syllables long and perfectly equal, without any rhythmical alternation of long and short, a versification by syllabic quantity would be impossible.⁴ Yet this pronunciation would admit, at least, of the numbering of syllables, and consequently of a metre, such as the French and other nations possess; rhyme is also possible by means of the accent, as in the English and German languages, which is the theory of Bellermann. According to the modern system of Hebrew prosody, which is founded on the systema morarum, the letters with sheva movable, and its compounds, form short syllables, giving rise to a certain alternation of long and short; which, however, is very trifling, inasmuch as two short syllables never appear in immediate succession, so that there can be no pyrrhies, anapests, or triple time feet of any sort.⁵ It would be more conformable to the analogy of the Greek and Arabic prosody to use the pure syllables with the long vowels as short; but then we should be at a loss to know how to dispose of the shevas; for the common prosody rejects semi-short syllables; and if we chose to join them with the entire syllables, it would produce too harsh an effect. Make the experiment in whatever way we please, we find no versification in the Heb. poetry, and never shall find any. This is evident even from the measurement of the eye. The several verses are often unequal, out of all proportion, one short, another long, without any regularity. But this would not be so, if they were formed upon the quantity and number of the syllables, and arranged according to a periodical rule. We have only to look at English verse, or that of any other language, and see if it does not exhibit a certain proportion even to the eye.⁶ The same would be the case, if we supposed the pronunciation to be entirely different; the periodical return of the rhythm would necessarily betray itself; especially as the Arabic, or any other Semitic pronunciation which we may suppose, is not so very different from the Heb. that we might not form some sort of conjecture, at least, respecting the rhythm grounded upon it.

6. The opinion of De Wette, respecting the rhythm of the Heb. poetry, coincides with the second class of opinions exhibited above; and differs in no respect from that of the learned Jewish rabbins and of Herder. This opinion, moreover, seems to be the one which generally prevails, yet without being sufficiently understood. At least, as De Wette observes, it seems not to be allowed that the parallelism of numbers constitutes a real rhythmical form, or else it is one for which there is no taste. The following are the learned professor's remarks on this topic:—

(1) The Heb. poetry is of two kinds, the lyric and the epic. Under the first division is embraced all poetry which is produced under a strong emotion and excitement of the subject or person who speaks; whence it may be called also impassioned or subjective poetry: the title of objective poetry would be applicable to the latter, inasmuch as its character consists in the calm description of an object. The former includes, amongst the Hebrews, three subordinate kinds—the didactic, the lyric (properly so called), and the rhetorical (prophetic); for among the Hebrews these kinds of poetry are nearly related. Didactic poetry, it is true, must have somewhat of an objective character; but among the Hebrews, who had as yet no artificial or scientific culture, reflection was always connected with inspiration, and was therefore lyric, in the same manner as, in all antiquity, the man of wisdom was at the same time musician, poet, and inspired. Besides, eloquence most sometimes aims at being objective, because it very often seeks to operate upon the understanding; but here, also, every thing lay under the dominion of feeling and of inspiration. In short, would the Hebrew impart instruction, or give expression to his feelings; would he warn, censure, or reprove,—he always spoke as a lyric poet, in the fervor of inspiration. Now, it is this lyric poetry of the Hebrews which has a rhythmical form; the epic adopts the prosaic style. De Wette accounts for this phenomenon in the following manner:—In an excited state of mind, in strong emotion and inspiration, it is natural for the speaker to elevate his voice and his language above the ordinary tone and style; the breast heaves; the inflections of the voice become more marked; the words are accompanied with more expressive accents; the movement of the discourse is more measured and lofty; in a word, the discourse approaches to song; nay, the inclination soon becomes strong actually to sing. Hence a regular, rhythmical structure of language will present itself first and chiefly in lyric poetry. But in narrative discourse the case is different. As the narrator expresses not his own thoughts and feelings, but is occupied with the description of his object, i.e. of the thoughts, feelings, and actions of another, with which he must also allow himself to be affected only so far as may be necessary to impart life to the narration; as he is obliged to place a curb, as it were, upon his own thoughts and feelings, that they may not encroach too much upon the narrative, and detract from the clear perception of the object,—repose will be the character of his style, and he will therefore preserve the ordinary quiet flow of discourse. And thus the style of narrative among the Hebrews always remained free and unadorned. In lyric poetry, on the contrary, the diction was ennobled by a certain rhythmical form. Just so the lyric poems of the Greeks are distinguished by a highly-wrought and complicated style of verification from the simple derived from experience, or from the theory of the poetic art? The example of the majority of ancient and modern languages, in favor of it. Not only the Greeks and the modern nations, but also the Indians and Celts, possess versification. But with the Heb. poetry is distinguished by such remarkable peculiarities, that it may well form an exception; to which might be added the Samaritan and Ethiopic languages, which actually have no syllabic metre, but only a metre of lines. From the theory of the poetic art the following principle only could be derived; viz. that poetry aims to give more form and harmony to language than prose; but respecting the kind of form, it prescribes no law. As to this, every thing depends on the character of the poetry. Goethe has dismissed the shackles of verse in his boldest flights, and contented himself with a freer harmony. Indeed, there is something more sublime in the absence of form than in a strict adherence to it; and as sublimity is the character of the Heb. poetry, the absence of versification in it may be considered as extremely natural.

(2) Jones, Bauer,* and others, adduce the example of the modern oriental languages, particularly of the Arabic and Persian, in proof of the existence of a Heb. metre. But with all the etymological affinity of the Semitic dialects, there is a very great diversity in their pronunciation, style, &c., and the Persian language is not related to the Heb. at all. The serious sacred poetry of the Hebrews presents a very strong contrast, both in spirit and matter, when compared with the modern oriental; and it may therefore possess also a different and peculiar external form. The Arabic poetry has no parallelism of numbers; neither has the Heb. rhyme, like the Arabic: as little as they agree in these particulars, so little is it possible to draw any conclusion from the prosody of the one in favor of a similar form of the other. Besides, the age of the Arabic and Persian metre is very questionable. Jones, it is true, calls it extremely ancient.⁷ But, as he remarks himself, the earliest writer on metre, Ferachid, lived as late as the 2d century of the Hegira. In fact, Pococke⁸ regards the Arabic metre as a comparatively late invention, and appeals for proof to the testimony of Arabian authors, of Alsephud, and of Jabalodin. Eichhorn⁹ is of the same opinion, particularly on the ground that the Arabic poetry depends on the numeration.

(3) 'The Heb. poetry was often sung, which could not be the case unless it possessed metre.' Thus Carpzov, Sonnag, and others. But a metre is necessary, in order that poetry may be sung, only in case the melody is repeated; but if it continues along, the words, though without metre, may be adapted to it at pleasure. Whether the Hebrews had returning melodies, is a question we cannot decide. Probably they had not. It is just conjecture, that the Hebrew singing consisted simply in cantillation; i.e. in a sort of declamation analogous to song; but this depends not at all upon the number and measure of the words. It is indeed a question whether the tet, i.e. a regular rising and falling of the voice, in the strict sense, at least as we understand it, belonged to the Hebrew music. Speidel¹⁰ considers the tart as a comparatively recent invention, unknown to the age of David. Finally, if the Hebrews actually possessed a knowledge of tact, and of returning melodies, still they might shorten or prolong at will the words of unequal length, much in the same way as is done amongst the Germans, in the ruder sort of popular songs; for instance, in the witch's song —

Wir flegen über land und meer,
Wie das wind durch die weite, weite welt einfließt.
We fly over land and sea,
Like the wind, through the wide, wide world feathly and free.

* Lect. iii.

† Many verses have hemistiches of an equal number of syllables, particularly in Job, and I.a., ch. 3.

‡ For instance, each syllable, whether mixed or pure, has three mora; one mora is given to the short vowel, and to each consonant, and two to the long vowel; but two consonants before the vowel constitute also but one mora.

§ Comp. Buxtorf. Thes. Gram. p. 631, seq.

|| An artificial and very complex versification, like that of Pindar, where this would not be the case, is not once to be thought of, in speaking of the Heb. poetry; for such consummate versification belongs to a higher state of culture than existed among the Hebrews. Besides, the division of the vs., as ascertained in the alphabetic poems, decides against such higher versification.

¶ It evidently arose from a limited notion of rhythm, that none but the Book of Psalms, Proverbs, and Job, were denominated rhythmical, and received the poetic accents.

hexameter, which even among this people approaches nearer to the language of common discourse. The poetical and musical talent of the Greeks led them thus to reduce even the narrative poetry to the forms of rhythm and music — a thing which the artless Hebrews neglected to do, because it was only in the lofty mood of lyric poetry they experienced that sort of impulse which leads to the forms of art.

(2) The question now arises, What is this rhythmical form of the Heb. poetry? Rhythm is a rule of any sort in discourse, a law which aims to reduce its various and resisting elements to unity and harmony. These various elements of discourse consist of the different modifications of its movement; i. e., of the different accentuation, quantity, inflection, union, and separation of words, and of the different divisions or members of the period. These modifications are of two kinds, giving rise to two distinct branches of the rhythmical art, whose object it is simply to raise what is natural and lawless to the sphere of art and rule. The human voice has this peculiarity, that it is subject to continual alterations and change; it never remains for two successive moments on the same key, and of the same strength — it may continue on the same key, but the strength, accent, with which it is exerted, will differ. Its movement is wave-like, its alternation like that of lights and shades. This alternation is different in different languages, less distinct in some than in others: in English and German, it is indicated by the accent. This is the stamp, so to speak, which introduces lights and shades into language. Now, when this alternation, which in common discourse is left to itself, is subjected to a uniform rule, it gives rise to syllabic measure; the law of which is the arsis and thesis, or the tet; i. e., a regular rising and falling of the voice. But besides these smaller divisions of discourse, there are others still greater, which arise from the necessity of recovering the breath, and from the winding off of the thought, and which in prose are designated to a certain extent by the punctuation. These also, are reduced to regular form by the rhythmical art, giving rise to verses and strophes. The art of versification is complete which combines these two sorts of members into a well-organized whole; but there may also be one which is incomplete, defective in certain respects. There may be a rhythm which consists simply in the regular harmonious structure of the smaller members; and there is such a one, which the Latins call numeris, and to which we give the name of rhythmical prose. In this, the laws of the arsis and thesis will be observed with greater uniformity than in an uncivilized style, though there will be more freedom and latitude than, in verse and particular attention will be paid to the cadence at the end. The dithyrambic verse, also, of the Greeks, belongs to this species of rhythm: each single verse forms by itself a short, metrically-arranged whole; but the several verses are not arranged again into strophes. Here there is more arrangement than in rhythmical prose, but only in details; whence there arises a chaos, as it were, of small rhythmical wholes. On the other hand, there may also be a rhythm in which the order of the smaller numbers is neglected, and the attention is exclusively bestowed upon the regular distribution of the greater ones. Such is the rhyme in the naocritical or ruder kinds of verse, like what is found in the popular poetry of the German master singers, &c. Here the larger sections of discourse are marked off by the rhyme, and a certain periodical rule for the ear is furnished by this similarity of sound in the concluding words. That poetry in which the rhyme falls anywhere else except upon the concluding word of a sentence, or member of a period, is the product of a more recent and artificial culture. An illustration of these two kinds of rhythm may be drawn from the art of dancing. The perfect rhythm is that which combines an elaborate finish of the step — which answers to the metrical foot — with a skillful arrangement of the general motions, the figures, which answer to the verses and strophes. But as there may be a dance, consisting simply of artificial steps, without any combination into figures and a whole, — this answers to rhythmical prose, — so also we may conceive of one in which the several steps are left entirely to nature and chance, and the only thing aimed at is an agreeable arrangement of the motions at large. This answers to the second species of unmetrical rhythm.

(3) To this last kind belongs the Heb. rhythm; viz. the parallelism of members. This is nothing more nor less than a rhythmical proportion, and that of the simplest sort, between the larger sections or members of a period, the smaller being neglected. Nothing is more simple than the symmetry, the proportion between two parts of a whole — the proportion between several begins to require more ingenuity and calculation. Thus the relation between parallel lines is the simplest that we can conceive to exist between different lines; the triangle, the square, already begin to be more complex, and the circle is the most perfect of all figures. It might also be remarked, that every period consisting of two propositions, forms a whole, and suffices for a full expression of the voice and satisfying of the ear, while a single proposition is insufficient for either. The breast is still elevated, the ear continues to listen, and yet there is nothing more to be said, nothing more to be heard. In fact, the parallelism of members seems to be a fundamental law of rhythm. It obviously lies at the foundation of the rhyme, where one verse is made to answer to the other. The more complicated forms of rhyme in the stanza, sonnet, &c., were invented at a comparatively later period; at least, the ottava rime and the sonnet naturally fall into two divisions, each answering to the other. In like manner, the relation of the hexameter and pentameter is that of parallelism; and even the lyric strophes admit, perhaps, of being referred to the same form. The relation of the strophe, antistrophe, and epode, on the contrary, already indicates the transposition of the parallelism to the more perfect form of the triangle. The rhythm of the Hebrews belonged more to the thought than to the outward form and sound: they indicated their rhythmical divisions by the divisions of the thought, and the proportion of the rhythmical propositions by that of the subject-matter.

7. In these rhythmical divisions, or parallelisms of members,

(1) There will sometimes be an equality of syllables or words, and a certain resemblance of sound. This we may call the original, perfect kind of parallelism of members, which coincides with metre and rhyme. Such is that in which the Song of Lamech is composed, Gen. 4:23,21. The translation can present nothing more than the equality in the number and position of the words in the rhyme must be omitted.

Adah and Zilluk, hear my voice!
Wives of Lamech, receive my speech;
If I slew a man to my wounding,
And a young man to my hurt:
If Cain was avenged seven times,
Then Lamech — seventy times seven.

Here all is nearly equal, except the place marked with a dash, where the words must be supplied from the preceding member. Similar examples of rhyme occur in Ps. 3:5, 23:1, 85:11, 106:5. Equality in the number of words, together with exact proportion of thought, is a case of frequent occurrence in Job; e. g. 6:5 —

Both the wild ass bray over his grass;
Both the ox low over his folder?

Comp. 6:23, 8:1. In Ps. 20:9, we have an example of equality in words with antithesis of thought —

They stumble and fall,
But we stand and are erect.

Comp. Is. 65:13.

(2) But this external proportion of words is not essential to the parallelism of members: great inequality sometimes prevails in the different lines; e. g. Ps. 63:32 —

*Ye kings of the earth, sing to God;
Harp to the Lord!*

So in Ps. 91:7,

Though a thousand fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand,
There it shall not touch.

In this, as in many other cases, there is a complex proposition in the first line, and only a simple one in the second. However unequal the words in the two members of the parallelism may be, the proportion remains the same, because it consists not in the number of the words, or in the extent of the period, but in the thoughts.⁴

3. As exponents of the rhythmical relation — as a kind of rhythmical notes — the accents may be employed. It is well known that they serve, at the same time, as marks of the tone, of the punctuation, and of the mode of delivery. They indicate the syllable which is to be distinguished from the others by a greater elevation of the voice (i. e. which has the tone), and at the same time point out the relation which one word has to another in respect to the rising and falling of the voice, whether or not the word stands in a longer or shorter pause of the discourse. The first law of the accentuation is the sense, and accordingly it may be compared to our system of punctuation. Next it follows the mode of delivery, or the enunciation. Since now the sense and the rhythm in Heb. poetry usually coincide, and the elocution answers to the rhythm where the sense does not, it follows that, with few exceptions, the accentuation may be used as an index to the rhythm; only the system enters into such minute details, and is encumbered with such a multitude of signs, that a great deal of it is of no use for the purposes of rhythm. All that is of service here, are the more important relations indicated by the great disjunctive accents; the smaller belong to grammar and elocution: we can therefore dispense with the host of conjunctive accents, and also with many of the sub-disjunctives; the principal disjunctives only, which mark the greater sections, are of any important service to rhythm. Silluk with Seph. Pasuk denotes the close of the full rhythmical period, or the strophe, commonly called the verse: Athnach in prose, and in poetry Merka Mahpach, and in its absence the former also, divide the strophes into two halves — into the parallel members: subdivisions are made by Segolta, Zakeph, Katon, Rebia, and Tipheha in prose; and in poetry by Athnach, when Merka Mahpach precedes, and by Rebia; by the last, however, not always; it is often placed merely for the purpose of elocution, especially in the second member before Silluk, in order to sustain the cadence.

9. That the accents are musical notes seems to be intimated by one of their names, Neginoth; the fact, too, is attested by the traditions of the Jews, found in the Talmud; and the Jews of the present day actually employ them as musical signs. The Torah is sung or cantillated by them in their synagogues. The mode of cantillation differs in different places; but in no case is it any thing more than a sort of declamation approaching to song, similar to the intonation of our liturgical forms. There is good reason to believe that the ancient Heb. singing or cantillation was of the same description.⁵

11. The next thing that claims our attention is the character of the poetic imagery employed by the sacred writers, and the sources whence it is derived. It has been shown, that it is only in as far as these are known that the immediate design and propriety of various references and illustrations in their compositions can be perceived and appreciated. If we be accustomed to habits of life totally different from those of the authors and immediate readers of the Bible, and be conversant only with different kinds of objects, it is evident that many descriptions and sentiments that were magnificently expressed and strikingly illustrated by them, will appear to us mean and obscure, harsh and unnatural. Hence, as Bp. Lowth has remarked, in his immortal lectures on the Heb. poetry, it is not enough to be acquainted with the language of the Hebrews, their manners, discipline, rites, and ceremonies; we must even investigate their inmost sentiments, the manner and connection of their thoughts; in one word, we must see all things with their eyes, estimate all things by their opinions; we must endeavor, as much as possible, to read Hebrew as the Hebrews would have read it. This learned writer and tasteful critic has arranged the sources of poetic imagery in the sacred writings in four classes; to one or other of which all such images or pictures of external objects as present themselves to us in these writings may be conveniently referred, (1) Natural objects; (2) The manners, arts, and circumstances of common life; (3) Things sacred; (4) The more remarkable facts recorded in sacred history. The selection and illustration of a few specimens from each of these departments will occupy the remainder of this section.

1. IMAGES LEDUCED FROM NATURAL OBJECTS.

In borrowing imagery from NATURAL OBJECTS, the Heb. poets have selected such as were well known and familiar to their hearers and readers. On this, indeed, the perspicuity of figurative language will be found, in a great measure, to depend; for a principal use of metaphors is to illustrate the subject by a tacit comparison; but if, instead of familiar ideas, an author introduces such as are new, and not perfectly understood; if he endeavor to demonstrate what is plain by what is occult, instead of making a subject clearer, he renders it more perplexed and difficult. Were it not for the uncommon accuracy of the sacred writers in this respect, we should now be scarcely able to comprehend a single word of their productions.

2. In the next place, it is to be remarked, that the Hebrews not only deduce their metaphors from familiar or well-known objects, but that they preserve one constant track and manner in the use and accommodation of them to their subject. The parabolic may, indeed, be accounted a peculiar style, in which things moral, political, and divine, are marked and represented by comparisons implied or expressed, and adopted from sensible objects. As in common and plain language, therefore, certain words serve for signs of certain ideas; so, for the most part, in the parabolic style, certain natural images serve to illustrate certain ideas more abstruse and refined. At least, we may affirm that the sacred poets, in illustrating the same subject, make a much more constant use of the same imagery than other poets do; and this has a surprising effect in preserving perspicuity.

3. It must be observed, in the last place, that the Hebrews employ, more freely and more daringly, that imagery in particular, which is borrowed from the most obvious and familiar objects, and the figurative effect of which is established and defined by general and constant use. This, as it renders a composition clear and luminous, even where there is the greatest danger of obscurity, so it shelters effectually the sacred poets from the imputation of exuberance, harshness, or bombast.

4. These remarks may be confirmed and illustrated by two or three examples. The images of light and darkness are commonly made use of, in all languages, to imply or denote prosperity and adversity, agreeably to the common sense and perception which all men have of the objects themselves. But the Hebrews employ these metaphors more frequently and with less variation than other people; indeed, they seldom refrain from them whenever the subject requires, or will even admit of their introduction. These expressions, therefore, may be accounted among those forms of speech, which, in the parabolic style, are established and defined, since they exhibit the most noted and familiar images; and the application of them on this occasion is justified by an acknowledged analogy, and approved by constant and unvarying custom. In the use of images so conspicuous and so familiar, among the Hebrews, a degree of boldness is excusable. The Latins introduce them more sparingly, and therefore are more cautious in applying them. The most respectable of the Roman muses have scarcely any thing more elegant or bold than the following from Horace:—

Restore, great chief, thy country's light;
Dispel the dreary shades of night;
Thy aspect, like the spring, shall cheer,
And brighter suns shall gild the year.

5. But the Hebrews, upon a subject more sublime, indeed, in itself, and illustrating it by an idea which was more habitual to them, more daringly exalt their strains, and give a loose rein to the spirit of poetry. They display, for instance, not the image of the spring, or aurora, of the dreary night, but the sun and stars as rising with increased splendor in a new creation, or again involved in chaos and primeval darkness. Does the sacred bard promise to his people a renewal of the divine favor, and a recommendation of universal prosperity? In what magnificent colors does he depict it! Such, indeed, as no translation can illustrate, but such as none can obscure.

The light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun,
And the light of the sun shall be seven-fold.
Is. 30:26.

But even this is not sufficient.

No longer shalt thou have the sun for thy light
by day:
Nor by night shall the brightness of the moon enlightened thee:

For JEHOVAH shall be to thee an everlasting light,
And thy God shall be thy glory.
Thy sun shall no more decline;
Neither shall thy moon wane;
For JEHOVAH shall be thine everlasting light;
And the days of thy mourning shall cease.

Is. 60:20.

In another place (24:23), he has admirably diversified the same sentiment.—On the other hand, denouncing vain against the proud king of Egypt, Ezekiel (32:7,8) says:

And when I shall put thee out, I will cover the heavens,
And the stars thereof will I make dark;
I will involve the sun in a cloud;
Nor shall the moon give out her light.
All the bright lights of heaven will I make dark over thee,
And I will set darkness upon the land, saith the Lord JEHOVAH.

These expressions are bold and daring; but the imagery is well known, its use common, the signification definite; they are, therefore, perspicuous, clear, and truly magnificent.

6. We must not omit those images derived from rivers, and fountains, and the earth re-created with rain, which are indeed used by other poets, but more frequently by the orientals, to whom nothing was more grateful; for the scarcity of water, the paucity of showers, and the extreme heat of the summer, together with the wonderful fertility of the soil, rendered these comparisons more elegant and forcible in the East than with us. In spring and summer, if the east wind continue to blow a few days, the fields are in general so parched that scarcely a blade of any thing green remains; many rivers and streams are dried up, the others are rendered briny, and all nature seems at the point of dissolution. After a plentiful shower, however, the fields suddenly revive beyond all expectation, the rivers resume their course, and the springs pour forth more delicious water; the whole face of nature is in 'a few hours'† changed; which introduces much higher ideas of refreshment and pleasure than the like causes can suggest to us. Hence, to represent distress, such frequent allusions among them to 'a dry and thirsty land, where no water is'; and hence, to describe a change from distress to prosperity, their metaphors are founded on the falling of showers, and the bursting out of springs in the desert. Thus Is. 35:1,6,7. Many commentators have attempted to explain this frequent image of the prophets with more exactness than a poetical idea will bear; taking what the prophet meant figuratively, sometimes in a literal sense; and at other times, explaining every thing in a mystical manner, and pretending to define what is meant by the water, who the thirsty, and so on; intermingling many pious reflections, but utterly foreign to the subject, and such as never entered the mind of the poet. For it certainly was not his intention to write enigmas, but to illustrate and adorn the beautiful figure he introduces.

7. The numerous figures derived by the sacred writers from the mountains of Palestine must be familiar to every reader of the Bible. Lebanon and Carmel, the one remarkable as well for its height as for its appearance of age, its magnitude, and the abundance of the cedars on its top, exhibiting a striking and substantial appearance of strength and beautiful majesty; the other, rich and fruitful, abounding with vines, olives, and delicious fruits, in a most flourishing state, both by nature and cultivation, and displaying a delightful appearance of fertility, beauty, and grace;—these two mountains are the most celebrated in the sacred poetry, and furnish the most apt comparisons, and the most beautiful metaphors. See Cant. 5: 15, 7:5. Is. 33:9. 35:2. 37:1. Jer. 22:6,23. Zeb. 11:1. Is. 10:31. 11:13. Jer. 42:6. Mi. 7:14.

8. In the images of the awful and terrible, with which the sacred poets abound, they plainly drew their descriptions from that violence of the elements, and those concussions of nature, with which their climate rendered them acquainted. Earthquakes were not infrequent; and they were sometimes accompanied by land-slips, in which pieces of ground, lying on a declivity, are removed from their place. To these the Psalmist alludes, when he speaks of the 'mountains being carried into the midst of the sea' (Ps. 46:2); of their 'skipping like lambs, and the hills like young sheep' (Ps. 111:4,6); and Isaiah (21:20) describes with great majesty a scene of this description, when

The earth reeleth to and fro, like a drunkard;
And moveth this way and that, like a lodge for the night.

Tornadoes or whirlwinds, and darkness, followed by thunder, lightning, and rain, or hail, were also very frequent during the winter and cold season in Judea and Arabia, and far exceeded any thing of that sort which happens in more temperate regions. From these phenomena the sacred writers have borrowed many very expressive figures and allusions. Mr. Morier, describing the whirlwinds of Persia, says that they swept along the country, in different directions, in a manner truly terrific. 'They carried away, in their vortex, sand, branches, and the stubble of the fields, and really appeared to make a communication between the earth and the clouds.' The correctness of the imagery used by the prophet Isaiah, when he alludes to this phenomenon, is very striking—'The whirlwind shall take them away as stubble' (Is. 40:21); 'Chased as the chaff of the mountains before the wind, and like a rolling thing before the whirlwind' (Is. 17:13). In the Psalms (83:13), we read, 'Make them like a wheel; as the stubble before the wind,' which is happily illustrated by the rotatory motion of the whirlwind, that frequently impels a bit of stubble over a waste secret place; his pavilion round about him were dark waters and thick clouds of the sky; when hailstones and fiery meteors were his voice; and when, at his rebuke, the channels of the waters were seen, and the foundations of the hills discovered; — though there may be some reference to the lassitude of God's descent upon Sinai, yet it seems more probable that the figures were taken directly from those evanescences of nature with which the author was acquainted, and which suggested stronger and nobler images than what now occur to us.

9. In a word, we may generally remark upon this head, that all poetry, and particularly that of the Hebrews, deduces its principal ornaments, or imagery, from natural objects; and, since these images are formed in the mind of each writer, and expressed conformably to what occurs to his senses, it cannot otherwise happen, but that, through diversity of situation, some will be more familiar, some almost peculiar, to certain nations; and even those which seem most general will always have some latent connection with their immediate origin and with their native soil. It is the first duty of a critic, therefore, to remark, as far as is possible, the situation and habits of the author, the natural history of his country, and the scene of the poem. Unless we continually attend to these points, we shall scarcely be able to judge, with any degree of certainty, concerning the elegance or propriety of the sentiments: the plainest will sometimes escape our observation; the peculiar and interior excellences will remain totally concealed.

2. Images from the MANNERS, ARTS, and CIRCUMSTANCES of COMMON LIFE.

The whole common and method of common or domestic life among the Hebrews of the more ancient times, was simple and uniform in the greatest degree. There existed not that variety of studies and pursuits, of arts, conditions, and employments, which may be observed amongst other nations, who boast of superior civilization; and rightly, indeed, if luxury, levity, and pride, be the criterions of it. All enjoyed the same equal liberty; all of them, as being the offspring of the same ancient stock, boasted an equality of lineage and rank; there were no empty titles, no ensigns of false glory; scarcely any distinction or precedence but that which resulted from superior virtue or conduct, from the dignity of age and experience, or from services rendered to their country. Separated from the rest of mankind by their religion and laws, and not at all addicted to commerce, they were contented with those arts which were necessary to a simple and unenlightened (or rather incorrupted) state of life. Thus their principal employments were agriculture and the care of cattle; they were a nation of husbandmen and sheep-herds. The lands had been originally parcelled out to the different families; the portions of which (by the laws of the country) could not be alienated by sale, and therefore descended to their posterity without diminution. The fruits of the earth, the produce of his land and labor, constituted the wealth of each individual. Not even the greatest among them deemed it mean and disgraceful to be employed in the lowest offices of rural labor. In the Scripture history, therefore, we read of eminent persons called to the highest and most sacred offices — heroes, kings, and prophets — from the plough and from the stalls. See Jud. 3:31, Gile. 1:8, 9:3, 11:5, 2:8, 7:8, Ps. 78:72, 73, 1 K. 19:1, 9:20, Am. 1:1, 7:14, 15. We cannot, then, reasonably be surprised to find the Hebrew writers deriving most of their metaphors from those arts particularly, in which they were educated from their earliest years. [Thus our Savior Himself said, and now says, to his followers, "Put not thy hand to the plough and look back;" to indicate the singleness of heart, and earnestness of purpose, requisite in the Christian's progress. Comp. ent. 1 S. 13:50.] We are not to wonder that those objects which were most familiar to their senses afforded the prin-pal ornaments of their poetry; especially since they furnished so various and so elegant an assortment of materials, that not only the beautiful, but the grand and magnificent, might be collected from them. If any person of more nicety than judgment should esteem some of these rustic images grovelling or vulgar, it may be of some use to him to be informed that such an effect can only result from the ignorance of the critic, who, through the medium of his scanty information and peculiar prejudices, presumes to estimate matters of the most remote antiquity. It cannot reasonably be attributed as an error to the sacred poets, who not only give to those ideas all their natural force and dignity, but frequently, by the vivacity and boldness of the figure, exhibit them with additional vigor, ornament, and beauty.

1. It would be a tedious task to instance, particularly, with what embellishments of fiction, derived from one low and trivial object (as it may appear to some), the barn or the threshing-floor, the sacred writers have contrived to add a lustre to the most sublime, and a force to the most important, subjects.

[Thus Israel is to ride a 'threshing-instrument' over the proud enemies of Jehovah, who are to be ground to chaff beneath her as beneath a sharp-wheeled and ponderous wain, and scattered as chaff thrown to the winds upon the side of a breezy mountain! Is. 11:15. Ed.] Thus 'JEROVAYA threshes out the heathen as corn, tramples them under his feet, and disperses them. He delivers the nations to Israel to be beaten in pieces by an indented flail (Isa. 3:12. Jo. 3:14. Is. 21:10), or to be crushed by their brazen hoofs. He scatters his enemies like chaff upon the mountains (Mt. 12:3), and disperses them with the whirlwind of his indignation.' Ps. 63:14,16. Is. 17:13.

2. But we ought not to omit that superbly-magnificent delineation of the divine vengeance, expressed by imagery taken from the wine-press * — an image which very frequently occurs in the sacred poets, but which no other poetry has presumed to introduce. But where shall we find expressions of equal dignity with the original in any modern language? By what art of the pencil can we exhibit even a shadow or an outline of that description in which Isaiah depicts the Messiah as coming to vengeance?

Who is this that cometh from Edom?
With garments deeply dyed from Bozra?
This that is magnificent in his apparel;
Marching on in the greatness of his strength?

I, who publish righteousness, and am mighty to save;

Wherefore is thine apparel red,
And thy garments as one that treadeth the wine-vat?

I have trodden the vat alone;

And of the people there was not a man with me,

And I trod them in mine anger;

And I trampled on them in mine indignation;

And their life-blood was sprinkled upon my garments;

And I have stained all my apparel, — Isa. 63:1-3.

3. But the instances are innumerable which might be quoted of metaphors taken from the manners and customs of the Hebrews. One general remark, however, may be made upon this subject; namely, that from one simple, regular, and natural mode of life having prevailed among them, it has arisen, that in their poetry these metaphors have less of obscurity, of meanness, or depression, than could be expected, when we consider the antiquity of their writings, the distance of the scene, and the uncommon boldness and vivacity of their rhetoric. Indeed, to have made use of the boldest imagery with the most perfect perspicuity, and the most common and familiar with the greatest dignity, is a commendation almost peculiar to the sacred poets. Of this, Prof. Lowth produces (from 2 K. 21:13) the following example, in which the meanness of the image is fully equalled by the plainness and inelegance of the expression; and yet such is its consistency, and such the propriety of its application, that we do not scruple to pronounce it sublime. The Almighty threatens the ultimate destruction of Jerusalem in these terms: —

And I will wipe Jerusalem,

As a man wipeth a dish;

He wipeth it, and turneth it upside down.

3. The poetic imagery derived from selected topics must, from the peculiar character of the Jewish economy, be less familiar to other nations, and involve more difficulties with reference to ourselves, than the imagery derived from either of the other sources which we have noticed.

1. The religion of the Hebrews embraced a very extensive circle of divine and human economy. It not only included all that regarded the worship of God — it extended even to the regulation of the commonwealth, the ratification of the laws, the forms and administration of justice, and nearly all the relations of civil and domestic life. With them almost every point of conduct was connected, either directly or indirectly, with their religion. Things which were held least in esteem by other nations, bore among them the sanction of divine authority, and had a very close alliance with the more serious concerns of life, and with the sacred ceremonies. On these accounts it happens, in the first place, that abundance of metaphors occur in the Heb. poetry deduced from sacred subjects; and, further, that there is a necessity for the most diligent observation, lest that very connection with the affairs of religion should escape us. For should we be mistaken in so material a point — should we erroneously account as common or profane what is in its nature divine — or should we rank among the mean and the vulgar, sentiments and images which are sacred and sublime — it is incredible how much the strength of the language, and the force and majesty of the ideas, will be destroyed. Nothing in nature, indeed, can be so conducive to the sublime, as those conceptions which are suggested by the contemplation of the greatest of all Beings; and when the angust form of religion presents itself to the mental eye,

A fervent pleasure, and an awe divine,

Seizes the soul, and lifts it to its God.

It follows, therefore, of course, that the dignity of the Heb. poetry must, in some measure, be diminished in our eyes; since not only the connection of the imagery with sacred things must frequently escape our observation, but even when it is most apparent, it can scarcely strike us with that force and vivacity with which it must have penetrated the minds of the Hebrews. The whole system of the Heb. rites is one great and complicated allegory, to the study and observance of which all possible diligence and attention were incessantly dedicated by those who were employed in the sacred offices. On this occupation and study, therefore, all good and considerate men were intent; it constituted all their business, all their amusement; it was their treasure and their hope; on this every care and every thought was employed; and the utmost sanctity and reverence distinguished every part of their conduct which had any relation to it. Much dignity and sublimity must also have resulted from the recollection, which these allusions produced, of the splendor and magnificence of the sacred rites themselves; the force of which, upon the minds of those who had frequent opportunities of observing them, must have been incredible. Such a solemn grandeur attended these rites, especially after the building of Solomon's temple, that, although we are possessed of very accurate descriptions, our imaginations are still utterly unable to embody them. Many allusions, therefore, of this kind, which the Heb. poets found particularly energetic, and highly popular among their countrymen, may possibly appear to us mean and contemptible; since many things which were held by them in the highest veneration, are by us but little regarded, or, perhaps, but little understood.

2. A reference to two or three topics will of themselves suggest a variety of examples, sufficiently illustrative of the subject.—Much of the Jewish law is employed in discriminating between things clean and unclean; in removing or making atonement for things proscribed or polluted; and under these ceremonies, as under a veil or covering, a meaning the most important and sacred is concealed, as would be apparent from the nature of them, even if we had not, besides, other clear and explicit authority for this opinion. Among the rest are certain diseases and infirmities of the body, and some customs evidently in themselves indifferent; these, on a cursory view, seem light and trivial; but when the reasons of them are properly explored, they are found to be of considerable importance. We are not to wonder, therefore, if the sacred poets sometimes have recourse to these topics for imagery, even on the most momentous occasions, when they display the general depravity inherent in the human mind (Is. 61:6), or exprobate the corrupt manners of their own people (La. 18:9,17, 22), or when they deplore the abject state of the virgin, the daughter of Zion, polluted and exposed, Is. 13:6,16, Ez. 35:17. If we consider these metaphors without any reference to the religion of their authors, they will doubtless appear in some degree disgusting and inelegant; if we refer them to their genuine source, to the peculiar rites of the Hebrews, they will be found wanting neither in force nor in dignity. Of the same nature, or at least analogous to them, are those ardent expressions of grief and misery which are poured forth by the royal prophet (who, indeed, in many of those divine compositions, personates a character far more exalted than his own); especially when he complains that he is wasted and consumed with the loathsome disease of sin, and bowed down and depressed with a burden of sin too heavy for human nature to sustain. Ps. 38. On reading these passages, some, who were but little acquainted with the genius of the Heb. poetry, have pretended to inquire into the nature of the disease with which the poet was affected; not less absurdly, than if they had perplexed themselves to discover in what river he was plunged, when he complains that ‘the deep waters had gone over his soul.’

3. But as there are many passages in the Heb. poets which may seem to require a similar defence, so there are, in all probability, many which, although they now appear to abound in beauties and elegances, would yet be thought much more sublime, were they illustrated from those sacred rites to which they allude, and as excellent pictures, viewed in their proper light. To this purpose many instances might be produced from one topic, namely, from the precious and magnificent ornaments of the priests' attire. Such was the gracefulness, such the magnificence, of the sacerdotal vestments, especially those of the high priest; so adapted were they, as Moses says, to the expression of glory and of beauty, that to those who were impressed with an equal opinion of the sanctity of the wearer, nothing could possibly appear more venerable and sublime. To these, therefore, we find frequent allusions in the Hebrew poets, when they have occasion to describe extraordinary beauty or comeliness, or to delineate the perfect form of supreme Majesty. The elegant Isaiah (ch. 61:10) has a most beautiful idea of this kind, when he describes, in his own peculiar manner (that is, most magnificently), the exultation and glory of the church, after its triumphal restoration. Pursuing the allusion, he decorates her with the vestments of salvation, and clothes her in the robe of righteousness. He afterwards compares the church to a bridegroom dressed for the marriage, to which comparison incredib^{ly} dignity is added by the word yekuden, a metaphor plainly taken from the apparel of the priests, the force of which, therefore, no modern language can express. No imagery, indeed, which the Heb. writers could employ, was equally adapted with this to the display of the infinite majesty of God. JEHOVAH is therefore introduced by the Psalmist as ‘clothed with glory and with strength’ (Ps. 139:15); he is ‘girded with power’ (Ps. 139:15); which are the very terms appropriated to the describing of the dress and ornaments of the priests.

aphors, especially; it must not be concealed, that it is scarcely or not at all possible for any translation fully to represent the genuine sense of the sacred poets, and that delicate connection which, for the most part, exists between their poetical imagery, and the peculiar circumstances of their nation. This connection frequently depends, upon the use of certain terms, upon a certain association between words and things which a translation generally perplexes, and very frequently destroys. This, therefore, is not to be preserved in the most literal and accurate version, much less in any poetical translation, or rather imitation, though there are extant some not unsuccessful attempts of this kind. To relish completely all the excellencies of the Heb. literature, the fountains themselves must be approached, the peculiar flavor of which cannot be conveyed by aqueducts, nor indeed by any exertion of modern art.

4. The poetic images the Heb. writers draw from the SACRED HISTORY, differ very materially from those we have already noticed.

1. In this class of images there is scarcely any thing that is difficult or obscure; few of the passages in which they occur will seem to require explanation or defence; all will be at once perspicuous, splendid, and sublime. Sacred History illuminates this class of imagery with its proper light, and renders it scarcely less conspicuous to us than to the Hebrews themselves. There is, indeed, this difference, that to the Hebrews the objects of these allusions were all national and domestic; and the power of them, in moving or delighting the mind, was, of course, proportionably greater; nay, frequently, the very place, the scene of action, certain trees and express tokens of so many miracles lying before their eyes, must have increased the effect. To us, on the other hand, however we may hold these facts in veracoma, or however great and striking they may be in themselves, the distance of time and place must of necessity render them less interesting.

2. The manner in which these metaphors are formed is well deserving of observation, and is, in fact, as follows:—In describing or embellishing illustrious actions, or future events of a melancholic nature, the Hebrew poets are accustomed to introduce allusions to the actions of former times, such as possess a conspicuous place in their history; and thus they illuminate with colors, foreign indeed, but similar, the future by the past, the recent by the antipode, facts less known by others more generally understood. This property seems peculiar to the poetry of the Hebrews; at least, it is but seldom to be met with in that of other nations.

3. One very fruitful topic, in furnishing to the sacred poets these allusions, is the chaos and the creation, which compose the first pages of the sacred history. These are constantly alluded to, as expressive of any remarkable change, whether prosperous or adverse, in the public affairs; of the overthrow or restoration of kingdoms and nations; and are consequently very common in the prophetic poetry, particularly when any unusual degree of boldness is attempted. If the subject be the destruction of the Jewish empire by the Chaldeans, or a strong denunciation of ruin again^t the enemies of Israel, it is depicted in exactly the same colors as if universal nature were about to relapse into the primeval chaos. Thus Jeremiah, in that sublime, and indeed more than poetical vision, in which is represented the impending desolation of Judea—

I beheld the earth, and lo! disorder and confusion; The heavens also, and there was no light; . . . &c.
Jer. 4:23-26.

And on a similar subject, Isaiah (24:11) expresses himself with wondrous force and sublimity—

And he shall stretch over her the line of devastation,
And the plummet of emptiness.

Each prophet not only had in his mind the Mosaic chaos, but actually used the words of the divine historian. The same subjects are amplified and embellished, in Jo. 3:15, 16, Is. 34:4. On the contrary, when Isaiah (51:15, 16) foretells the restoration of the Israelites—

For I am Jehovah thy God;
He who stilleth at once the sea,
Though the waves thereof roar; . . .
And with the shadow of my hand have I covered thee:
To stretch out the heavens, and to lay the foundation of the earth;
And to say unto Zion, Thou art my people.

And v. 3—

He shall console her desolations:
And he shall make her wilderness like Eden;
And her desert like the garden of Jehovah; &c.
In the former of these two last-quoted examples, the universal deluge is exactly delineated, and on similar subjects the same imagery generally occurs. Thus, as the devastation of the Holy Land is frequently represented by the restoration of ancient chaos, so the same event is sometimes expressed (as Is. 24:1, 18-20) in metaphors suggested by the universal deluge—

Behold, Jehovah empheth the land and maketh it waste;
He even turneth it upside down, and scattereth abroad the inhabitant;
For the flood-gates from on high are opened;
And the foundations of the earth tremble.
The land is grievously shaken;
The land is utterly shattered to pieces;
The land is violently moved out of her place;
The land reelth to and fro like a drunkard;
And moveth this way and that, like a lode for a night.

These are great ideas; indeed the human mind cannot easily conceive any thing greater or more sublime.

4. The emigration of the Israelites from Egypt, as it affords materials for many magnificent descriptions, is commonly applied in a metaphorical manner to many events which bear no unapt resemblance to it. Does God promise to his people liberty, assistance, security, and favor? The exodus appears spontaneously to the mind of the poet; the dividing of the sea, the destruction of the enemy, the desert which was safely traversed, and the torrents bursting forth from the rocks, are so many splendid objects that force themselves on his imagination.—Comp. Is. 13:16-19.

5. Of the same kind is the last of these topics which shall be instanced—the descent of Jehovah at the delivery of the Law. When the Almighty is described as coming to execute judgment, to deliver the pious, and to destroy his enemies, or in any manner exerting his divine power upon earth, the description is embellished from that tremendous scene exhibited upon Sinai; there is no imagery more frequently recurring to than this, and none more sublime.

For, behold, Jehovah will go forth from his place; And he will come down, and will tread on the high places of the earth.

And the mountains shall be molten under him; And the valleys shall cleave beneath him; As was before the fire;

As waters poured down a steep place.

Mic. 1:3, 4.

The earth shone and was alarmed,
And I found thongs of the hills rocked with terror;
For the wrath of Jehovah was hot against them.
Before his face a smoke ascended,
And a flame consumed before his presence;
Burning fires were kindled by it.
He bowed the heavens and cleft me down,
And clouds of darkness were beneath his feet.
He rode upon the pinions of the cherubim,
And flew on the wings of the wind.
He concealed himself in a veil of darkness;
A pavilion encompassed him
Of black water, and thick clouds of ether.

Ps. 18:7-11.

III. These examples, though literally translated, and destitute of the harmony of verse, will sufficiently demonstrate the force, the grandeur, and the sublimity of those images, which, when applied to other events, suggest ideas still greater than when described as plain facts by the pen of the historian, in however magnificent terms; for, to the greatness and sublimity of the images that are alluded to, is added the pleasure and admiration which result from the comparison between them and the objects they are brought to illustrate.

IV. It is evident, however, as well from the examples that have been adduced, as from the nature of the thing itself, that this species of metaphor is peculiarly adapted to the prophetic poetry. For some degree of obscurity is the necessary attendant upon prophecy; not that, indeed, which confuses the diction and darkens the style, but that which results from the necessity of repressing a part of the future, and from the impropriety of making a complete revelation of every circumstance connected with the prediction. The event itself, therefore, is often clearly indicated, but the manner and the circumstances are generally involved in obscurity. To this purpose, imagery, such as we have specified, is excellently adapted; for it enables the prophet more forcibly to impress upon the minds of his auditors those parts of his subject which admit of amplification; the force, the splendor, the magnitude, of every incident; and at the same time more completely to conceal, what are proper to be concealed, the order, the mode, and the minute circumstances attending the event.

It is also no less apparent, that in this respect, the sacred poetry bears little or no analogy to that of other nations; since neither history nor fable afforded to the profane writers a sufficient store of this kind of imagery, nor did their subjects in general require that use or application of it.

SECTION XI.

THE INTERPRETATION OF SYMBOLICAL LANGUAGE.*

The Nature of Symbolical Language—Erroneous Notions entertained upon this Topic—Origin and Progressive Improvement of Writing—Picture Writing—Symbols—Language of Signs—Rules for the Interpretation and Application of Symbols.

Having treated of the various means by which an interpreter of the Bible must seek to ascertain the signification of words, and thence the sense of the text, it remains to notice, as distinct branches of interpretation, those which relate to symbols and types. This section will be confined to the interpretation of symbols; types will form the subject of another section.

1. The loose and imperfect notions entertained upon the subject of symbolic language, have induced a very general conviction, that it is necessarily of a vague and indeterminate character; uncertain in its meaning, and subject to no defined principles of interpretation. That such an opinion is erroneous, is demonstrable from the fact, that it is a species of language employed to a very considerable extent in the sacred writings. For, surely, it would be to impeach the divine wisdom, to suppose that God has adopted, as a medium of communicating important truths, that which is extremely liable, from its arbitrary and therefore variable character, to become unintelligible, or to present no certain meaning, after a very short lapse of time. Such is not the nature of symbolic language; for, as Bp. Hurd has remarked, it is reducible to rule, and is constructed on such principles as make it the subject of just criticism and rational interpretation.]

II. But in order to form a just conception of the principles on which this kind of language is constructed, it will be necessary to glance at the probable origin of writing, and then to trace the steps by which it has been brought to its present state of perfection.

1. With this view, let us carry ourselves back in imagination to the infant state of the world, before the use of letters was known, and when the only established mode of communication between man and man was that of vocal language. In such a state of society, how may we rationally suppose that one person would proceed to inform another of any circumstance connected with a particular object? The reply is obvious. If the object were in sight, he would direct attention towards it, and point out the particulars upon which he desired to communicate information; if the object were not in sight, nor readily accessible, he would sketch a rude drawing of it, and substitute that for the object itself. In this manner, the idea of a man, a horse, a house, or a tree, might, as single objects, be as distinctly communicated as by alphabetic characters; † while two or more houses might be made significant of a town, and two or more trees of a wood. By thus continuing to copy, in successive series, such things or objects of common notoriety as the train of ideas might call for, a kind of connected narrative of passing events might be drawn up, which, though not calculated for minute accuracy, could not be generally understood and interpreted.

2. Such would be the first attempts of men to communicate their ideas by written language; but it is easy to perceive that the scope of such a species of language must be extremely limited, and would totally fail in delineating the internal qualities of objects, of pure mental conceptions, or of abstract ideas. These, however, were required to be conveyed by writing; and the common consent of mankind, in ascribing peculiar internal qualities and virtues to external forms, and associating the abstract idea with the various instruments by which certain effects were produced, soon enabled them to lay hold of such forms and objects, to express the qualities and virtues themselves.¶

3. Thus, an EYF might be made to signify *watchfulness or care; an ARM, power or might; an ARROW, a calamity or judgment; a CHAIN, bondage or affliction; a HORN, victory, a SHIELD, defence, [the FORE PART or A LION, strength.] In the same way, any thing possessing certain qualities might be employed as a substitute for some other object to which one or more of the qualities proper to that object were ascribed. For instance, a FOX might be employed to represent a cunning man; a LAMB, a meek or gentle one; a LION, a strong and powerful one; a TIGER or LEOPARD, a ferocious one; or a BEAR, a ferocious and savage one. If it were wished to represent a man who was both powerful and ferocious, a compound symbol of the lion and the leopard would be resorted to; and to represent one who was cunning and savage, the fox and the bear would be united in one symbol. Or each of these objects might become a representative of the abstract qualities themselves; as of cunning, meekness, strength, ferocity, and so on; the manner in which the symbol was introduced rendering the idea perfectly intelligible to the persons whom the language was employed to address. And what thus appears to be reasonable in theory, is found to have been actual in fact, among nearly objects that were fitted, in some way, for the purpose; hence, to express a king, they were not confined to the brute creation: whatever was the chief of its kind became, or by common consent might have become, a legitimate symbol of a monarch; as the eagle, which was so employed, because conceived to possess the first rank among the feathered tribes. Again, as a king's power to subdue his enemies depends on the strength of his kingdom, and as animals with horns are, ceteris paribus, stronger than those which have none, horns are put for kingdoms; and kings having the direction of the national force, the same symbol is, by metonymy, put for kings. In like manner, the firmament, to use the ancient term, being elevated above the earth, and esteemed more splendid and glorious than terrestrial objects, was employed to symbolize the most elevated ranks among men; and as, among the planets, the sun possesses incomparably the highest lustre, it became the symbol of supreme power; while the stars were made the symbols of those possessing authority subordinate to the supreme.||

III. The oldest writings which the corrodng tooth of time has suffered to reach us, and particularly the prophetic books of Scripture, abound in symbolical language.

1. The reason for this use of symbols may not at first appear, because it cannot be supposed that the paucity of the Hebrew language, at the time these writings were published, was such as rendered a resort to the language of symbols necessary; and the usual reason assigned, namely, that it was to render the prophecies dark and obscure, is very unsatisfactory. This could have been effected without the adoption of symbols, even supposing such signs to be necessarily obscure, which they are not; besides which, it may be remarked, that the symbols employed are sometimes immediately and fully explained; as in Daniel's vision of the ram and he-goat, &c.

2. The truth seems to be, that the peculiar character of symbolical language afforded, to those who employed it, the means of communicating just so much information as they were desirous to give, respecting any object of which they were treating; and the information communicated through such a medium became universally and permanently intelligible. Thus, if a collection of waters was the symbol of a concourse of people, and it were desired to express some commotion, generally, without specifying the particular kingdom or nation in which it was to occur, this might be done by depicting the sea as in a state of turbulent agitation. But if the design were to mark out the country where such a tumult was to take place, that could also be effected by selecting as the symbol that river or sea by which the country was characterized; as the Nile in Egypt, the Jordan in Palestine, or the Euphrates in all the nations with which we have become acquainted.‡ Even after languages became more copious, and could furnish many terms proper for expressing abstract ideas and internal qualities, the old method continued, and was blended with oral language, and with literal writing.

4. Strange as this method of imparting knowledge may appear to the moderns, it was brought to such perfection as to possess powers of expression far beyond what can now be easily conceived. This is plain, as Dr. Tillock has remarked, from the number of synonymous symbols that are known to have been employed in it; nor is it difficult, in some instances, as he further suggests, to see in what manner they were derived. Every department of nature furnished ob-

‡ Champollion, in 20 years' study, found but 864 distinct material objects used in the Egyptian hieroglyphics, which are thus described in Mr. J. Stuart's tr. of Greppo's Ess. on the Hierog. Syst. Boston, 1830. 'They are of two kinds, viz.

A. The Common, called, by Herod. and Dind., demotica or demotic; by the Rosetta inscription, enchoria; and epistolographia by Clement of Alex.

B. The Sacred, divided by Clement of Alexandria into,

Prof. M. Stuart, however, would class them more simply into,

1. Alphabetic. Thus, a hand, , tot, is the alphabetic letter for t, which sound commences its name: this is abridged to . So, perhaps, the Heb. yod', a hand, is a simplification of some such figure as . Compare, too, the Heb. letters , shin, eye, and , shen, tooth, &c. Thus, in Egyptian, berbe, a censor, was put for b, &c.

2. Figurative. The figure (see the cuts referred to in notes * and †, also the cut p. 50), or , stand for the sun; , for a censer; i. e. the sign was an imitation, picture, or outline of the object it named. Comp. cut, Is. 28:27, also cut in the note in sect. iv

Turkey. In either case, the symbol would be perfectly intelligible, to the full extent designed by the person who employed it.

3. But there is another thing relative to the employment of symbols in prophetic Scripture, which may not be passed over without notice; we mean what may not improperly be designated their chronology. In verbal description there is no difficulty in properly adjusting the several occurrences which pass under review, and assigning to each one of them its respective order in the series, and its particular epoch in the general history. So, also, if it be desired to trace and delineate the effects of any particular principle or transaction on different states of society, or communities of persons, a speaker or writer may do so with the greatest facility, passing from one state to the other in regular succession, and without the remotest probability of misleading his hearers or readers. Thus we have historical works extant in which the authors have, in successive chapters or sections, narrated the history of the community to which their writings appertained, in its social, its civil, and its political state; each of which topics has been again divided into separate branches: then has followed a review of ecclesiastical matters, synchronizing with the events embraced in the former sections of the work; which review has, perhaps, been divided into the internal and external affairs of the church; and each of these again into several other distinct heads of inquiry. From such a distribution and arrangement of the several parts of a work, no inconvenience will arise, if the author but distinctly marks the limits of each, and properly adjust the whole in the general history. The reader of such a work will very naturally pass from the one to the other, carrying back his mind to the common epoch, at the beginning of each of the respective divisions. It is not so, however, in symbolical or pictorial representations. If a writer employing these be desirous to place before the mind of his reader the leading occurrences in a state, throughout the entire period of its history, he will be compelled, by the principles of the science, sometimes to represent distant events as existing at the same period of time, as in Daniel's vision of the great image, and that of the four beasts; and, at other times, to employ a successive series of symbols to denote occurrences that are strictly synchronous, as in the book of Revelation. And however skilful and cautious he may be, it will be found impracticable to mark the boundaries of time, and the transition from one event to another, with as much strength and clearness as is done in verbal description or narration. Hence it is that expositors differ so materially in their views of the structure of the Apocalyptic visions. Those persons who have paid but little attention to the principles upon which symbolical language is

3. Tropical. Sensible signs of things not appreciable by the senses, different in appearance from their signs, but having some real or supposed analogy to them, imaginative, conventional. Thus the bee (cut, Ex. 1:8) expressed, in Egypt, an orderly community, obedient, industrious, wise; thus two arms extended signify prayer (cut, 1 K. 8:22). Comp. cuts, Jb. 38:37. Is. 30:8. Thus, to pass to the new world, three circles over a child's head represented him to be 3 years old, in Mexican writing; a figure thus stood for the earth. Compare the Egyptian for 'land.'

Such, then, the world round, are the germs of alphabetic writing, to use Fr. Snart's words, 'from which that tree sprung, whose leaves are for the healing of the nations.'

The cut given in the text is of a female winged sphinx, carved on a block of black granite; it shows (says Spinoza, after Champollion) 'a perfectly Egyptian specimen of the mystico-symbolic style, in which is generally called an anamorph'. The sphinx was an emblem of strength and wisdom, the body being that of a lion, and the head human. The name (in the cartouch in front) is Timauthuit. [The vulture, emblem of maternity; the half circle, a mark of the feminine; the sign for ma, beloved; for uh; and the symbol of mout, also a goddess, with the sign of the feminine. Over the cartouch is the sun's disk, and ostrich feathers indicating honor, says Young.] She was daughter of Horus, a king of the 18th dynasty of Egypt, contemporary with the Mosiac age. This, then, is a symbolical image of the queen herself, and the lotus flowers beneath are evidently, though emblematically, taken for the Nile, and for the whole country of Egypt. The sphinx raises a hand in the attitude of protection. The whole, then, seems to be in praise of a monarch, and to signify 'a monument raised to the memory of queen Timauthuit, styled the Guardian and Protectress of the land of Egypt.' Eo.

constructed, and are but partially acquainted with the rules by which these pictorial representations are conducted, fall into the error of conceiving that the parts of each series of symbols should be considered as following each other in chronological order, each individual part having its commencement when the events of the part immediately preceding have had their accomplishment; and each whole series, in like manner, having its commencement only after the particulars of the preceding series have been consummated. The absurdities which have resulted from this mode of interpretation, have been rendered sufficiently apparent in some treatises on prophetic Scripture. To avoid this evil, particular attention must be paid to the nature of the symbols adopted, the links by which they are connected together, the scenes and agents employed, and the homogeneity of the respective facts when grouped as a whole.

IV. Upon the nature of symbolic language, particularly with reference to its intelligibility and permanency, we cannot do better than adopt the remarks of Dr. Johnson, of Holywood, showing the propriety with which this species of writing is employed in prophetic Scripture. 'Alphabetical characters and words are not natural, but only arbitrary signs, and therefore may and do change with the changes of time and of men. But hieroglyphics and symbols are either pictures of things actually existing, or of ideas which these things naturally excite; and therefore not arbitrary, but natural signs, fixed and permanent as the things themselves. For the same reasons, the symbolic is a universal language. Every alphabetical language is local and changeable; for instance, the Greek, the Latin, the Italian, the Spanish, the French, the English languages, were, or are, each the language of a particular district or territory, and are altogether unintelligible to the illiterate inhabitants of any other district; and they have all undergone such changes, that the language of one period is scarcely intelligible to the inhabitants of the same country in another period of time. Since, then, the prophecies are intended for all countries and ages, the symbolic language, being universal and unchangeable, must, for such a purpose, be the best adapted.'

V. These remarks will, it is to be hoped, fully dispose of the charge of vagueness and unintelligibility which has been preferred against symbolic language. But there is another consideration in favor of its use in the Bible, that ought not to be overlooked; namely, its prevalence in the East at all times, but especially at the time when the Hebrew prophecies were promulgated. The very genius of the oriental languages, indeed, is to represent abstract ideas by sensible images; and in nothing was this so fully developed as in the religious systems of the East. [See p. 700, vol. v.] What, then, was more natural,' asks Bishop Hurd, 'than that a style of expression which was employed in the theology of the eastern world, in its poetry, its philosophy, and all the sublimer forms of composition; what wonder that this customary, this authorized, this admired strain of language, should be that in which the sacred writers conveyed their highest and most important revelations to mankind?' †

VI. It is not to be inferred, however, from any thing that has been said on the nature of symbols, that every person is competent to their interpretation. The discordant sentiments maintained by writers on prophecy would, in itself, refute such a notion, though they will by no means prove, as some have alleged, that symbolic language is incapable of expressing any thing with precision. In this, as in verbal language, there are numerous shades and modifications of meaning, resulting from the varied associations of the symbols; and therefore the principles of such arrangements and associations must be investigated and familiarized.

1. 'In such an investigation,' as Dr. Tillock has judiciously remarked, 'it should not, for a moment, be forgotten, that each symbol has a precise and determinate meaning; and that, until this be ascertained, with respect to any one specified, it will be absolutely impossible to settle its peculiar signification, in combinations which necessarily affect the features, though not the radical sense, of the symbol. But an example will render this much plainer.

2. 'The sun was, among the ancients, a legitimate symbol of supreme power; and the stars, of subordinate authority. A careless reasoner will be apt instantly to conclude, that when the sun is put for the supreme ruler, the moon must symbolize the queen; and he will not fail to recollect, in support of his opinion, that in Joseph's dream the sun symbolized the father, the moon the mother, and the stars the sons. In the case of a family, these symbols could with no kind of propriety be taken in any other sense; but it is quite otherwise in respect to a kingdom or empire; and it is so from that necessity which determines the fitness of things. The hieroglyphic of the luminaries embraces a totality, which must not be violated in any case to which it may be applied; the moon, therefore, cannot signify the wife of the sovereign, or it would follow that a kingdom cannot exist without a queen as well as a king. In fact, the sun does not symbolize the sovereignty as a male, or as any thing but the supreme power, whether vested in a male, in a female, or in a plurality of persons. A queen, then, if supreme, may be symbolized by the sun; but in this case, what would become of the moon? If we consider the compound symbol, and then the parts of the complex machine to which it is applied, all will be plain.' ‡

* Comm. on Rev. Intro. p. 5. We have a striking example of the superiority of symbolical over alphabetical writing, for the purpose of universal instruction, in the Chinese language, which is the accurate medium of thought through the nations of that vast empire, entirely independent of the 15 varieties of speech among them. Thus Dr. Morrison has stated that the European geometry and astronomy of the 15th cent., with the logarithmic tables of Napier, being tr. into the Chinese language, are, by that one translation required, rendered legible to 300,000,000 human beings. See Crit. Bib. vol. iv. p. 133. [But see on p. 157 Ed.]

One of the richest, most expressive, elevated and elegant of the ancient symbols, is given in our Family Record, p. 923, v. iii. 'marriage.' So chaste, appropriate and beautiful is this, that though it has been rashly called a pagan symbol, it rather belongs to the analogy of things material and spiritual which pervades the universe of Him from whom is every thing good, and beautiful, and true. We have not supposed our readers so debased, vulgar, or impure in mind, as to abuse, or not to appreciate, its spiritual beauty; assisted to its meaning by the note Mk. 10:6-9, and by the few hints we now add. We attribute to the allegorical symbol a good origin, not only because it has nothing gross about it (which is almost peculiar to Scripture symbols, as is seen in Creuzer by Guiguerat), but because the sincerest and best minds among the 'heathen' shadowed forth to themselves, in the mystic union of Eros and Psyche, that vivification of matter hinted at, Ge. 1:2, as well as the union of the human soul with the human body through the energy of almighty love. The nakedness of the infant figures refers us to the primeval hour of sinless infancy. Ge. 2:25. The wings are universal symbols of protecting love, outflowing, rapidly succoring and helping off, unselfish, to tering. Ge. 1:2. Note Ps. 57:1. Comp. also Ps. 36:7. 91:4. Re. 2:12. Ex. 37:9. Mat. 23:37. Ie. 32:11,12. Ex. 19:1. Thus the classic Euripides speaks of Hercules's orphans as 'under the wings' of Jolus, and elsewhere of Megara. Spiritual exaltation is thus expressed Is. 40:31, &c. Maimonides says, 'Observe that all things moved very rapidly are said to fly.' Hence, too, Tertullian says, 'Every spirit is winged.' The pearls are indicative of excellency or heavenly spirits (Re. 21:21. Is. 54:11,12), and are used of what is most important to man in that metaphor (Mat. 13:46), 'the pearl of great price'; see Concordance. Apples are a chastened symbol (Song 2:3,5), as is also the banquet (2:4). Mat. 25:21. The nail marked the necessary subordination often urged by Paul. 1 Co. 11:10. It also denotes mystery. Comp. 2 Co. 3:16, &c. The torch (candlestick, or lampstand) is the ancient symbol of a wife (so Artemidorus); comp. Re. 2:5, and was always used at marriages, as Mat. 25:1. See Homer, Euripides, Virgil. The flame is as universal a symbol for love; hence angels are called 'flaming spirits,' seraphim, i. e. burners, a 'flame' of fire' (Ex. 3:2. He. 1:7); it is exalted to the highest place (Ac. 2:3). Fire is often represented as the vehicle of Deity. The dove symbolized every lovely quality almost, as meekness, simplicity, purity, innocence, &c. (Mat. 10:16), &c.; it is the most exalted emblem (Mat. 3:16). So that heathenism and idolatry cannot claim this symbol as their own. Finally, the mystical union of Christ and the church (2 Co. 2:2. Ep. 5:32), the infinite with the finite, God and man, is shadowed forth by individual marriage, without which man exists not, and in which halves form one whole (Ep. 5:31), the perfected creature of God (Ge. 2:18,23,24). But we dare not stumble further on this mysterious and sublime pathway, like Mahomet's thin-edged bridge from earth to heaven; the subject is left, as Paul left it (Ep. 5:32), 'a mystery.' Compt. the Symbol Dict.

Some Mexican symbols are added from Clavigero: —

A. One of the symbols of their kings; king (or Montezuma) Ilhuacamino, which word means, 'he who shoots into the sky'; the head has the Mexican crown, denoting royalty; the dotted and shaded fig. is the symbol for sky, or heavens; the arrow explains itself.

B. One of the symbols of their cities; of Atotonilco; it is an earthen pot upon three stones, as the Indians used to and still do, to keep it over a fire; and in the mouth of the pot is the fig. for water. Atotonilco signifies 'hot water,' or the place of the baths.

C. Symbol of the city Ahuizotlapan; in the fig. for water appears a man with his arms open in token of rejoicing, representing the city, Ahuizotlapan, called by the Spanish Orizaba, the name of which means, 'in the water of pleasure,' in the cheerful river.

D. Mexican traditional symbolic representation of the deluge, which the water signifies; the human head and bird in it denote the drowning of men and animals; the ship and man on it, that vessel in which their tradition says one man and woman were saved to perpetuate the race. The corner fig. is the mountain Colhuacan (always thus represented, when allotted to), on which they disembarked. The pigeon is the bird which, they say, communicated speech to man, who was born dumb after the deluge; and the numerous twigs are the symbols of the multitude of tongues (taught. Log, in Irish, means a branch, &c., and logos, in Greek, is a word); and these twigs are always used in the Mexican writing for 'words' or 'languages.' An accompanying painting of 15 persons shows the 15 families the race separated into, on the confusion of tongues. Ep. 1 Dis. on Proph. ii. p. 87. ‡ Tillock on Apoc. Diss. 2, § 2

3. It is very remarkable, however, that the writer who made this observation, so just in itself, and of such great importance in the interpretation of symbolic language, should so far have failed in its application, as to interpret the moon of the subjects of a state; an interpretation which violates the homogeneity of the compound symbol, and destroys the principle of analogy on which every thing in this species of language depends. Each of the symbols supposed is itself a ruling power, and cannot, therefore, represent the people, who are the ruled, and who are to be sought on the earth, or in the lower ranks, and not in the heavens, or the exalted ones. In this almost all commentators of eminence agree; and Achmet, an Arabian writer, in his Oncirocritica, which relates to an art founded on symbolic principles, says, as tr. by Dr. Lancaster, that according to the Indians, Persians, and Egyptians, the sun is invariably interpreted of the king or supreme power; the moon, of him who is next in power; and the stars, of men of nobility and opulence, and those who in every place live nearest to the king.

4. As an example of the apparent change which a symbol receives in its meaning, from a change of circumstances, Dr. Tilloch exhibits the following one, also drawn from the heavens. Stars sometimes symbolize, not inferior magistrates, but kings, which seems contradictory to what we have said. But the change is only in appearance, and the principles on which the language is founded are by no means violated, as will be evident from the following remark: Wherever stars are used to symbolize kings, it will be found that more than one king is spoken of, or that the Ruler of the universe is alluded to in the context; if the former, as there is but one sun in our system, he is necessarily excluded where a plurality of kings is the subject, and, therefore, other luminaries are substituted; if the latter, the sun symbolizing the King of kings, the powers ordained by him are represented by stars. The principle, therefore, is precisely the same, and could not have been preserved by any other method.

VII. It will, then, be evident, that there is the greatest necessity for distinguishing between metaphors and symbols. 'In hieroglyphical language,' remarks Tilloch (as above), 'it is not left to fancy, or to sagacity, to attach to a symbol any signification which the reader may imagine would have been more appropriate than that assigned to it by the ancients; for in elucidating such writings, our business is not now to make a language, but to read one already made; and we might as well refuse to assign to any word in Hebrew, Greek, or Latin, its known and admitted sense, from a conceit that a more expressive word might have been formed to convey that idea, as quarrel with the meaning of a symbol, because, in our judgment, a more appropriate one might have been formed. Where symbols are employed, it is our duty, instead of resorting to fancy, to employ industry; not to make, but to find out, the admitted sense. In Daniel and John, many of the symbols they employ are explained; the meaning of others may be found in other prophecies; and where these fail, recourse must be had to profane authors. Nor is there more danger in seeking the meaning of a symbol in such works than in ascertaining the sense of any word in the N. T. by comparing the best Greek writers with each other and with the Septuagint. By following this method, it can hardly be doubted that the true and genuine signification of every one of the symbols the sacred writers employ may be satisfactorily ascertained. It may not be in the power of any single individual to accomplish this desirable object.'

VIII. The following are rules for the particular application of the general signification of symbols, and for the better understanding of the prophetic style. They are collected from the Prelim. Disc. in Lancaster's Abridg. of Danubz on Rev. — a work which it is now extremely difficult to meet with.

1. The scene of action, the actor, and sufferer, determine the sense of all the accidents described in any general vision, or part of a vision where new ones appear. The meaning of this rule may be explained from what is observed even in common discourse. It is evident, when once the general or appellative terms are fixed to a particular signification, by some pronoun, proper name, demonstrative article, or even the time, place, or circumstance, that when they lose their general signification in all the following discourse, though the determining words or particles be not applied to each single term afterwards. Thus, if Britain be the fixed subject of the discourse, if we proceed to speak of the king, lords, the commons, clergy, church, courts, laws, and the like, all which are general terms, as being common with us to several countries, though we do not at every one of them add the restriction, yet it is certain that we do it tacitly; and thus all our discourse must be determined by the first mention of its subject, and that even though we should not use the terms common in the country to denote those matters, but others analogical, and used in other countries. It is plain that we have settled the true notion of them by the first restriction. This is the very key of all discourse, and must consequently be so in the Revelation, which is written in a discursive method; so that the signification of the symbols is to be particularly applied by a careful and constant observation of this rule. It has been observed, as an excellence in Virgil, that he never describes the appearance of the day, but does it with such a description as suits the work of the day. The like is done throughout this prophecy. No actor or scene appears in it; but we may thereby immediately discover what action is to be performed. So that the rule is of universal use, and, as being so, is constantly observed by the oncirocritics, who, agreeably to symbolic principles, not only suit their interpretations to the general object, but also to the condition of the party receiving the dream, as its proper scene or subject. And, in expounding the Revelation, although we have the same symbols over and over again, we must nevertheless, in every particular case, refer them to the immediate scenes and actors from whence they proceed, and to which they are related, and, by consequence, restrain their general signification to the particular case in which they are employed. Thus the sun, moon, and stars, are used in the visions of the seals, the trumpets, the sign of the woman in travail, and the vials; yet they must be there interpreted of things vastly different and opposed, though, at the same time, in proportion to their different cases, really analogous. In short, there is nothing insignificant, or for the sake of decoration only, in the book of Revelation; and, therefore,

2. The apparatus or decorations of the visions are of great use, being of the nature of such sorts of prologues as explain, by way of introduction, the subject of the whole action. They fix the scene, describe the actors, and thereby determine the whole system of the actions, and by consequence the interpretation.

3. Invisible beings, and even conceptions of the mind, as collective notions are reckoned, are represented by such visible shapes or figures as are borrowed from some of those invisible adjuncts that either attend continually, or more or less frequently, the invisible object, so that they may absolutely determine it to be that object designed, and no other. Thus the eternal Father, who is invisible, is not represented in the Revelation by any likeness (for none can be made of Him), but by those visible adjuncts which He showed once to the Israelites, or left them the pattern of in the tabernacle; He Himself, and his government, being only represented by his throne, with some other circumstances. So the Son, the Word of God, who, in respect of his divine nature, is invisible, is represented like a lamb, and like the Son of man, from such adjuncts to his divine person as have once rendered Him visible to mankind. In like manner, the Holy Spirit, who is invisible, is set forth by seven archangels collectively taken, as being his constant attendants, and consequently adjuncts, denoting his presence and efficacy. He is also represented by seven great torches or lights, because his visible appearance has been under the similitude of visible fires or lights which fell on the apostles.

4. When a kingdom or empire is to be represented throughout its whole extent and duration, the entire picture of it is given as if all the parts were existing at the same time. Thus the great image in Daniel appears all of one piece, though the parts of it are found by the interpretation to have existed one after another. So the four great beasts came out of the sea, and seem to have been seen all at once, though in the explanation they are plainly successive.

5. In bodies politic and continual, where there is found a collection of individuals of different denominations, that is said in general of the whole which is true of the principal and greatest part. And when these bodies are considered from their beginning to their end, that may be said of them in general which is true of them during the greatest part of their time, or when they were in their most flourishing state. From whence it is reasonable to infer, that in the name or symbol, notice is chiefly taken of the akme or eminent point of things, which serves to give them their denominations. For as, in a picture, the principal part of the object, and that intended to excite in the spectator the greatest attention, is placed in the fairest light, and its chief part the most exposed to view, the rest being by shadows insensibly withdrawn from the eye, so it is the way of the Revelation, in setting forth matters under one general extent and duration, to give the whole but one name to express it symbolically.

6. When the things to be prophesied of are to be considered in several vices, there is a change of the symbols. The reason for this is, that the visions being represented by symbols which must bear a certain analogy to each other, and carry throughout a certain decorum, it is not possible that the same train of symbols should represent all the various circumstances of the church and its enemies; and therefore many symbols may be used to denote the same thing in different respects — what was before treated of successively being enlarged upon and more fully demonstrated. The book of Revelation not written in the way of annalists, who, being obliged to reduce all matters to a chronological series, only relate briefly what happens every year, without enlarging upon the causes of the events, and omitting for the most part the consequences; but in the way of the more judicious historians, who endeavor to give a full account of every matter as they take it in hand, in order to make a complete system of the whole; interposing digressions, and then returning to the principal matters, by giving such hints and transitions as suffice to let us understand to what they belong, and how, as to point of time, they come in or end with the rest. Upon this account, there are frequent transitions, in which the prophet seems to cast the eyes of his inspired sight upon different objects, which being thus seen one after another, the particles expressive of them may seem to imply a posteriority in a matter which may be synchronical, and even may have its origin higher than that whose description preceded it in the account.

7. The repetition of a prophecy, vision, or dream, signifies the certainty and speedy accomplishment of an event of more special concern and remarkable eminence. Thus, in the explication of Pharaoh's two dreams, at the same time, concerning the years of plenty and of famine, the latter is affirmed to be a confirmation of the former, to show the certainty of the event, — for that the dream (says Joseph) was doubled unto Pharaoh twice, is because the thing is established by God, and God will bring it to pass.¹ Ge. 41:32. Agreeably to this, Artemidorus makes the repetition of a dream to be the mark of an event of great moment; and among the heathen soothsayers it was a constant maxim, that an omen or symbol to the same purpose prefigured the certainty of the event. From this use of the repetition, several passages in Scripture may be explained; as Jb. 40:5. For the like reason, in the trial of jealousy (Nu. 5:22), the suspected wife is commanded to confirm the adjuration, by saying Amen, twice; which is the usual form of our Savior to confirm his doctrine; and is also conformable to the style of the Heb. language, in which repetitions of the same word are marks of certainty; as Ge. 2:17, ‘dying, thou shalt die;’—i.e. thou shalt most certainly die;—and Ex. 3:7, ‘seeing, I saw;’ and the like. Indeed, such repetitions of an emphatic word are frequently employed for the purpose of expressing things of great concern.

3. In all symbolical propositions, the persons of the substantive verb, as, ‘I am,’ ‘thou art,’ ‘is,’ ‘are,’ whether expressed or understood, are the copulatives showing the relation between the type and the antitype. Thus, in Ge. 40:12, ‘the three branches are three days;’ instead of ‘the three branches signify three days.’ So in our Savior’s parables, which are a species of symbolical description, we find the same style; as in Lu. 8:11, ‘The seed is the word of God.’²

9. In symbolical rites, it is usual to ascribe an effect to the symbol by which it was represented; as if the symbol or type were the efficient cause. Thus Moses smote the waters of the Egyptian river, as if he gave a wound, to turn them to blood; and the waters were thereupon turned into blood. In like manner, a prophet, or interpreter of dreams, may be said to save and to kill, when he predicts the safety or death of any; as Joseph did of the chief butler and chief baker, in Ge. 41:13; ‘Me,’ says the butler, ‘he restored unto mine office, and him he hanged.’ Thus, Artemidorus says, the symbol makes the party do or suffer what is signified by it. See Lc. 13, passim; Mat. 18:15, &c.

10. During the prophetic ecstasy, the actions and words of a prophet are symbolical, as is rightly observed by Irenaeus, lib. iv. c. 37. Thus, in 1 K. 20:37, one of the prophets commanding a man to smite him, the man refused. Now, this refusal was morally good, upon the supposition that the thing enjoined was not commanded by the Holy Spirit. But this being the case, it was an ill refusal, and the man upon that account was slain by a lion. The other man, who obeyed the commandment, by striking the prophet so that he wounded him, did well; because that action served the intention of the prophet, whose stroke symbolically represented that Ahab should be so smitten; as the unbelief of the former, followed by his destruction, represented the unbelief of the king, who therefore should perish in the same manner. So Isaiah (ch. 20,) walked naked and barefooted, to represent, symbolically, the captivity of the Egyptians and Ethiopians, upon whom the Israelites trusted too much, instead of wholly confiding in God. The prophet Ezekiel (chap. 4.) is also commanded to do several things which would be absurd were they not symbolical. Hosea’s marriage with a loose woman was literal, but the intent symbolical; the shame which accrued to the prophet, by such an action, reflecting upon the Israelites, who were to be affected by the actions of their prophets; and therefore the actions themselves must be visible and real. In Acts 10, Peter fell into an ecstasy, and had a vision to show him that God had set aside the distinction of meats, which separated the Jews from the pagans; and under that notion to signify, further, that the partition-wall betwixt Jews and Gentiles was now taken away, and that both should be equally received into the church; which vision was corroborated by the call of Cornelius and the visible descent of the Holy Ghost. From the rule thus illustrated, we must infer that the actors in the Revelation being symbolical, the person of John himself, wherever he is in any way concerned in the action, must be also symbolic. He is not only the spectator commissioned by Christ to see the visions, but also the mediator, angel, or deputy, to transmit them to the church. He represents, therefore, his fellow-members of Christ’s church, which are present, when the actions represented in the visions are actually performed.

IX. For the purpose of facilitating the study of symbols, Dr. Lancaster drew up, at the cost of great labor, ‘A Symbolical Alphabetical Dictionary,’ which he prefixed to his Abridg. of Daubuz’s Comm. on Rev., and which has been deservedly held in very high repute. This work is now, however, exceedingly scarce and expensive. To the generality of students, therefore, it is not available, nor would a mere reprint of it be altogether acceptable. As the first work of the kind, it reflects great credit upon the author’s research; but it is often unnecessarily diffuse, and not unfrequently inaccurate, while there is a great want of precision in distinguishing between metaphors and symbols. Mr. Horne has bestowed some labor on his ‘Index of Symbolical Language,’ in the fourth volume of his ‘Intro. to the Critical Study of the Scriptures;’ but it has most of the defects and redundancies of Lancaster (whom he has taken as his model), in at least a fivefold degree. A great number of words are introduced, which have nothing to do with symbols, and can therefore only tend to distract the attention and bewilder the mind of the student. The best work we have seen is ‘A Key to the Symbol. Lang. of Script.,’ by Th. Weemyss (Edinb. 1835), in which the labors of ingenious writers have been judiciously appropriated. [See this at end of Rev.]

X. Intimately connected with the language of symbols, is that of actions or signs; whence it becomes necessary to submit a few remarks upon this topic also.

1. In the early ages of the world, language must have been extremely rude, narrow, and equivocal; so that men would be perpetually at a loss, as Bp. Warburton remarks, on any new conception, or uncommon accident, to explain themselves intelligibly to one another. This would necessarily induce them to supply the deficiencies of speech by apt and significant signs. Hence mutual converse was upheld by mixed discourse of words and ACTIONS; whence came the eastern phrase of the voice of the sign. Ex. 4:3. But this custom, which originated in necessity, being improved into ornament, subsisted long after the necessity ceased, especially among the orientals,³ whose natural temperament inclined them to a mode of conversation which so well exercised their vivacity by motion, and so much gratified it by a perpetual representation of material images.

2. Of this description of language, as well as of symbols, we have a great number of examples in the sacred writings. Thus the false prophet pushed with horns of iron, to denote the entire overthrow of the Syrians. 1 K. 22:11. Jeremiah, by God’s direction, hid the linen girdle in the hole of a rock, near the Euphrates (Jer. 13); broke a potter’s vessel in sight of the people (ch. 19); put on bonds and yokes (ch. 27); and cast a book into the Euphrates (ch. 51: 63). Ezekiel, by the same appointment, delineated the siege of Jerusalem on a tile (Ez. 4); weighed the hair of his beard in balances (ch. 5); carried out his household stuff (ch. 12); and joined together the two sticks for Judah and Israel (ch. 37:16–20). By these actions the prophets instructed the people in the will of God, and conversed with them in signs. But there is no real ground—leaving divine revelation out of the question—there is no real ground for charging the prophets, in these symbolical actions, with absurd and fanatic conduct, as some pretenders to wisdom have done. The absurdity of an action consists, as Bp. Warburton remarks, in its being extravagant and insignificant; but use and a fixed application make the actions of the prophets both sober and pertinent; the fanaticism of an action consists in a fondness for unusual actions and foreign modes of speech; but the actions of the prophets were idiomatic and familiar.⁴

SECTION XII.

TYPES AND SECONDARY SENSES.

The Doctrine of Types—Fanciful Interpretations—Definition of a Type—Rules for interpreting Types—The Secondary and Spiritual Sense of Scripture sanctioned by our Lord and his Apostles; its Extent—Analogical and Moral Application of Scripture.

1. There are few subjects falling within the province of biblical interpretation, that have afforded so much scope for the exercise of ingenuity, as the doctrine of types; and there are few mistakes which have been attended with worse consequences to the Christian church.

1. The word type frequently occurs in the N. T., and under very different meanings. In its original and primary meaning, it properly signifies the mark or impression made by one thing upon another; and sometimes, in a more lax sense, that general likeness or resemblance which one thing may bear to another. See Jn. 20:25. Ac. 7:43. 23:25. [Note Ro. 6:17.] But the term is usually employed to denote a prefigurative action or occurrence, in which one event, person, or circumstance, is intended to represent another, similar to it in certain respects, but future and distant.⁵ And hence, because a lively and inventive imagination has discovered a very striking likeness between many of the persons, rites, and usages under the law, and those under the gospel, they have been held all to be types the one of the other. Under the notion that Christ and his church were prefigured by every thing under the law, the learned but fanciful Witsius has devoted a chapter of his work on the ‘Economy of the Covenants’ to this subject, in which he distributes the types into three classes—natural, historical, and legal; and he urges it upon teachers, as an incumbent duty, to explain, by the same method that he has adopted, all the types of the O. T., on the principle that, ‘when there is any thing in the antitype resembling the type, it is justly affirmed, that God, who knows all things from the beginning, ordered the type in such a manner that it might signify beforehand that truth which was in the antitype; unless we would rather maintain that the likeness of an ingenious picture to the original was rather the effect of chance than of the intention of the artist, which is contrary to all reason.’⁶ But what a specimen of reasoning is this! The point to be proved is the existence of types; and yet it is taken for granted, from the fancied resemblance which certain things and persons bore to one another, that they stood in the relation of correlates, and that, because we are pleased to make the one the antitype, the other must be the type.⁷

2. But these extravagances do not affect the doctrine itself, which is placed beyond dispute by the direct testimony of our Lord and his apostles. By their frequent allusions to the serpent, they show us how they understood the mystery of the first promise, and the bruising of his head, which, in a merely literal sense, so grossly sinks the majesty of a divine manifestation. They exhibit Abraham as a public type of the manner of man’s justification before God, and tell us that he rescued Isaac from the dead in a figure (en parabolē); that the holy places made with hands are the figures (antitupa), the antitypes, of the true; that the exodus from Egypt, the effusion of water from the rock, and the stupendous history of the ancient church in the wilderness, teach us, as by so many examples; and that the Sabbath abumbrates the eternal rest of the saints with God.¹

* See further examples, in CARPENTER’S ‘Examination of Scripture Difficulties,’ pp. 301, 302.

3. The learned Outram has treated the subject of types in a very lucid and satisfactory manner, in his Dissertations on Sacrifice. Bp. Marsh has thus expressed the substance of his remarks with great perspicuity, and given additional illustrations.

(1) 'To constitute one thing the type of another, as the term is generally understood in reference to Scripture, something more is wanted than mere resemblance.' The former must not only resemble the latter, but must have been designed to resemble the latter. It must have been so designed in its original institution. It must have been designed as something preparatory to the latter. The type, as well as the antitype, must have been preordained; and they must have been preordained as constituent parts of the same general scheme of divine providence. It is this previous design and this preordained connection which constitute the relation of type and antitype. Where these qualities fail, where the previous design and the preordained connection are wanting, the relation between any two things, however similar in themselves, is not the relation of type to antitype. The existence, therefore, of that previous design and preordained connection must be clearly established, before we can have authority for pronouncing one thing the type of another. But we cannot establish the existence of that previous design and preordained connection, by arguing only from the resemblance of the things compared; for the qualities and circumstances attendant on one thing may have a close resemblance with the qualities and circumstances attendant on another thing, and yet the things themselves may be devoid of all connection.

(2) 'How, then, obtain the proof required? by what means determine, in any given instance, that that which is alleged as a type was really designed for a type! The only possible source of this information is Scripture itself. The only possible means of knowing that two distant though similar historic facts were so connected in the general scheme of divine providence, that the one was designed to prefigure the other, is the authority of that work in which the scheme of divine providence is unfolded. Destitute of that authority, we may confound a resemblance subsequently observed with a resemblance preordained; we may mistake a comparison founded on a mere accidental parity of circumstances for a comparison founded on a necessary and inherent connection. There is no other rule, therefore, by which we can distinguish a real from a pretended type than that of Scripture itself. There are no other possible means by which we can know that a previous design and a preordained connection existed. Whatever persons or things, therefore, recorded in the Old Test. were expressly declared by Christ, or by his apostles, to have been designed as prefigurations of persons or things relating to the New Test., such persons or things, so recorded in the former, are types of the persons or things with which they are compared in the latter. But if we assert that a person or thing was designed to prefigure another person or thing, where no such prefiguration has been declared by divine authority, we make an assertion for which we neither have nor can have the slightest foundation. And even when comparisons are instituted in the N. T. between antecedent and subsequent persons or things, we must be careful to distinguish the examples, where a comparison is instituted merely for the sake of illustration, from the examples where such a connection is declared, as exists in the relation of a type to its antitype.'²

It was remarked in the preceding section, that a type and a symbol differ from each other as a genus and a species; and it is very necessary that this distinction should be strictly attended to, in the interpretation of Scripture. The term symbol, as Outram observes, is equally applicable to that which represents a thing past, or present, or future; whereas the object represented by a type is invariably future.³ Thus those institutions of Moses which had the nature of types, are called 'a shadow of things to come' (Col. 2:17); and those things which 'happened unto the fathers for types,' are said to have been 'written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come.' 1 Co. 10:11. In the same sense, the Mosaic law, which abounded with numerous types, is declared to have had 'a shadow of good things to come' (He. 10:1); and those things which, by the command of God, were formerly transacted in the tabernacle, are described as prefiguring what was afterwards to be done in the heavenly sanctuary. He. 9:11,12,23,21.¶

5. In the interpretation of types, as thus defined, it will be necessary to attend to the following circumstances, all of which are pointed out by Witsius and Outram.

(1) The efficacy really possessed by the antitype exists in the type only in appearance, or in a much lower degree. For though a type often possesses some quality in common with its antitype, yet that quality is always considerably weaker in the type than in the antitype; as the death of those victims by which the Messiah's death was prefigured, had far less efficacy with God and men than what belongs to the death of Christ. Hence the apostle says, 'For the law, having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never, with those sacrifices which they offer year by year continually, make the comers thereto perfect.' He. 10:1. Here, as he uses the phrase the very image of the things, to denote the things themselves, so he declares the Jewish sacrifices, which were types of the sacrifice of Christ, to have had only a shadow of that efficacy of which his sacrifice possesses the reality. And this was the reason why those sacrifices never perfectly purified the persons by whom they were offered; as is evident from the language of the same apostle—'For if the blood of bulls and goats, and the ashes of a heifer, sprinkling the unclean, sanctified to the purifying of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ, who, through the eternal Spirit, offered himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God?' He. 9:13,14. The argument on which this inference proceeds, is, that the efficacy which was found only in a figure, or in a very small degree in the type, is possessed in reality, and in a far superior degree, in the antitype.¶

(2) But, as was said, the type is sometimes destitute of the properties of the antitype, even in the lowest degree, and possesses only some quality which symbolizes or shadows them forth. Thus the daily incense burned in the temple, which represented the prayers of the saints (Re. 5:3, 8:3,1), possessed no real quality in common with prayers. For its sweet order, though sufficiently adapted to indicate how acceptably all pious prayers were to God, was not a quality of the same kind as that which it represented in those prayers. So, also, the brazen serpent, which healed all who fixed their eyes upon it, and which was typical of the Savior of the world, possessed no efficacy in itself, and had no property in common with that divine Person in who indwelt all the filthiness of the Godhead bodily.

(3) The analogy between the type and the antitype must not be pushed beyond the point to which revelation has extended it. Thus, because we find Paul, by a singular usage, perhaps, of the word tupas, expressing that connection and contrast which existed between the first and the second Adam, and his illustration of the subject, amounting strictly to this, that 'as in' (the one) 'Adam all die, so in' (the one) 'Christ shall all be made alive'; are we, therefore, authorized to pursue this same idea of relation through all the circumstances of our first parents' creation and fall? to advance that, as Eve was drawn forth from the side of Adam, so from the wounded side of our Redeemer was drawn his mystic consort, the church of the faithful? that as Adam was made on the sixth day, and did eat the fruit at the sixth hour, so our Lord was crucified on the same day, and at the same hour? that as Adam's soul was in spiritual darkness from the sixth to the ninth hour, so the earth was covered by the material darkness which succeeded our Lord's death, for the same space of time? That David, in his kingly power and character, typified the future King of the spiritual Israel; that in the sufferings and sorrows which caused him so repeatedly and pathetically to pour out his soul before God, he bore, however faintly and imperfectly, the figure of Him who for us suffered as no man ever has or could, we readily grant; and though, in this case, we may not be able to assent to all that is proposed even by a Horne or a Horsley, yet by denying this typical character of the royal Psalmist, we incur the danger, at least, of sacrificing, to the excessive and ungrounded indulgence of critical refinement, means of personal edification and advancement in the love of Christ, which no man may despise or overlook with safety. But are these feelings enhanced or enlivened—are we not rather disposed to suspect and doubt the grounds on which we have hitherto cherished them—when it is urged to us by our fathers in this blessed faith and hope of the Christian, that the voice and harp of David, expelling the evil spirit of Saul, prefigured the authority with which our Lord commanded the evil spirits, and they obeyed him; that the rescue of David's two wives from the hands of the Amalekites prefigured the rescue of the spiritual sisters, Israel and Judah, both the daughters of one mother, the heavenly Jerusalem? It were easy to occupy a much longer time with instances which show abundantly the necessity and wisdom of restricting in general our exposition of scriptural types to those express points in which the Scripture itself authorizes us to consider them as typical, or which immediately flow from the nature of the relation or character which we are taught to regard as constituting the analogy between the type and its antitype. Thus we readily grant that Aaron, as the appointed high-priest of JEHOVAH, was a real and intelligible type of Him who is made for us a High-Priest forever, and that the sacrifices which he offered were typical. Admitting this, we can see no absurdity in admitting, also, that when, in his sacerdotal character, he stood between the living and the dead, and stayed the plague from Israel, he exhibited the prefiguration and symbol of a still higher deliverance. And there are types, it may be added, of so general and extensive a character, as to admit, by the fairest deductions of criticism, the application of much that is said concerning

* Prof. Hahn, of Leipzig, has some judicious remarks on this topic, in his tract on the Interpr. of SS. 'Bib. Reps.' Andover, vol. i. p. 133, &c.

‡ Hence a type is virtually a prediction of its antitype. Mr. Horne has a strange contradiction, in treating of types and the typical sense of Scripture. In his ch. on the Interpretation of Types, he says, quoting from Outram, 'Our definition of a type includes, also, that the object represented by it is something future,' vol. ii. p. 650, 4th ed. In his ch. on the Sense of Scripture, however (vol. ii. p. 495), he says, 'The typical sense is, whether under external objects, or prophetic visions, secret things, or present or future, are represented.'

§ The relation between Judaism and Christianity, by means of types, is discussed by Mr. Fawcett, Hor. Mos. book ii. sect. 2.

¶ This subject is ably treated in Dr. J. P. Smith's Discourses on the Sacrifice and Priesthood of Christ, Disc. i.

them, to the known character and features of their established antitype. This appears to be especially the case with respect to the sacrifices of the Mosaic ritual, and the analogy existing between the typical and the spiritual Israel—an analogy which must be regarded as intentionally and largly abominated in all the prophetic writing.^{*}

(4) Another thing to be noticed is, that a variation sometimes takes place in the signification of the type; i. e. the same person or thing is occasionally typical of different persons or things, in different respects. So Isaac, when virtually sacrificed by Abraham, was a type of Christ; but when resuscitated from the sacrificial knife, and the ram offered in his stead, the figure was changed; the ram representing Christ, who was delivered up to death; and Isaac, the church, which was redeemed by the death of Christ.

(5) The last thing to be noticed is, that the type is superseded, or wholly removed from its place, by the antitype. This results from the very nature of the things, the one being the shadow, the other the substance; the one the figure, the other the truth; and, as Jerome has remarked, ‘the shadow ceased on the coming of the substance;’ and ‘where the truth is present, there is no need of the figure.’†

(6) If these things be carefully attended to, the doctrine of types will appear much more determinate, and less liable to abuse, than at present; as well as by far more worthy a place in the volume of revelation.

II. Very nearly allied to the interpretation of symbols and types is the spiritual or mystical sense of Scripture; with a few suggestions on which, the present section may be closed.

1. On this, as on most other subjects, involving any difficulty, the extremes to which some persons have gone, and the extravagances of which they have been guilty, have created in others so strong a distaste for the doctrine, that their efforts, it is to be feared, are almost exclusively directed to obtain a correct acquaintance with the mere letter of Scripture; in which should they terminate, it will have been to them altogether dead and useless.

2. That the O. T. Scriptures sometimes possessed, in addition to their literal and obvious meaning, a secondary or spiritual sense, is evident from those Scriptures themselves. Thus David prayed that God would open his eyes, that he might behold wondrous things out of his law (Ps. 119:18); and in Ps. 78, he has himself shown that the whole history of Israel, from the time when they left Egypt to his own days, had a parabolic or mystical meaning. But this has been placed beyond dispute, by the interpretations which our Lord and his apostles have given of those divinely-inspired writings. They show us how they understood the promises to Adam and Abraham; that Mount Sinai and Jerusalem are both to be allegorized; and with respect to prophecies, that several occurrences and sayings in the O. T. which in the letter appear not to refer to any thing beyond the occasion, were fulfilled, as actually prophetic, by the events of the life, death, and resurrection of our Redeemer. These, and other instances, no just criticism can ever so explain as to make them consistent with a total denial of the spiritual and evangelical sense of many parts of the O. T. Nor can it be denied or questioned, as Mr. Conybeare has ably argued, that even in the records of the new covenant, the things which concern the renewal of the inner man, and the salvation of the believer, are in more than one case shadowed out to us under types and analogies, which, if we accept the testimony of those records, we are not only authorized but bound to understand and to apply spiritually. To pass over much of that part of our Lord’s teaching which was confessedly in parables, if we allow that there be any spiritual grace connected with the right usage and reception of the Christian sacraments, we must admit their outward elements to be the certain and preordained symbols of that grace, and of the means whereby it is conveyed to us; we must (it is spoken with reverence and faith) admit the material body and blood of our glorious Redeemer Himself to be typical of that spiritual food whereby the inward life of the believer’s soul—that life which, as we are expressly told, ‘is hidden with Christ in God’—is produced and supported. When the apostle urges, that as our Savior died and rose again for us, so should we, who are buried with Him in baptism, die unto sin and rise again unto righteousness; when he expressly exhorts the believers as ‘those who are risen with Christ;’ we cannot deny that he sees in the history of thus much, at least, in His Master’s life, a spiritual as well as a literal import. The luxuriance of human ingenuity may, indeed, as it has often done, push its imitation of these mysterious analogies much too far; the pride of skepticism may refuse to be taught at all after this manner, and its votary may question the inspiration of those Scriptures which would thus teach him; but neither the abuses of the one, nor the perverseness of the other, can invalidate the truth of the general position, that the N. T. does not only assert the secondary and spiritual meaning of much that is contained in the Old, but authorizes and strengthens the legitimacy of such interpretation, by affixing the like sense to portions also of its own contents.‡

3. ‘The extent to which subsequent writers of doctrinal and practical theology have considered themselves at liberty to pursue the same track, is generally known,’ says the same writer, ‘to have varied very considerably, according to their age, school, genius, and other local or personal circumstances. On the one hand, allegorical or spiritual meanings have been attached, not only to those passages of Moses and the prophets which our Lord and his disciples expressly refer to as typical or prophetic of the person and office of the Messiah, and the economy of his covenant, but to every part, whether historical or preceptive, of the O. T., and to much even of the New. It has been contended virtually, if not in so many words, that whatsoever meaning of this nature the ingenuity or piety of the expositor might affix to any given passage of Scripture, was in reality the sense of that passage, the express intention of him who gave it, and that in this mode of exposition and application alone was to be found the “spirit which giveth life,” the “wisdom which maketh wise unto salvation.”

4. ‘On the other hand, many divines, even among those justly entitled to our respect and gratitude, fearful, perhaps, of the evils which might be supposed to result, both to those within and those without, from the admission of a principle of interpretation so lax and variable, have kept, with a prudence bordering somewhat too much upon coldness and timidity, what they esteemed the safer path; while, of later years, a school has arisen, happily not in our own church or country, but yet a school which possibly may not be without its share of influence upon our theological students, openly and professedly discarding, as irrational and unscriptural, all spiritual and allegorical interpretations whatsoever, and including in one sweeping and indiscriminate censure the human expositions of Origen and Augustine, of Coccceius and Vitringa, and the inspired parallelisms of the Epistle to the Hebrews.§

5. It becomes, therefore, a matter of grave importance to ascertain the extent to which the mystical or spiritual sense of Scripture prevails; but upon this point those who admit the general principle are far from being agreed. A writer || of high respectability in the Swedishborgian school of divinity, contends that the principle is of universal application, and that there is no part of the Bible, whatever may be the subject on which it treats, that is not invested with a secondary and spiritual meaning.¶

6. Mr. Conybeare, on the other hand, who is the most strenuous and successful advocate of the secondary sense of Scripture which modern times have produced, contends that it is only of limited application; at least, that the utmost extent to which we can consider any secondary or spiritual sense as having a character strictly argumentative, is that for which we have the direct authority of our Lord and his apostles. This is certainly the more sober and also the safer view of the subject, while it leaves open to us, in the way of illustration and moral use, the whole contents of the Bible. If we cautiously avoid multiplying the senses of Scripture, where we have neither express nor implied authority for so doing, there is no reason why we should run into the opposite extreme, and fail to draw those inferences, and make those moral applications, which the nature of the book warrants us to do, and which we cannot neglect to do without sustaining considerable loss.

7. In making these improvements and applications of scriptural subjects, the same sobriety of judgment and purity of taste must be exercised as in every other branch of interpretation. Remote and far-fetched analogies should be carefully avoided, as such a practice vitiates the religious taste, and produces a morbid longing for ingenious explications, mystical meanings, and forced resemblances; while it creates a strong disinclination for the pure milk of the word. In the interpretation of parables and allegories, especially, this suggestion should be attended to, because there is here, perhaps, a stronger temptation to give rein to the imagination than elsewhere. The general design of the composition should be ascertained, which it usually may be, from the context, and then the particular parts should each be referred to this.†† Pr. Stuart has laid it down as one of the most important principles in explaining allegories, that comparis is not to be extended to all the circumstances of the allegory; and had this rule been generally attended to by expositors, many of the extravagances that have been put forward as interpretations of Script-

|| Mr. Noble: The plenary Inspiration of the Scriptures asserted. 8vo. Lond. 1825.

¶ The Baron Swedenborg says, in ‘Arcana Celestia,’ 10,325, ‘The books of the Word are all those which have an internal sense; but they which have not are not the Word. The books of the Word in the O. T. are the 5 books of Moses, Josh. Judg. 1 and 2 Sam. 1 and 2 Kings, Psalms, Isa. Jer. Lam. Ezek. Dan. Hos. Joel. Obad. Jonah. Micah. Nah. Hab. Zeph. Hag. Zech. Mal.; and in the N. T., Mat. Mark. Luke. John, and Rev.’ Carpenter does not correctly represent Noble, who contends that vagueness and conjecture are not to be predicated of the analogical explanation of the literal to the spiritual sense of Scripture; and distinguishes the books of inspiration from those written under a ‘secondary and personal inspiration’ (such as the Hagiographa, the Acts, and the Epistles); ‘wherefore, in the former case, the very words will be inspired, and will contain a spiritual sense within them; and in the latter, the doctrinal sentiments alone will partake of inspiration.’ Appendix, p. 23. And p. 21, he says, ‘The Hagiographers were directed in the choice of their materials by the Holy Spirit, enlightened to judge of the truth and importance of those accounts from which they borrowed their information, and prevented from recording any material error.’ Compare, also, p. 9 of Noble’s Appendix. Ed.

 Bampton Lectures, p. 322.

†† It is gratifying to find that this sentiment was maintained by the celebrated Jewish writer Maimonides, who says, that ‘in explaining the Scriptures, and especially the parables, the general scope and intention of the writer is to be regarded, and not every word and syllable of the parable.’ He adds, ‘Should the expositor act contrary to this, he will lose his time in endeavoring to explain what is inexplicable, or make the author say many things he never intended. More Nevochim, in Pref.’

ture, would have been withheld. Thus, in the parable of the good Samaritan, the point to be illustrated is the extent of the duty of beneficence. Most of the circumstances in the parable go to make up merely the verisimilitude of the narration, so that it may give pleasure to him who hears or reads it. But how differently does the whole appear when it comes to be interpreted by an allegorizer of the mystic school! The man going down from Jerusalem to Jericho is Adam wandering in the wilderness of this world; the thieves who robbed and wounded him are evil spirits; the priest who passed by on the one side without relieving him is the Levitical law; the Levite is good works; the good Samaritan is Christ; and the oil and wine are grace. What may not a parable be made to mean, asks the professor, if imagination is to supply the place of reasoning and philology? And what riddle or oracle of Delphos could be more equivocal, or of more multifarious significance, than the Bible, if such exegesis be admissible? It is a miserable excuse which interpreters make for themselves, says the same writer, 'that they render the Scriptures more edifying and significant by interpreting them according to the mystic school. Are the Scriptures, then, to be made more significant than God has made them? or to be mended by the skill of the interpreter, so as to become more edifying than the Holy Spirit has made them? If there be a semblance of piety in such interpretations, a semblance is all. Real piety and humility appear to the best advantage in receiving the Scriptures as they are, and expounding them as simply and as skilfully as the rules of language will render practicable, rather than by attempting to amend and improve the revelation which God has made.'*

APPENDIX A.

The great importance of the subject to the American churches induces the Ed. to enrich this Supplement with a letter from his highly-valued friend, the Rev. Dr. Homer, giving some account of his own critical labors for ascertaining the

SOURCES OF THE COMMON ENGLISH BIBLE.

Newton, February 23d, 1833.

Friend of many years,

OFTEN in years gone by have we taken sweet counsel together upon the great subject of religion, and upon those passages of Scripture, which, as of hidden meaning, we explored together at the side of the divine originals of the Old and New Testament (or COVENANT, as Tyndale, the Bible martyr of 1536, was wont to speak). I attempt, agreeably to your expressed desire, though at the very close of your valuable and useful Bible, to aid your Appendix by a communication of some of the results of critical study, in great measure peculiar to myself.

More than sixty years ago, at the age of seventeen and eighteen, I began, by the aid of Harvard College Library, to seek an explanation of the hard passages, the verba vexata of the Germans Pfleiderer and Spanheim.—I soon began to collect notes from the highest authorities, and to write them for preservation and future use. I read attentively a critical work in favor of a New Translation of the Bible from the originals. But it left me unprejudiced against our last translators as scholars, and disposed, in future life, to attend, with open mind, to the continued investigation of their text.

My serious and my critical reading of the received translation has been my principal employment to this advanced period. My sight and my other faculties, as aids, have never failed me in the pursuit of my great object, through the goodness of God. My biblical means were slowly on the increase until 1796, when, upon a liberal importation from the Old and New Bookstore of J. Cuthell, London, by the kind agency of a resident kinsman, I then found myself in possession of an inviting addition to my literary treasures generally, and to the means of a more extended acquaintance with bibliography, including books of merit, old and new.

From my own resources, and by other aids, collected from my own country and vicinity, I continued to seek new information for myself. As I went forwards in life, my course was rendered pleasant by a further and constantly enlarging study of the Scriptures in particular.

In 1822 and 1823, I was called to some use of the little knowledge which I had acquired, and might still acquire by fresh researches, to aid an English publisher, then a Boston resident, in carrying through the press of Mr. Frost a large folio Bible, with notes and arguments, to which sundry elegant and expensive plates were annexed. It was distributed in weekly numbers, during about two years, among the subscribers, at a whole expense, unbound, of 17½ dollars, and 22 or upwards bound. It was originally the design of the publisher to follow the text and the notes of a Bible of some popularity, which had lately been received from England. Some of the notes and of the arguments prefixed to the several Scripture books being found by my examination to have been too hastily collected by its English editor, and sundry of them being of little value, even contrary sometimes to each other, or not founded in just criticism, I was invited, just as its text had arrived to the book of Leviticus, to take the whole editorial care of it, until its consummation. I should, however, have preferred a collection of arguments and notes, wholly my own, from the manuscript and book material around me. My object was not pecuniary. It was principally to save my country the disgrace of a splendid Bible with only a splendid name—the Columbian Bible. Not until I arrived at Isaiah, did I know by the printer, &c., that I had free permission, to enlarge or take from the English material whether argument or notes, and to substitute my own for it, only being careful not to interfere with the space which had been marked out, in the model of the foreign Bible text, through every page; add some notes of value to the Prophets; and to make a liberal portion of the N. T., in its appendages of argument and notes, my own. It allowed me, by an increase of pages, also, to give a complete new set of notes to the difficult book of Revelation.

By this free course, I was enabled to follow the example of Tyndale, Rogers, Cranmer, and Coverdale, the first three Bible martyrs, in marking as spurious, and as probably of Vulgate Latin authority only, our 1 Jn. 5:7, and the in eorth of 5:2; in which opinion now agree all the orthodox of Germany, and a large portion of the orthodox professors and divines of England and the United States, who have had before them the leading arguments and evidences on the subject. I annexed, also, in the margin, the words of the illustrious Calvin, Haud audeo. Id dare not positively affirm and insist on its authenticity as supported by Greek and other authority. I did also subjoin the explication, from their own commentaries before me, of Calvin and Beza, the leaders of Calvinism, so called, of the words in 5:7—*THESE THREE ARE ONE, &c. NOT ONE IN ESSENCE, BUT IN TESTIMONY. I also added the testimony of other writers, firm believers in, and even vindicators of, the divinity of Jesus Christ, the lately deceased and learned Doctors Adam Clarke and B. Boothroyd of England.†

The editing of Teal's Bible, the subscriptions for which increased from one thousand to several, during my connection with the work, and for which I received, besides promises and excuses, only four copies, was followed with a result which led to a new view of the subject of English Bible translation. A friend of rank, from England, was on a visit to his friends in and about Boston, whilst the Family and Pulpit Bible was drawing to its close. Having seen some of its numbers, and knowing my agency in correcting and preparing the work, he most generously and affectionately offered me his personal attention and aid to procure and transmit to me any books from the London market, which might enlarge my means of biblical investigation. A fair and complete copy of the English Geneva Bible of the first Queen's press edition, 1577 (the same impression with that sometimes called 1576), with its notes and plates, was sent to me, with sundry other works of value, biblical and literary. I had known what had been the principal cause of this Bible's rejection, as the substitute for the last Church Bible, by Elizabeth and her ever-obsequious primate Archbishop Parker. It was the freely-expressed anti-tyrannical principle of its translators. Their joint dedication to the queen expressed a strong hope of a further reformation in the discipline of the church; which, it has been often asserted, had been the design of Archbishop Cranmer. Their notes expressed in free language their abhorrence of tyranny, whether regal or ecclesiastical. Thence, it was known, had arisen the principal objection to the adoption of it as a National Bible succeeding that of Cranmer. The Bishops' Bible, gotten up under the eye of Mr. Parker, the primate, carried on and completed by his direction, and finally revised and published by him, soon followed the Geneva, doubtless by the consent, if not originating in the command, of the queen. It was known that the proprietors of the Geneva Bible, the active head of whom was John Bodley, Esq., the affluent father of the celebrated founder of the Bodleian Library at Oxford, had been refused the privilege of publishing it in England, between 1560 and 1575, unless they would consent to the discontinuance of their offensive free notes.

Upon examining, after its arrival, the London Queen's press copy, published under a milder primate, Grindall, at the side of an edition previously printed at Geneva, it was found that not one of its bold notes had been omitted by Bodley, &c., in order to obtain the privilege of a reprint in England. Upon comparing this with the King James's or common Bible, especially together with the Geneva critical and explanatory notes, and its informing plates and maps, I did not wonder that it had been so popular with the nation at large, notwithstanding the known dislike of Elizabeth and of her successor James. This appeared in that a fresh edition was called for annually, for 30 years or upwards, whilst only about eight editions of the other, and those principally required for the reading-desks in the churches, are known to have been published.

The Geneva Bible has stood high in the estimate of learned foreigners, and of some distinguished scholars of the Church of England. Dr. Geddes and Dr. Boothroyd view it as far superior to the James's Bible. After the Bishops' Bible and the Cranmer's came into my hands, it was found that the first was in great measure Cranmer's (as asserted by Dr. Marsh), AND THAT ABOUT TWO THIRDS OF ITS NEW and of its best text had been selected from

* Elements of Interpretation, pp. 116, 117.
† To these I may add Luther, the very head of the Protestant reformation, and his learned associates in translation. He never suffered 1 John 5:7, &c., to form a part of his German Bible. With Luther agreed W. Tyndale, author of New Testament, 1526, in his rare paraphrase on First Epistle of John, where he wholly omits 1 John 5:7. Tyndale renders the close of our verse 8, εις την ιναν, as does Jerome. How far these three men, Calvin, Beza, and Tyndale, accord with Dr. Watt's long metre doxological hymn, is left for the reader to determine.

† The Geneva city copy was in the library of Rev. Dr. Jenks.

the proscribed Geneva. This had been done without acknowledgment or apology. The very notes of the latter, so far as they were critical, are found, unchanged or condensed, spreading over the whole new COURT BIBLE. All this was doing or done, whilst the Queen and her primate were, for several continued years, positively refusing to the Geneva Bible a royal and ecclesiastical permission to be printed within the English dominions.

Yet let it be remembered and acknowledged, that the Bishops' and the King James's scholars have, in sundry instances, improved their respective trs. from the text or from the margin notes of the French Geneva, which had been neglected by English Geneva scholars.

Having examined critically the Bishops' and the James's Bibles, I searched for the English translations which had preceded the three versions, which had been hitherto under my eye. A kind Providence smiled on my attempt, from year to year, long before the publication of Mr. Dabney's useful work, Tyndale's New Test. with various text from the ancient English translators, was designed or published. This Mr. Dabney well knew when he visited me for old Bible information, especially about Tyndale's history and translation. Old English Bibles and New Testaments came in succession to my use, until, at length, the collection has been nearly complete. Each of these Bibles and New Testaments I have explored, together with the originals, also with the principal foreign versions, old and new; also with the common text, together with Eng., Heb., and Gr. Concordances, including the Sept. Gr. ver. of the O. T.

As these Bibles and Testaments came before me at different periods, the authorities from which the King James's and other translations derived their special text, became a part of my biblical collection. In 1823, I had the opportunity of tracing the whole New Testament to its English, Latin, French, and Italian sources. I saw none derived from the German Bible, but those texts, which had been originally drawn by the early translators from Luther, and were contained by their successors. Thus, so far as the common New Testament goes, I found, by collating its text with that of Bibles of an earlier date, that the term New Translation could only be applied to one eighty-fourth part, not including words and passages strictly synonymous, and repetitions or particles of no moment. The foreign version authorities, with notes appended, to which the translators had obviously looked, to form this small proportion, I found in my own library. For some years, as time was given, and other duties permitted, I have gone, in liberal measure, through each book of the Old Testament, and found, as the result, that only one twenty-eighth part of its text varies from the old English text. In the course of ten successive years, I have been frequent in attempting to trace to its critical sources the text peculiar to the common version; and I have hitherto found them in my own library.

Thus has been confirmed, by my own examination, the acknowledgment of the translators themselves, in their preface to their first Bible of 1611, that they had never thought, from the beginning, of the need of making a new translation, but out of many good translations (i.e. English and foreign), to make a good one not justly to be excepted against. That (this) hath been our endeavor; that (this) our aim. Yet for my asserting, in the Biblical Repository, that the James's Bible was not a new translation, I have been accused by a writer in the Biblical Repository of my own country, and by the very respectable editor of the London Christian Observer, of charging a falsehood upon the whole body of the translators. Yet I have believed that the translators did not wholly neglect the Hebrew and Greek originals, but did often compare the English and foreign versions which they consulted with the originals at their side, for example, Montanus's Hebrew Bible, with an interlineary Latin version placed over the Hebrew; and Erasmus's and Montanus's Greek text of the New Testament, together with the Latin version attached to each. They did, probably, examine Lexicons, Hebrew and Greek, yet not enough, in cases not few, to aid their judgment in determining their choice of text. Let it be remembered, too, that King James, and his primate, Archbishop Bancroft, were known by their workmen to be very hostile to the Geneva Bible for reasons well understood; and that the Bishops' text was to be principally followed by them as their standard, so far as the originals would admit. Besides, as variations wide from their standard could not well be received into their text, without learned notes annexed, justifying their preferred translation, and as they had been expressly forbidden by the king and by the primate the use of any notes, their Bible was therefore necessarily imperfect. Ample evidence appears, by a work of Dr. Gell, chaplain to Archbishop [Geo. Abbot], one of the translators, that some of the principal scholars in that body did repeatedly suggest new and varying translations; but they were as often checked in their progress, by being reminded, that their course would go to the making of a New Translation, which was not the object of those who had brought them together; i. e. King James and the primate, who had reluctantly consented to a substitute for the Church or Bishops' Bible. Such a substitute had been proposed and urged by the learned heads of the Puritan section of the Church. Yet the trs. were directed to keep, in the new Bible, as much of the accustomed text as might be, without violating the rules of interpretation.

Dr. Marsh has judiciously observed, in his well-known lectures, that, "to judge of our authorized version, we should have some knowledge of those previous English Bibles, out of which the Bible of King James, according to his view, had been compiled."²⁴ But to judge most impartially and properly, we should have, as far as possible, the old English Bibles, out of which our last Bible has been compiled in thirty-two thirty-three parts of its general text; we should possess, if it may be, also, the authorities which the last translators have followed in that thirty-third portion of their version of 1611, which varies from any and all of their predecessors. So far as their special text is concerned, I have been favored with the high privilege of collecting into my library, as my own, all the critical sources of the special text of the common Bible. As an article of some importance, I purchased, principally through the respectable house of the departed and lamented W. Hilliard, and Messieurs Little and associates, a very large proportion of the foreign Bibles, versions, comments, lexicons, and biblical works, which had been consulted by Tyndale, Coverdale, Rogers, Cranmer, the Bp. Coverdale, and the several deans and other learned men who gave the Geneva text and notes, together with the authors consulted to form the Bible called sometimes the Bishops' and sometimes Archbishop M. Parker's.

In the course of sixty years, my biblical critical aid has been various and extensive — a collection of three centuries and more. It has included the principal critics and men of sound learning, classical, philosophical, and biblical, English, Dutch, French, Italian, Genevese, and German, from Erasmus to the present day, besides Jerome and others of periods long passed by. Yet, until I had the opportunity of examining, at my entire leisure, the translations of the early English scholars, who appear the most deeply versed in Hebrew and Jewish Greek learning; until I had compared the several English Bibles with each other, and with the originals, and with later versions, down to 1829 and later, — I could never feel satisfied with any answer to that question, "What critical, impartial, and safe course should be adopted for furnishing a new and more complete English Bible? Shall it be a new translation? or shall it be a revisal based upon the common version?" It is obvious, that the Craumer Bible, which, in 1541, was aided by two Romanist bishops, Tonstall and Heath, is, in many parts, inferior to the Thomas Matthew of 1557. It was prepared by Craumer and others, without notes, and with a text which included between brackets many passages found only in the vulgate. It was planned and executed under the patronage of the too timid Craumer, and did not meet his own private judgment as a scholar and a Christian. This is plain by his later endeavors, under Edward VI., to procure a more perfect translation, by the aid of distinguished German scholars highly skilled in Hebrew and Greek. The Bishops' Bible, as we have asserted, is, in very large measure, Craumer's, as Dr. Marsh asserts, probably from his own personal examination. Its design was, principally, to prevent the adoption of the text as accompanied by the free notes of the Geneva Bible. Pfeiffer calls it Elizabeth's opposition Bible. The influence of King James, of his stern, self-willed, and worldly primate, and of a few other dignitaries, made our last translation, in many parts, less perfect than it would have been, had the best scholars of the body (probably about twelve prime Hebrew and Greek scholars) been permitted and encouraged to proceed to a new translation, so perfect as their private learning and independent judgment might dictate. Their course should have been, without undue respect for that translation, the Bishops' of 1568, which, in 1603, had been rejected by all parties at the Hampton Conference, by reason of its disclosed and acknowledged defects respecting the original text in each Testament. Shall we, then, the people of a free republic, English in our origin and language as a nation — shall we, I say, who are independent of Great Britain (which yet we love nationally) in both church and state, hold our Bible at the will of the despotic James, a king noted for pedantry, passion, self-will, and wanton abuse of speech before others, and of his cringing primate, the violent persecutor, who drove the early fathers and mothers of the New England Separatists to Holland, about the time of the first publication of the last Bible? Shall we be, partly at least, under the forbidding frown of the imperious Elizabeth, directed against the very first men of the church in her early queen period — I mean Bishop Coverdale, the learned and the holy, who furnished the first complete English Bible in 1535, with his three deans and four others, all the first scholars of their age? Shall we still encourage James and Bancroft, so long after their death, in their jealousies of the Geneva text? Shall we overlook jealousies founded in their dread of those bold notes, which, cherished by those of Puritan blood and education, led at last to the English revolution in 1688, and, remotely, to our own, in 1776? Shall we, in this age of fast-advancing biblical knowledge, and of our numerous American professors in our theological schools, of talents and learning highly honorable, — shall we decline or refuse to consult the text of our received version, at the side of the sister Bibles and their respective author's, at the side of pure original text, and at the side of the prime pal translators, from Erasmus and Luther to, say 1538, or later, — shall we, in a period of growing research, and inquiry after truth of fact and doctrine from the Scripture, and in a country which has a present abundance of critical and grammatical aid, withhold that correction of text and interpretation, in which the mass of the learned, liberal, and orthodox, have had and still have a general agreement? I pause for the public to reply, with seriousness and candor becoming so all-interesting a subject?

* The well-intending, and probably learned author of the article in the Biblical Repository, about two years since, and the wise and good Mr. Wilkes, editor of the Christian Observer, may find, by recurring to the fourteenth lecture of Professor Marsh, that I have not been the first writer who has viewed the common version as a compilation from others. The only difference between Dr. Marsh and me, is in favor of the King James's body, in that he appears to view the common Bible as a mere compilation from the former English Bibles, whilst I pronounce one thirty-third proportion of its whole text to be drawn from foreign versions and comments.

PART II.

BIBLICAL BOOKS.*

CHAPTER I.

OF THE PENTATEUCH.

1. The books comprised under this title are mentioned, in several parts of Scripture, as 'the Law,' and 'the Law of Moses'; they are cited as the indisputable works of Moses, and have been received as such by every sect of the Jewish and Christian churches. Immediately after their composition, they were deposited in the tabernacle, and thence transferred to the temple, where they were preserved with the most vigilant care. The Pentateuch was read every Sabbath-day in the synagogues, and again publicly and solemnly every 7th year. The prince was obliged to copy it; and the people were commanded to teach it to their children, and to wear it 'as signs on their hands, and frontlets between their eyes.' By the special providence of God, a sufficient number of these books was always preserved; and the high veneration with which the Jews regarded every letter, called forth numerous guardians to watch over its purity, and preserve its integrity.† The Pentateuch furnishes us with a compendious history of the world, from the creation till the arrival of the Israelites on the verge of Canaan — a period of above 2553 years, according to the vulgar computation; or of 3765 years, according to the chronology of Dr. Hales.‡ It blends revelation and history together, furnishes laws, and describes their execution, exhibits prophecies and relates their accomplishment. Some of the principal details of the Pentateuch are confirmed by pagan tradition, and the earliest uninspired historical records which exist can only be rendered intelligible by the superior and more consistent histories of Moses.§

2. The duty of studying these venerable

‡ See Tables. Eb.

§ Dr. Morrison, in his 'View of China for Philological Purposes,' gives a Chronological Table of Chinese History, from '1st, T'hung k'eon-kaung-mih, in 100 vols., by Choo-foo-tsoe, the celebrated commentator on the "Four-books," (the well-known elementary treatises of education, by Confucius and his followers; a copy is in the hands of the Ed.) 2d, Urh-shih-yih-she, "The Twenty-one Historians," in 22 vols.; and, 3d, Kang-k'eon-hwuy-tsueen, in 34 vols., by Fung-chow, [which the Ed. also has, through the kindness of the late Dr. Morrison] also, 4th, an Imperial Table of the Cycles of 60 years; and, lastly, the Lee-tae-ke-u'en-p'een-lan, a Chronological Table here followed.

See, also, Gutzlaff's China, Murray's, and Davis's do., the two latter intended for popular use.

Of the CHINESE REIGNES about and just beyond 1400 B.C., Dr. M. says, 'This part is evidently under great obligations to historians of subsequent times.' Beyond 2000 B.C., they are quite obscure; beyond 2300 to 3369, (when Choo-foo-tsoe begins his history,) Dr. Morrison says, 'Here all is obscure,' Choo-foo-tsoe remarks, 'Several things affirmed of this period, were all pushed up by persons who lived in subsequent ages.' Behind this it is the 'Fabulous period,' viz. the reign of 9 brothers, 18,000 years; of 11, 18,000; of 12, 45,000; then comes Pwan-koo, who first appeared when the heavens and earth were separated. He is represented as clothed with a kind of apron of leaves, and holds in one hand the sun, and in the other the moon. In 3254 is put Fuh-he, who taught agriculture, fishing, the care of cattle, marriage, music, &c. 'Fang-kwan-shaw says,' 'Tae-keih, ('the First Principle,') MOVING, produced Yang; at REST, or still, produced Yin... These produced Wan-wuh, i.e. 'All Things,' exclusive of Heaven, Earth, and Man. Wan-wuh existing, Shing-jin, 'Perfect man,' were born. But' (he adds) 'how is it credible that more than 10,000 years elapsed, as is asserted, (after the existence of Tae-keih,) before Yang was produced, and the heavens spread; and that 10,000 years more elapsed before Yin was produced, and the earth formed; that 10,000 more passed before Yin and Yang united, to produce the various material existences, (expressed by Wan-wuh;) and further, that 40 or 50,000 years more passed away, before the process of Yin and Yang was finished, and the Shing jin appeared? Such a tale is contrary to all sense and reason.' From Yaou and Shun [Tang-te-yaou 2169, and Yu-te-shun 2230 B.C., the time of the Chinese deluge] to the present time, is not more than 3000 and odd years... How can it be believed that 40 or 50,000 years elapsed after the formation of the heavens and the earth, before man appeared, or the earth and the water were adjusted, and food supplied to human beings? or that (if the world had existed so long) these things should not have been arranged before Fuh-he, and his successor? It is evident that Pwan-koo, who acted at the separation of the heavens and earth, could not have been long before Fuh-he, perhaps 1000 years, certainly not 10,000; and the time of Fuh-he must have been very near Yaou and Shun; perhaps a hundred years, certainly not a thousand. No scholar should decline a thorough inquiry.' Fung-chow.

Morrison. This reminds us of the facts of geology, note, end of Job; and the Ed. agrees with Fung-chow's closing remark, and sees nothing absurd, irreconcile, or contradictory to Moses, in the geological proofs of a series of periods, of any definite length, embracing the creation of matter, the formation of the earth into one mass, the establishment of the physical laws, the filling it with organic life, and the final preparation of it for human life, and the animals and plants which now exist. See several articles, for and against, in the Bib. Repos. by Prof. Stuart and Hitchcock.

The HISTORIC CHRONOLOGER, founded, says Mr. S. Davis, on actual astronomical calculations, embraces a calpus, i. o. 4,320,000,000 of our years, of which the half is now passed. This calpus is made up of 14 mancanturas of 368,449,000, each, and one sandhi of 1,728,000. Or it is divided into Maha yugas, ("great periods, eras"), each of 4 lesser yugas, viz. Saty-yug, 1,728,000; Treta-yug, 1,296,000; Dwapa yug, 864,000; Kali-yug, 432,000.

GUIDE.

GUIDE TO THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

records of antiquity results from their formal part of the revealed will of God, and from the circumstance that many of the events recorded in them adumbrate others under the Christian dispensation. All these things happened unto them for ensamples, (or types,) and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come.' 1 Co. 10:11.

of [more or less] fully developed civilization. All these results may be traced to the 18th dynasty of Egyptian kings, of whom, as by another miracle, after an interval of 3000 years, Rosellini supplies us with details not less accurate and ample, in some respects, than those we possess of the Plantagenet dynasty of England, or the Capetian line of France.

But it is in codification with the Hebrew chronology that the stone of Abydos must be looked to. It looked to with the patronizing pretensions of giving time to revelation by forcing back dates for the peopling of the world, between the interval from Peleg, (contemporary with Menes, the first Egyptian king,) in whose time colonization first took place, to the pastoral 'irruption' — it would involve us in a labyrinth of inextricable absurdity. Every political economist and physiologist knows perfectly that there was ample time — and America will prove it at once — not only to produce the alleged amount of population in the world at the time when the second great era of colonization took place by the expulsion of the Shepherds — not only to people the world in the parsimonious manner which the opening history of every nation evinces — but, if wars and natural evils did not diminish or obstruct multiplication, as much as it was peopled at the Christian era. See our 24th No.'

Now, 'We consider the proof ample and sufficient that the 2d line of 18 ovals on this famous stone, returning from the last to the 7th, embraces the kings of the 18th dynasty. The 6 preceding ones are more doubtful; they were possibly either the 6 pastoral kings whom the 18th dynasty expelled, viz. S. Latis, Baon, Apophis, Apachis, Janias, and Arcles; or the 6 contemporary Egyptian Kings, who maintained a collateral shadow of their authority after their flight into Nubia. [Note Ez. 39; end.] According to very probable tradition — considering that we are referring to a Cyclopean era, it was the first of these Shepherds, Salatis, who built the great pyramid, [Cut, p. 725, vol. iii.] All the other monumental records of this time are imperfect and indistinct, as might naturally be expected. This intelligible view leaves the first line of ovals on the Abydos stone, and which is in a very imperfect state, to Menes, the Misraim of Scripture, and his immediate 7 or 8 descendants; and to those 7 imaginary personages whom Eusebius charges Mænætus with "lying" in calling gods, but who become inadmissible links in this perspicuous genealogical chain, if we conceive them to be the 7 antediluvian patriarchs of the line of Cain, who, with the first Osiris (Adum) would precisely fill up all the oval hollowes of this extraordinary monument. Osiris, Typhon, Horus, Vulcan, Annibis, Apollo, Ammon, are among the names of the gods supposed to have preceded Menes; and the learned reader, in looking at the imperfect titles of the first line of the tablet of Abydos, will, we think, see among them some of the titular symbols of these very gods. But we throw out this hint merely as conjectural; we neither consider it proved, nor necessary to be, as far as our theory is concerned. All we consider proved is, that everything is vague respecting the monumental and architectural antiquities of Egypt, until the era of the founder of the 18th dynasty, called Amosis by the chroniclers, [notes, end of Ge. and Ez. 30; end.] and whose titular oval stands 7th on the 2d line of the stone of Abydos. From that time, the strongest light is poured upon Egyptian history... All the gorgeous details of the haughty courts of the Pharaohs, of which we merely obtain glimpses in the Bible, are brought before us by Rosellini, with the vivid efficacy of some phantasmagoric exhibition of departed things and persons. We see the portrait of the Pharaoh who received and elevated Joseph as his prime minister, given with the accuracy of a profile of William IV. We see, with the same accuracy, in all the colored varieties of court costume, and accompanied by all the picturesque or grotesque insignia of ancient office, the wives, daughters, princes, generals, pontiffs, not only of this prince, separated from us by so vast a chronological chasm, but of all his immediate successors up to the culminating point of the dynasty's ambitious magnificence, which terminated with the great Sesostri. We see the portrait of that prince a hundred times repeated, and are made not only more familiar with it than with any of the dubious portraits of the other conquerors of antiquity, but as familiar as with the portraits of Napoleon, Wellington, or Nelson. We see in the same phantasmagorical procession of defunct sovereigns — although we consider the proof not made out as to the identical sovereignty — the accurately delineated portrait of that arrogant Pharaoh, who, relying on his own autocracy, dared to oppose his own decisions to those of the Almighty — to oppose the natural magic, or philosophical conquests over matter obtained by his priestly monasteries and scientific colleges, against the miracles of God's vicegerent, and though, like the modern jugglers of the East, successful in the first 3, yet triumphed over, as they would be, in the 4th, the production of the lowest form of life — who dared, in fine, to pursue God's chosen people through the opening of the Red Sea, and to display his audacious banner, thus singularly preserved and displayed before us on the stone of Abydos, amidst the ominous radiance of the fiery column which guided and protected the flying Israelites.'

'We hasten to the striking corroborations of Scripture supplied by Egyptian discovery generally, but more particularly by the most recent illustrations of Rosellini... It is to be inferred from both Manetho and Josephus, that it was during the time of the Shepherds, and during the collateral reign of the Pharaoh Osortasen, one of the expelled native princes, that the founder of the oldest obelisk extant on the site of ancient Heliopolis, that Abraham was in Egypt. This would give the date B. C. 1846; as Peleg's colonization, contemporary with that of Menes, would give B. C. 2227 as the date of the foundation of the Egyptian monarchy. It is again to be inferred from both, that the Shepherds being expelled after a dynasty of 250 years, by the Pharaoh Thothmosis, (who used the beetle for his heraldic device on his banners, shield, and signet ring, [Ge. 41:42; cuts under word 'Beetle' and 'Signet-ring,' in Concordances,] as did his 4 successors,) it was during the splendid reign of his successor Amenophis that the vice-royalty of Joseph and the settlement of the Hebrew colony in Egypt took place; and that it was during the course of the reigns of the same dynasty, the 18th, that the departure of the Israelites under Moses, called Osarsiphi, a priest of Heliopolis, by Manetho, indisputably occurred; under which king does not appear to be clearly established. The era of the famous Mitis, the 10th of them, is demonstrably fixed at B. C. 1325. [Note, end of Ge.] We submit the combined evidence of Manetho and Josephus, because they are corroborated by the pictorial narrative of the monuments recently discovered. According to Manetho, the Shepherd kings, on their expulsion, marched by the way of the wilderness into Judea, and there built a city called Jerusalem — an evident confusion of two eras, and two people of the same pastoral origin. The historian afterwards introduces us to another race of the same people afflicted with leprosy, in number 800,000, and put to labor in the stone quarries on the E. side of the Nile. He then proceeds with the following extraordinary narrative: — Phar. oh being plied with petitions in behalf of these people for some place of safe and easy retreat, they pitched upon Avars, the seat of the former Shepherds. (This is evidently the land of Rameses or Goshen, embraced within the semicircular circuit of the old canal of the Pharaohs from Heliopolis to the Red Sea, and still partly extant.) The prince granted them this boon, and no sooner were they settled in it, than, finding it a commodious spot for rebellion, they listed themselves under Osarsiphi, a priest of Heliopolis, and took an oath of fidelity to him.

'Here Osarsiphi is obviously the phonetic designation of the word Joseph, the title Sar, prince or lord, being embodied with it. The two great Jewish leaders are confounded — and Joseph is called a priest of Heliopolis or On, by a substitution of his father-in-law's function. But Manetho adds that this priest, changing his religion, changed his name to Moses. The oath above stated was, that they should abstain from any of the meats which the Egyptians accounted holy, and not worship any of the Egyptian gods. Here the corroborative passage of Ge. 43:32, will naturally occur to the reader. Manetho proceeds to state, that this revolting leperous people called in the aid of the expelled Shepherds from Manetho (a tribe of the same nation as themselves). The allies committed greater ravages than before; so that Amenophis, the king, took shipping and fled into Ethiopia. But he returned after a certain interval (13 years) with his son Rameses — routed the allied Shepherd kings, and drove them with great slaughter into Syria.'

'We need not insist upon the striking analogies of biblical and profane evidence in the above passage. We shall confine ourselves to the statement of one inference and two facts: — 1st. Religious rites and the distinction of food into clean and unclean, which did not exist in the time of Osarsiphi and Abraham, who both had cattle, and apparently worshipped the same God, as evidently existed in the time of Amenophis and Joseph; as appears from the scriptural history of the Egyptians and Joseph and his brethren dining at different tables. 2d. The agreement of both profane and sacred history with the evidences of the monuments, that "every shepherd was an abomination to the Egyptians." 3d. That the profane accounts perfectly concur with the extant Egyptian monuments in showing that the Egyptian rulers, like other rulers of modern times, gave a falsified and favorable gloss to what may be called their pictorial bulletin of the real history of the exodus. But Manetho gave it just as he found it recorded in pictures preserved and brought to our eyes. In these pictorial records from which he copied, we see the Jews evidently described, as he relates, in a state of armed insurrection against a monarch bearing the name of Rameses. They are seen intrenching themselves against his armies by cutting down trees — and finally entering into a contract with him.'

'We have hinted before our exclusive presumption that it was under the first Pharaoh, named Rameses, that the exodus took place; inasmuch as before that event the captive Jews are employed in building a transverse city called by his name; and the land they occupied was so called... This Rameses is the king called otherwise Armais — but by the Greeks Danans; his titular oval is the last but one on the Rosetta stone; which last one is Rameses II., called Me-Amon. Among other strong corroborations of this opinion, is the fact that this Armais was expelled, and succeeded, as the stone of Abydos shows, by a Rameses, (the Rameses Belus of the historians,) who came from an eastern country, like Memnon (comp. Me-Amon) or Ismedenes, the founder of the Memnonium. He would naturally be liable to the Hebrew allegation that he "knew not Joseph." Ex. 1:8. Now, Armais, the Greek Danans, is stated to be his brother. The whole narrative of his expulsion is accompanied by arktis symbols which record the drowning of some Egyptian prince.'

'Many striking corroborations of this view might be added; but we leave the prosecution of the suggestion to learned leisure — merely remarking, that some diluvial action of the Red Sea, under the name of Typhon, who is recorded to have perished by a thunderbolt almost at the point where the Israelites entered it, is clearly traceable to this period. This is certain, that all the recently-discovered Egyptian monuments — and the stone of Abydos inferentially among the rest — point clearly to some mysterious and humiliating event connected with this era. Petamon, who immediately preceded Armais, and whose noble and handsome portrait Rosellini gives, had, beyond a doubt, a brother, holding insurgent or divided empire at Karac; both being called Petamon, but one distinguished by the symbol of his patron god Osiris, the other of his patron god Ammon. These are the two kings whom Champion gratuitously and absurdly calls Mandonei and Osirei. Nothing, in fact, was ever more clear in the phonetic language than their name — subsequently one of the most common names in Egypt. Now, the mark of some flagrant disgrace is evidently inflicted on one of these brothers, who appears to have been at war with, or banished by the other. A universal decree of the priestly colleges and of the nation seems to have aimed at obliterating the name of the one characterized by the symbol of Osiris from the list of Egyptian Pharaohs. The obliteration of his titular oval is effected with so much pertinacity, wherever it is found, that no one can doubt that he was adjudged either to have suffered some great misfortune, or to have committed some great offence against the Egyptian theocracy and people. Perhaps the obliteration of his patron saint or god might be intended to convey, by the short hand of Egyptian record, that his god had deserted him, that god being, also, the symbol of a death by deluge, and that he himself was obliterated "from the book of life."

'Rosellini gives a complete series of portraits, not only of the 18th dynasty, but of all the Egyptian kings, whether Pharaohs or Ptolemies, who succeeded them. Among them are seen the Pharaohs mentioned by name in Scripture — Taraka, Zerah, Pharaoh-Necho, the famous Sabbathos, or So, (in Hebrew characters Snach,) the Seveccus of the monuments. The same portrait-gallery also gives the portrait of Pharaoh-Hophra, denounced in Scripture — and the portrait of Anasis, who realized the denunciation against him. Lastly, it exhibits the face of the famous Shishak, his family, dynasty, and some of his contemporaries.' Foreign Quarterly Review, No. 22.

'A short harmony of Scripture with the Egyptian monumental records is attempted by Greppo, in his 'Essay,' &c., but a thorough collation, by some ripe critic and pious scholar, is still a very great desideratum.'

As to the BABYLONIAN OR ASSYRIAN CHRONOLOGY, (which also pretends, with the Indian, Chinese, and Egyptian, to compete with the Mosaic,) sea the note from Spineto, at the end of Genesis; where it is ingeniously made to confirm the inspired record. Eo.

SECTION I.

THE BOOK OF GENESIS.

1. Moses is universally considered to have been its author,² and it is believed that he wrote it after the promulgation of the law. Its authenticity is attested by the most indisputable evidence, and it is cited as an inspired record thirty-three times in the course of the Scriptures. Its history comprises a period of about 2369 years, according to the lowest computation; but according to Dr. Hales, a much longer period.³ It contains an account of the creation (1: 2); the primeval state and fall of man (3); the history of Adam and his descendants, with the progress of religion and the origin of the arts (1); the genealogies, age, and death of the patriarchs, until Noah (5); the general delusion and corruption of mankind, the general deluge, and preservation of Noah and his family in the ark (3); the history of Noah and his family subsequent to the time of the deluge (9); the repeopling and division of the earth among the sons of Noah (19); the building of Babel, the confusion of tongues, and the dispersion of mankind (11); the lives of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph (12-50).

2. 'It may be asked how a detail so circumstantial and minute could have been preserved when there was no writing of any kind, and when the earth, whose history is here given, had already existed more than 2000 years. To this inquiry a very satisfactory answer may be given. There are only three ways in which these important records could have been preserved and brought down to the time of Moses: viz. writing, tradition, and divine revelation. In the antediluvian world, when the life of man was so protracted, there was comparatively little need for writing of any kind, and perhaps no alphabetical writing then existed. Tradition answered every purpose to which writing in any kind of characters could be subservient; and the necessity of erecting monuments to perpetuate public events could scarcely have suggested itself, as during those times there could be little danger apprehended of any important fact becoming obsolete, as its history had to pass through very few hands, and all these friends and relatives in the most proper sense of the terms for they lived in an insulated state—under a patriarchal government. Thus it was easy for Moses to be satisfied of the truth of all he relates in the book of Genesis, as the accounts came to him through the medium of very few persons. From Adam to Noah there was but one man necessary to the correct transmission of the history of this period of 1656 years. Now, this history was, without doubt, perfectly known to Methuselah, who lived to see them both. In like manner Shem connected Noah and Abraham, having lived to converse with both; as Isaac did with Abraham and Joseph, from whom these things might be easily conveyed to Moses by Imram, who was contemporary with Joseph. Supposing, then, all the curious

Elohim, in the other Ierohah, as will be seen by comparing Ge. 6:5 with C:12; 6:7 with 6:15; 7:2 with 6:19; 7:3 with 6:20; 7:5 with 6:22; 7:1 with 6:18; 7:8 with 7:11, &c.

² See Robinson's Calmet, art. PENTATEUCH. 'The system, however,' adds Mr. Taylor, 'is not without its difficulties.'

See the critics, Ed.

³ See Tablea; also note, end of Ge. Dr. A. C. has given the chron. of Ge. at the close of his commentary on it.

In the chapters and verses I have, in general, followed the divisions in the best Masoretic Bibles, from which our common English Bibles will, in some cases, be found to differ a little.

In the synagogues the law is read entirely through in the fifty Sabbaths of their lunar year; for they join certain sections together, which are noticed at the end of the tables. But in their intercalated years, in which they add a month, they have then fifty-four Sabbaths; and this is one reason why we find fifty-four Pareschahs, and fifty-four Haphtaras, instead of fifty-two. See the concluding tables.

When Antochus Epiphantes conquered the Jews, about B.C. 168, he forbade the law to be publicly read in the synagogues, on pain of death. The Jews, that they might not be wholly deprived of the word of God, selected from other parts of the sacred writings fifty-four portions, which were termed Haphtaras, הַפְתָּרָה haphtaroth, from חִפְרָה patur, be dismissed, let loose, open—for though the Law was dismissed from their synagogues, and was closed to them by the edict of this persecuting king, yet the prophetic writings, not being under the interdict, were left open, and therefore they used them in place of the others. It was from this custom of the Jews, that the primitive Christians adopted theirs of reading a lesson every Sabbath out of the Old and New Testaments; and on this custom, the practice of the church in our own country, in reading certain portions of the epistles and gospels every Sunday in the year, was founded.

As a proper knowledge of these Haphtaras or prophetic sections may sometimes help to fix the chronology of some events in the N. T., it hath been deemed proper to give a table of them in connection with the Pureshas or sections of the law, in the place of which they were originally read; and with which, ever since the days of the Asmoneans & Maccabees, they continue to be read in the various synagogues belonging to the English, Portuguese, Italian, Dutch, and German Jews.

From the above table the reader will perceive that though the Jews are agreed in the sections of the law that are read every Sabbath, yet they are not agreed in the Haphtaras or sections from the prophets; as it appears above, that the Dutch and German Jews differ in several cases from facts recorded in Genesis had no other authority than the tradition already referred to, they would stand upon a foundation of credibility superior to any that the most reputable of the ancient Greek and Latin historians can boast. Yet, to preclude all possibility of mistake, the unerring Spirit of God directed Moses in the selection of his facts and the ascertaining of his dates. Indeed, the narrative is so simple, so much like truth, so consistent every where with itself, so correct in its dates, so impartial in its biography, so accurate in its philosophical details, so pure in its morality, and so benevolent in its design, as amply to demonstrate that it never could have had an earthly origin. In this case, also, Moses constructed every thing, according to the pattern which God showed him in the mount.*

SECTION II.

THE BOOK OF EXODUS.

1. This book is universally ascribed to Moses, and is cited as his work by David, Daniel, and others of the sacred writers. Rivet has remarked, that 25 passages are quoted from it by Christ and his apostles in express words, and 19 as to the sense. Exodus embraces the history of about 145 years, from A. M. 2369 to A. M. 2514, inclusive; —from the death of Joseph to the erection of the tabernacle. It contains an account of the tyranny exercised by Pharaoh over the Israelites,† with their wonderful increase (1:); the birth, preservation, education, and exile of Moses (2:); his divine legislation (3: 4:); the infliction of the eight first plagues (4:29–10:21); the institution of the passover (12:1–21); the last two plagues (10:21–12: 21–31); the departure of the Israelites (12: 31–37, 40–42); their miraculous passage of the Red Sea, &c. (12:43–15:22); their subsequent journeys in the wilderness (15: 23–19:2); the promulgation of the law from Sinai, the defection of the Israelites, the renewal of the tables, and the erection of the tabernacle (19:3–10).

2. It should be remarked, that many events recorded in this book adumbrate the state of the church in the wilderness of this world, until her arrival at the promised Canaan—the eternal rest.‡ See 1 Co. 10:1, &c. This idea will help to point out the consistency subsisting between the old and the new dispensations, with an eye to which the Bible should ever be read. In this book are also presented several types of the Messiah; such as Moses, De. 18:15; Aaron, He. 4: 14–16; 5:1, 5; the paschal lamb, Ex. 12: 19–36; the manna, Ex. 16:15. 1 Co. 10:3; the rock in Horeb, Ex. 17:6. 1 Co. 10:4; and the mercy-seat; Ex. 37:6. Ro. 3:25. He. 4:16.

SECTION III.

THE BOOK OF LEVITICUS.

1. This book is cited as the work of Moses in 2 Ch. 30:16. Da. 9:13; and as an inspired writing in Jer. 7:22, 23. 2 Co. 6:16. 1 Pe. 1:16. There are no data furnished in the book by which a chronological arrangement of the facts narrated in it can be effected. It contains an account of the laws concerning sacrifices and offerings (1: 7:); of the institution of the priesthood (8:–10:); of clean and unclean animals, &c. (11:); of the laws concerning atonement (12:–15:); of the great day of atonement

(16:); the place of offering sacrifices, things prohibited, marriage, and various acts of impurity; the sum of consecrating children to Moloch, consulting wizards, &c. (17:–20:); laws relative to the conduct and persons of the priests (21: 22:); laws concerning the sacred festivals, vows, things devoted, and tithes (23:–27:).

2. The style in which the rites and ceremonies described in this book are given, and the manner in which their minute particulars are so often repeated, show that they were expressive of something beyond the mere letter, and were prefigurative of gospel appointments. The sacrifices and oblations were significant of the atonement of Christ; their requisite qualities were emblematical of his immaculate character; and the prescribed mode in their form, and the mystical rites ordained, were allusive institutions, calculated to enlighten the apprehensions of the Jews, and to prepare them for the reception of the gospel. The institution of the high-priesthood typified Jesus, the great High-Priest. The prohibition of meats as unclean, taught the avoidance of what God prohibits; and the various kinds of uncleannesses, with their prescribed expiations, illustrated the necessity and importance of internal purity and holiness. Care, however, must be taken not to overstrain these ideas, nor to run into excess in the mode of interpreting the ritual law; for although it is certain that a great number of its most important institutions were designed to point to another and a fuller dispensation, there were, nevertheless, some imposed only as punishments on a rebellious people, and as a voice to restrain them from idolatry; and others, as a mark to discriminate and keep them apart from all other nations.|| The book of Leviticus and the Epistle to the Hebrews should be read together, as they mutually illustrate each other.

SECTION IV.

THE BOOK OF NUMBERS.

1. This book, it would seem from 36:13, was penned by Moses in the plains of Moab. It is cited as an inspired work in various parts of Scripture. See 2 Ch. 29:11. Ez. 20:13. Mat. 12:5. 1 Co. 10:1–10, &c. It contains a history of the Israelites, from the 1st day of the 2d month of the 2d year, after their departure out of Egypt, to the beginning of the 11th month of the 40th year of their journeys; from A. M. 2514 to A. M. 2552. The whole of the book may be considered as a diary; and is the most ancient book of travels ever published. The route taken by the Israelites under the direction of their inspired leader has been traced out by modern travellers, and many places here mentioned still bear the same name, and correspond exactly in their geographical situation. This book contains an account of the enumeration and marshalling of the people (1: 2:); the census of the Levites, and their appointment to the service of the tabernacle (3: 4:); the institution of various legal ceremonies (5: 6:); the offerings of the princes (7:); the consecration of the Levites (8:); the celebration of the passover (9:); regulations for fixing and removing the camp (10:1–10); the order of the march, &c. (10:11–36); the journey through the wilderness to the land of Moab (11:–21:); the transactions in the plains of Moab (22:–30:); the defeat of the Midianites and the offerings to the Lord (31:); the division of the land east of the Jordan, &c. (32:–36:).

2. The book contains one signal prediction relative to the Messiah (24:17, 19), and in the Targums of Jonathan and Onkelos it is so interpreted.

SECTION V.

THE BOOK OF DEUTERONOMY.

1. This book, from a comparison of 15 with 34:1, appears to have been written by Moses in the plains of Moab, a short time prior to his death. It is cited as his work in 2 Ch. 23:1. Da. 9:13, &c.; and is often quoted as an inspired writing by Christ and his apostles. It embraces the history of about 5 weeks; from the 1st day of the 11th month of the 40th year, to the 7th day of the 12th month. It contains a comprehensive recapitulation of the laws given by Moses, enlarged with many explanations and additions, and enforced by the strongest and most pathetic exhortations to obedience; and was no doubt intended for the benefit of those born in the wilderness, and who consequently were not present at the giving of the law on Sinai. The variations in expression observable in the repetition of the law have been considered as an intimation that its spirit, rather than its letter, is that which is to be regarded.

2. In this book may be found the pathos and sublimities of religion, in a strain not to be surpassed in any part of the O. T. It embraces a rehearsal and republication of the law by the great prophet of it himself; with a survey of the wonders of Egypt and the wilderness; the past acts of God's mighty arm, working in terror and in mercy; the stipulated blessings of obedience (which may be called the Mosaic beatitudes); and a terrific insight into the future plagues of the apostate people. Of the majesty of the book, and its impressiveness in these particulars, a calm and deliberate perusal can alone convey a just idea. It also helps us to trace the progressive scheme of Scripture; for in its doctrinal character and use, it may be set above the simpler and earlier promulgation of the law, as recorded in Exodus; while it may be marked as only approaching to the practical standard of faith and personal obedience exhibited in the doctrines, promises, and precepts of the prophets. The considerate reader will judge whether this account of the expansion of the divine law by the later prophets be not a just one. If it be admitted, one use and intent of their mission will be better understood; and the remote members of revelation will be seen to compose a consistent whole, not by uniformity, but progression, every part of it silently advancing toward the spirit and perfection of the gospel.¶

3. The book contains a recapitulation of the transactions in the wilderness (1:–3:); an affectionate exhortation to the obedience and love of God (4:); a repetition of the moral law (5:–11:); a repetition of some parts of the ceremonial law (12:–16:); a repetition of sundry judicial laws (17:–18:14:); a promise of the GREAT PROPHET, and of a covenant between Jehovah and the Israelites (18:15 to end, 19:–26:); directions for the confirmation of the law on the people's arrival in Canaan (27:–30:); the appointment of Joshua as the successor of Moses (31:); the prophetic song of Moses, and the blessing of the tribes (32: 33:); and the death and burial of the great lawgiver (34:).

"Independently of other evidence drawn from the ploughed language to prove that the drawings of Rosellini [given in part at p. 35, vol. iii. of Vommiss.] are Jews, no cursory reader, who glances at their lineaments and persons, will for a moment doubt their identity. These Jews are employed, under the dynasty of the very kings contemporary with Moses, in the specific act of slavery, which he and Manetho both describe—namely, making bricks and working in the quarries. An Egyptian task-master superintends the work; and the bricks, according to their delineation, are precisely those which are found in walls constructed of bricks, the date of which is assignable to the era in question." For. Qu. Rev. No. 28. En.

CHAPTER II.

OF THE HISTORICAL BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

1. SACRED history differs from every other species of authentic history in this; that while the latter records events and details facts simply, the former combines them with the doctrines of Providence, and demonstrates the event to be coincident with the purposes of an Eternal Mind. The connection of every mode of communicating the will of God to man, with moral and eternal purposes, is a feature of divine revelation never to be overlooked; and sacred history is but a part of that revelation. In preparing mankind for another world, the universal Parent has adopted and recorded a certain process with individuals, with families, and with nations, in this.* The historical books, then, form part of those Scriptures written under the inspiration of the Spirit of God, and are therefore free from error, and to be resorted to 'for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness,' because 'whatsoever was written aforetime was written for our learning.' Ro. 15:4.

2. It is evident from a close examination of the historical books, that they are collections from the authentic records of the Jewish nation, which were carefully kept by the priests or other publicly-appointed persons.† These collections, though generally made while the events were fresh in memory, and by persons who were contemporaries with the periods to which they severally relate, appear to have been thrown into their present form, and to have received some additions, at a much later period. The work of collecting and revising has been attributed to the joint labors of Jeremiah and Ezra. It is enough for us to know that the authenticity of the books, in their present form, has been attested by Christ and his apostles.

3. The historical writings of the O. T. comprise 12 books—from Jos. to Est. incl., and contain a compendium of the Jewish history, from the death of Moses to the reformation by Nehemiah, after the return from Babylon—A. M. 2555 to A. M. 3395.

4. While the twelve tribes were united under one government, their history is represented under one point of view. [See tables, end of Est., &c.] When a separation took place, the kingdom of Judah, from which the Messiah was to descend, was the chief object of attention with the sacred historians; they treat, however, of the events which occurred in Samaria, especially when connected with the concerns of Judah. It should be remarked, that in their chronological accounts, the sacred writers generally calculate in round numbers, and also assume various eras. In Ge. Moses reckons by the ages of the patriarchs; in Ex. from the departure out of Egypt. Other writers, living in later times, compute from the building of the temple; from the commencement of the reigns of their several kings; from the captivities and deliverances of the people, and other important national events; or, lastly, from the reigns of foreign kings. The difficulties which occur on a superficial perusal of the historical Scriptures, chiefly originate in a want of attention to these considerations; and those persons who have not the leisure or industry to elucidate such particulars, will do well rather to collect the obvious instruction so richly spread through every page of the sacred volume, than to engage in speculations of delicate discussion. The historical books, like all other parts of Scripture, have every mark of genuine and unaffected truth. Many relations are interwoven with accounts of other nations, yet no inconsistencies have ever been detected.

5. We now proceed to notice the historical books, in the order in which they are placed in our Bibles.

* The reader is referred to an ably-written paper on the uses and claims of sacred history, in the Encyclopædia Metropolitana, which will abundantly repay the labor of an attentive reading. [Compare also Tur-

SECTION I.
THE BOOK OF JOSHUA.

1. That Joshua was its author, was the general opinion prevailing in the Jewish and also in the ancient Christian church; and it is also strongly intimated by internal evidence. See 5:1, and 24:26. The objections urged against this hypothesis, from the alleged marks of the book having been written posterior to this time, such as 4:9, 8:28, 15:63, may be rationally and satisfactorily met, on the supposition that there were slight but necessary additions made, when the canonical books were collected and revised.

2. The book of Joshua comprises a history of about 17 years; or, according to some chronologists, of 27 or 30 years. There has been some accidental derangement in the order of the chs., occasioned probably by the mode of rolling up MSS., written upon different pieces of material, anciently practised. In the following analysis they are restored to their proper place:—The mission of Joshua (1:1–10); the spies sent out to view the land (2:); the passage of the Jordan, and the renewal of the covenant (1:10 to end, 3:5–13); the victories of Joshua and the conquest of the land (6:11, 5:14 to end, 6:22–33, 9:11; 8:30 to end); return of the Reubenites (22:); recapitulation of the conquests (12:13–15); division of the country among the tribes (14:–21:); the assembling of the people and the first address of Joshua (23:); his last address (21:1–23:); his death and burial (24:29,30); Joseph's remains interred in Shechem, and the death and burial of Eleazar (24:32,33).

3. Dr. A. Clarke has remarked, that the book of Joshua is one of the most important documents in the old covenant, and should never be separated from the Pentateuch, of which it is at once both the continuation and the completion.

SECTION II.
THE BOOK OF JUDGES.

1. From a comparison of chap. 1:21 with 2 Sa. 5:6, and chap. 9:53 with 2 Sa. 9:21, it will be seen that this book was written before that, and also before the capture of Jerusalem by David. Its author is not known; but it is quoted as canonical Scripture by several subsequent inspired writers (see 1 Sa. 12:9–11, 2 Sa. 11:21, Ps. 63:12, Is. 9:1, 10:26, 11:32, &c.), and the origin of many mythological fables is to be found in the relations it gives.† It comprises the history of about 300 years—from A. M. 2579 to 2897, and is very properly inserted between Joshua and Samuel, as the judges were governors intermediate between Joshua and the kings.

2. In reading this book, it should be borne in mind that the judges frequently acted under a divine impulse, and were endowed with preternatural courage and strength; for if this be lost sight of, it will be impossible to approve their conduct on some occasions, when the sanction of a divine warrant superseded all general rules of conduct.

3. The latter part of the book is removed from its proper place, the chapters having been carried forward, probably that the thread of the narrative might not be interrupted. In the following analysis, they are inserted in the order of the history:—Interregnum after the death of Joshua (1:2–10); the introduction of idolatry among the tribes (17:13:); history of the Levite of Ephraim, and the war among the tribes (19:–21:); the intermixture of the Israelites with the Canaanites

(2:11–3:7); servitude and deliverances of the Israelites (3:8–4:); triumphal song of Deborah and Barak (5:); the subjugation of the eastern and northern Israelites by Midian, and their deliverance by Gideon (6:–8:); usurpation and death of Abimelech (9:); administration of Tola and Jair (10:1–6); oppression of the Israelites by the Philistines and Ammonites, and their deliverance by Jephthah (10:7–12:7); administration of Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon (12:8–15:); oppression of the Israelites by the Philistines, and their deliverance by Samson (13:–16:).

SECTION III.

THE BOOK OF RUTH.

This tract has generally been considered as supplemental to the book of Judges, and as introductory to the books of Samuel. The general opinion assigns its authorship to Samuel; and that it could not have been written before his time is certain, from the genealogy recorded in chap. 4:17–22. The history is extremely interesting, and detailed with the most beautiful and affecting simplicity: being continuous, it needs no analysis.

SECTION IV.

THE TWO BOOKS OF SAMUEL.

1. It is probable that the history in the first book, to the end of ch. 24, is from the pen of Samuel, and the remaining part from the pens of Nathan and Gad. See 1 Ch. 29: 1 Sa. 22:5. From the frequent mention of times and circumstances posterior to those that are here historically detailed, some critics have been of opinion that the books were written at a much later period than that above assigned to them. The probability seems to be, that they were compiled out of the memoirs of the persons above named, whose duty it was to record the transactions of the kingdom; and that the marks of posteriority to be found in them were explanatory additions made by the compiler, whom the Jews have generally conceived to be the prophet Jeremiah. They contain intrinsic proofs of their verity, by appealing to existing monuments.

2. The history contained in the books of Samuel embraces a period of about 120 years, from A. M. 2966 to A. M. 3086. The first book contains the political and ecclesiastical history of the Israelites, from the birth of Samuel to the death of Saul, a period of about 60 years; and the second book carries on the history to within about two years of the death of David, a period of about 40 years. In these interesting books, the sacred author illustrates the characters and describes the events of his history in the most engaging manner, and furnishes the richest instruction. The inspired hymn of Hannah (1 Sa. 2:1–10), and the thanksgiving song of David (2 Sa. 22), are sublime compositions, and contain some clear predictions of the Messiah's coming and kingdom. The book of Psalms should be read in connection with them, as they mutually illustrate each other.

3. The first book of Samuel contains an account of the birth of Samuel (1:); the song of Hannah (2:1–10); the mal-administration of Eli's sons (2:11–36); the call of Samuel, and the denunciations against Eli's house (3:); the capture of the ark, and the death of Eli, &c. (4:); the chastisement of the Philistines, &c., and the restoration of the ark (5:6:); the people repent, renounce their idols, and defeat the Philistines (7:); the people ask and obtain a king (8–11); Samuel protests his integrity to the assembled

people, and exhorts them to obedience (12); Saul's wars with the Philistines (13: 1-1); his war with the Amalekites, and his rejection from the throne intimated (15); the anointing of David, and his introduction to Saul (16); his victory over Goliath (17:1-51); Saul notices David, and afterwards persecutes him (17:55-27); consults the witch of Endor (28); his defeat, death, and burial (29-31).

4. The second book contains David's lamentation over Saul and Jonathan (1); his subjugation of the house of Saul, and his own confirmation in the kingdom (2-5:4); his victories over the Jebusites and Philistines (5:8 to end); he fetches the ark from Kirjath-jearim, and purposes to build the temple, but is not permitted (6: 7); his victories over the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, &c. (8-10); his sin with Bathsheba, and the birth of Solomon (11: 12:5); he takes Rabbah (12:6 to end); his domestic troubles and flight from Jerusalem (13-18); his return to the capital, and quelling of the insurrection (19: 20); the punishment of the sons of Saul, and war with the Philistines (21); David's psalm of thanksgiving, and last words (22-23:7); catalogue of his mighty men (23:8 to end); his office in numbering the people, and his penitence and sacrifice (24). It should be noted, that this book is imperfect, and wants 1 Ch. 22:29 to complete it.

SECTION V.

THE TWO BOOKS OF KINGS.

1. The authors of these books cannot be ascertained with more certainty than those of the former. They were, doubtless, like those, compiled from the authentic national records, which were kept by the prophets or priests who were contemporary with the events. See 2 Ch. 9:29; 15:34; 26:22, 32:32. There are several passages which seem to point out Ezra as the compiler; but their authenticity and inspiration are attested by the prophecies they contain, and which were afterwards fulfilled (see 1 K. 6:12, 11:11-13, 30-39; 13:1-3; compare 2 K. 23:15-20, 11:10, 11:14, 16:1-1, 11:6, 5:10, 7:1, 3:10, 12, 19, 20:5-20); by the citations of our Savior and his apostles (see Mat. 12:12, Lu. 4:25-27, Ae. 7:17, and other places); by the universal reception of them in the Jewish and Christian churches; and by the corresponding testimonies of ancient profane writers.*

2. The history related in these books embraces a period of about 826 years — A. M. 2939 to A. M. 3416. The first book commences with the anointing of Solomon, and carries the history down to the death of Jehoshaphat, A. M. 3115; the most prosperous and glorious period of the Israelitish history. In this book is related the separation of the ten tribes, which laid the foundation of the kingdom of Israel. The second book continues the contemporary history of the two kingdoms, down to the destruction of the city and temple by Nebuchadnezzar. Nearly the whole period contained in this book seems to have been dark and guilty; both the nations appear to have departed with equal steps from the worship of the true God; and idolatry and ambition were the ruling features in the characters of both kings and subjects. During this time many of the prophets flourished.

3. The first book contains an account of the last days of David and the inauguration of Solomon (1); David's charge to Solomon, and his death (2:1-11); Solomon's reign to the building of the temple and the king's house (2:12-7); the dedication of the temple (8); God's covenant with Solomon (9:1-9); transactions during the latter part of his reign, and his death (9:10-11); the accession of Rehoboam, and division of the kingdom (12:1-19); the contemporary reigns of Rehoboam and Jeroboam (12:20-14); reigns of several contemporary kings (15:

16); part of the life of Elijah, with the calling of Elisha (17-19; 21:17-29); the remaining part of Ahaz's reign (20-22:1-40); the reign of Jehoshaphat (22:11 to end).

4. The second book contains an account of the contemporary reigns of Jehoshaphat and Jehoram, of Judah; and of Ahaziah and Joram, of Israel; the translation of Elijah, and the ministry and miracles of Elisha (1-8:2); the contemporary reigns of Jehoram and Ahaziah, of Judah, and Jehoram, of Israel (8:3-29); the appointment and reign of Jehu over Israel, and the death of Jehoram; the death of Ahaziah, king of Judah, and the usurpation of Athaliah (9:1-13); the contemporary reigns of Jehoash, over Judah; and of Jehoahaz and Jehoash, over Israel; the death of Elisha; and the miracle performed at his grave (11:1-13); the reigns of several contemporary kings (11: 15:35); the reign of Ahaz over Judah, and of Hoshea over Israel, in the ninth year of whose reign Samaria, his capital, is taken by the king of Assyria, and the people sent into captivity (15:36-17:23); the Cuthites corrupt the religion of Samaria (17:24 to end); the reign of Hezekiah; the destruction of Sennacherib's army; Hezekiah's miraculous recovery, and Isaiah's prediction of the Babylonian captivity (18-20:19); Hezekiah's death; and the reigns of Manasseh, Amon, and Josiah, in whose reign the religion was reformed, and the covenant renewed (20:20-23:25); death of Josiah, and reigns of the subsequent kings, to the taking of the city and temple, and the carrying away of the people into Babylon (23:26-25:26); treatment of Jehoiachin at the court of Evil-merodach, 25:27 to end.

SECTION VI.

THE TWO BOOKS OF CHRONICLES.

1. The title of 'Chronicles' was given to these books by Jerome, because they contain an abstract, in the order of time, of the whole of the sacred history, down to the period when they were written — 3163 yrs. They appear to have been compiled out of the national diaries or annals; and hence they are called in the Heb. Bibles, the words of days, or the journals. They contain many things not extant elsewhere; and several relations in the former books are here enlarged upon and elucidated. Hence the Greek translators have called them 'Paraleipomena, things omitted.' Although we cannot decide upon their authors, their authenticity is placed beyond dispute, as well by a great mass of external evidence as by the indirect attestations of our Lord and his apostles. Compare 1 Ch. 21:10 with Lev. 15:2 Ch. 9:1 with Mat. 12:42, Lu. 11:31; 2 Ch. 24:20, 21, with Mat. 23:35, Lu. 11:51; 1 Ch. 17:13, 22:10, with 1 K. 1:5. There are several manifest variations in names, facts, and dates, between the books of Kings and Chronicles, and it is therefore necessary to bear in mind that the latter books are supplemental to the former. It should also be borne in mind, that the vernacular language had been slightly varied; that several places had received new names, or had undergone sundry vicissitudes; that certain things were now better known to the returned Jews under other appellations; and that from the materials before him, the author selected those passages which were best adapted to his purpose, and most suitable to the times in which he wrote. The variations in proper names of persons will generally be accounted for by attending to the precise period of time spoken of, whence it will appear that frequently two different persons are described.

2. The first book contains the genealogies of those persons through whom the Messiah was to descend, from Adam to the captivity, and to the time of Ezra (1-4:5); the first inhabitants of Jerusalem after the captivity (9:2-31); the reign and death of Saul (9:35

-10); and the transactions of the reign of David (11-29).

3. The second book contains the history of the kingdom of Israel under Solomon (1-9); the accession of Rehoboam; the division of the kingdom; and the plundering of Jerusalem by Shishak (10-12); the reigns of Abijah and Asa, kings of Judah (13-16); the reign of Jehoshaphat (17-20); the reigns of Jehoram and Ahaziah, and the usurpation of Athaliah (21-24); the reigns of Amaziah, Uzziah, and Jotham (25-27); the reign of Ahaz (28); the reign of Hezekiah (29-32); the reigns of Manasseh and Amon (33); the reign of Josiah (31:35); the subsequent reigns to the destruction of the city and temple (36:1-21); and the edict of Cyrus (ver. 22 to the end).

SECTION VII.

THE BOOK OF EZRA.

1. This and the book of Nehemiah were reckoned as one by the ancient Jews, though they were sometimes called the first and second books of Esdras. The third book of Esdras, received as canonical by the Greek church, is merely this book interpolated; and the fourth book is a palpable forgery, undeserving of notice. That the last four chapters of this book were written by the person whose name it bears, has never been disputed; but the first six have been ascribed to another, because it appears, from the commencement of the 7th chapter, that Ezra did not go up to Jerusalem till the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, a period of sixty years from the commencement of this history, whereas the author of the former part represents himself as present at Jerusalem in ch. 5:1. But the intimate connection of all parts of the history, and the prevalence of the same method of narration, render it probable that the whole history was written by one person. The apparent discrepancy may easily be removed, by supposing that Ezra literally copied the original record which was written by a person contemporaneous with the transactions.

2. This book is a continuation of the Jewish history, from the period at which the Chronicles close, and it begins with a repetition of two verses of the latter of those two books. The period of time embraced in the history is about 79 years; or, according to some chronologists, 100 years — A. M. 3468 to A. M. 3563. As the history harmonizes most strictly with the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah, which it materially elucidates, they should be read in connection.

SECTION VIII.

THE BOOK OF NEHEMIAH.

1. That Nehemiah was the author of this book there is no reason to doubt; it is written in his name; and, differing from all the preceding books, it is written in the first person. The register in ch. 12 has been added by some subsequent hand; probably by the authority of the great synagogue. The history presents us with a faithful narrative of the commencement, progress, and completion of the noble and patriotic undertaking of Nehemiah to restore Jerusalem, and his subsequent return to Shushan. It comprises his commission and arrival at Jerusalem (1: 2:12); the building and dedication of the walls (2:13, 7:4, 12:27-41); a register of the persons who first returned, and an account of the oblations at the temple (7:5-73); the reading of the law and celebration of the feast of Tabernacles (8); a solemn fast and the renewal of the covenant (9: 10:); the names and families of those who dwelt in Jerusalem,—of the priests, Levites, and singers (1: 12:26); occurrences at Jerusalem during Nehemiah's absence (13); his return to Jerusalem, and the second reformation effected by him (13:7-31).

2. Nehemiah's administration lasted 36 years, and this book closes the O. T. history.

* See Alix's Reflections on the O. T. pt. iii. ch. 2.

† The books of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles, should be read together. Also in the 'Sacred Chronicle,' given in the Commentary. Ed.

See the Table of the parallel passages in these books, at the end of 1 Ch.

SECTION IX.

THE BOOK OF ESTHER.

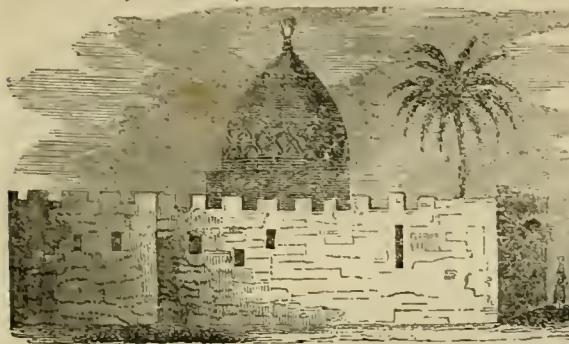

1. The author cannot now be ascertained, but the authenticity of the book is substantiated by the most indisputable evidence. The feast of Purim, the institution and origin of which are here related, is still observed by the Jews; and such is their estimation of the book, that they believe, whatever may be the fate of other parts of Scripture, this will ever be preserved.

2. The history embraces a period of about 20 years, or perhaps something less, commencing about A. M. 3514. Ahasuerus is, no doubt, the Artaxerxes Longimanus of profane history, who granted the Jews permission to rebuild the holy city.

3. In our Bibles this book concludes with 10:3; but the Sept. and Vulg. add 10 more vs., with 6 additional chs., though they were never extant in the Heb., and are justly rejected by Jews and Protestants. The history contains the disgrace of Vashti (1:1); the elevation of Esther to the throne, and the discovery of a plot against the monarch, by the diligence of Mordecai (2); Haman's promotion and plotting against the Jews (3); their affliction and measures (4-14); Esther undertakes their cause, defeats Haman's plot, and causes him to be hanged (1:15-7); Mordecai's advancement, and the deliverance and rejoicing of the Jews (8); the destruction of their enemies, with Haman's sons (9:1-19); the institution of the feast of Purim (9:20 to end); a recital of the power and glory of Ahasuerus, and Mordecai's dignity (10).

CHAPTER III.

OF THE POETICAL BOOKS.

1. UNDER this denomination are comprehended those books termed by the Jews the Hagiographa, or Holy Writings; viz., the Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, and Job. They are termed poetical, because generally composed in measured sentences, and possessing the distinguishing characteristics of Heb. poetry.

2. In reading these, much assistance will be derived from a strict attention to the peculiar structure of the sentences, fully treated of, in pt. ii., ch. v. sect. 2.

3. Another thing demanding attention in them, is the change of persons, which often occurs without the least intimation of it. This is occasioned in many cases by the form of composition — dialogue, or a kind of dramatic ode — in which there are different characters introduced, sustaining their respective parts. This observation applies more particularly to the Psalms, to the remarks on which the reader is referred. [See also, Pref. to Poet. Books.]

SECTION I.

THE BOOK OF JOH.

1. This is one of the most extraordinary books of the Scriptures. Considerable diversity of opinion has obtained among biblical writers on its chronology, character, hero, and author. Some have denied the actual existence of the venerable patriarch from whom it derives its name, and considered the book as a fictitious narration, intended to instruct through the medium of parable. That such a nation should have been entertained by men who credit the writings of Ezekiel or of James, is something to excite surprise; for both these inspired writers speak of him as a real, and not as a fictitious, personage. See Ez. 14:14. Ja. 5:11. To this we may add, that he is also mentioned as a real person in the apocryphal book of Tobit; and as such he has been contemplated immemorially in Arabia and Palestine. No good reason can be given why we should abandon an opinion thus strongly supported. [See Pref. to Job.]

2. In the opinion of Hales and Townsend, the book was written by Job himself, or one of his contemporaries, and is supposed to have been obtained by Moses when in the land of Midian; and, with some alterations, addressed by him to the Israelites.

3. Bp. Lowth is of opinion that the principal object of the poem is the third and last trial of Job, from the unkindness and unjustice of his accusing friends; the consequence of which is, in the first place, the anger, indignation, and contumacy of Job, and afterwards his composure, submission, and penitence. The design of the poem is, therefore, to teach men, that, having a due respect to the corruption, infirmity, and ignorance of human nature, as well as to the infinite wisdom and majesty of God, they are to reject all confidence in their own strength and righteousness, and to preserve on all occasions an unwavering and unsullied faith, submitting with becoming reverence to the divine decrees.*

4. But, independent of the important instruction which may be derived from a devout perusal of Job, it must be considered as a most invaluable document, containing a faithful delineation of the patriarchal religion, and thus completing the Bible, by adding the dispensation of the earliest ages to the dispensations of the law and the gospel, by which it was successively superseded. On this principle the expediency of its introduction into the Heb. canon may be successfully shown, and the objections urged against it, as an exotic production, effectually silenced.

SECTION II.

THE BOOK OF PSALMS.

I. This collection of sacred hymns has been ever held in the highest estimation, as containing instruction and comfort for the truly pious, whatever may be their experience or circumstances. Upon the titles prefixed to many of the psalms implicit confidence cannot be placed; nor is it certain whether the Jews, who attached these notices, intended to denote that the respective psalms were written by, or for, such a person. [See Pref. to Ps. and the Table there.]

2. The right of Psalms to a place in the sacred canon has never been disputed; and its divine authority has been attested by the quotations of our Savior and his apostles, as well as by its numerous predictions subsequently fulfilled.

3. In these compositions we are presented with every variety of Heb. poetry. Some were prepared for particular solemnities in the Jewish worship; others appear to have been designed generally to celebrate the glorious perfections of God; and a few to have been drawn forth by the peculiar circumstances or experience of the inspired writers. They abound in the most impressive and consoling predictions. One greater than David is continually presenting Himself, even Christ the Redeemer. Divine inspiration so guided the Psalmist, that in many instances his words, at the same time that they referred with sufficient precision to the circumstances of his own life, prefigured, in terms the most accurate and sublime, the humiliation, sufferings, triumphant resurrection, and universal and eternal kingdom of the Messiah. Dr. Horsey has considered the greater part of the Psalms as a kind of dramatic ode, consisting of dialogues between certain persons, sustaining certain characters, as the priests, Levites, singers, &c. ‘The other persons introduced’ are Jehovah, sometimes as one, sometimes as another, of the three persons: Christ, in his incarnate state, is personated sometimes as a priest, sometimes as a king, sometimes as a conqueror.’† And in these reciprocations and divisions of parts, we discern (so Dr. Lowth) the immediate cause of the disposition of the verse into equal strophes or stanzas, and why these consisted for the most part of distichs, in a sort of parallelism to each other, the last line responding to the first, and seconding, educating, and enforcing the sense. A recent writer has very materially extended this doctrine of parallelism, and, by an arrangement of several of the psalms, has succeeded in showing that each one is a complete parallelism, either of the alternate or the introverted kind. In some cases, the parallelism will be found to depend on a correspondence of the topic; sometimes on an agreement of the person; but whatever form the composition may assume, it will be found susceptible of great elucidation by the arrangement of the parallelism.‡

4. For an analysis of each psalm, see Dr. A. Clarke’s Comm.; compare also the Comprehensive Commentary.

SECTION III.

THE BOOK OF PROVERES.

This book, with the exception probably of the two concluding chs., was composed by Solomon. 1:1. 10:1. 25:1. Ch. 30 was penned by Agar, son of Jachah, of whom we no where else read; and the last ch. contains the instructions given to Lemuel by his mother, of both of whom we are ignorant. From 25:1, it has been thought that the proverbs following were collected out of the other writings of Solomon, and placed in the present order. But this is no more than vague conjecture. The design of the inspired author of these pointed and sententious maxims may be gathered from the first three verses; and so admirably adapted to the purposes of instruction have they appeared, that many heathen philosophers and legislators have drawn their brightest sentiments from them. The Proverbs are frequently quoted in the N. T. See Mat. 15:4. Lu. 14:16. Ro. 12:16. 17, 20. 1 Th. 5:14. 1 Pe. 4:8. 5:5. Ja. 4:5, &c.

SECTION IV.

THE BOOK OF ECCLESIASTES;

That is, the Preacher, or one who harangues a public auditory. This book was written by Solomon, evidently towards the close of his splendid career, and after he had been brought to repentance for his awful apostasy from God. The purpose of the book is explicitly declared in its title; namely, to demonstrate the vanity of all earthly acquisitions, and to show that, when the heart is set on sublunar enjoyments, all will prove to be ‘vanity and vexation of spirit.’ In the course of his argument, the wise teacher anticipates the objections of the licentious and the thoughtless, and produces their absurd opinions for the purpose of refuting them. It is therefore necessary to keep the eye steadily fixed on the purport of the discourse, and to discriminate what the author delivers in his own, and what in an assumed, character. [See analysis, Pref. to Ec.] Mr. Holden, in his ‘Attempt to illustrate Ec.’ has divided the work into two principal parts. The first, which extends to 6:10, he considers as taken up in demonstrating the vanity of all earthly conditions, occupations, and pleasures; and the second part, which includes the remainder of the book, as occupied in eulogizing Wisdom, and in describing its nature, excellence, and beneficial effects.|| The conclusion of the work is worthy of an inspired author—‘Fear God, and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man.’

SECTION V.

THE SONG OF SOLOMON.

I. The majority of writers consider this to be inspired; while others regard it as a merely human composition: some view it as a sacred allegory, shadowing forth the intimate relation between Christ and his church; but others insist upon its literal meaning, as referring to the marriage of Solomon with the princess of Egypt.|| Nor are those who concur in viewing it as a mystical allegory, agreed as to its precise ¶ ‘Shishak had two daughters, one married subsequently to Jeroboam, the head of the ten revolted tribes, who established himself as king of Samaria, the other to Solomon. The Jewish commentators lead us to infer that the latter saw the princess first, when he fled to Egypt, during the rebellion of his brother Absalom. But, whether this be so or not, a little comparison of the scriptural passages with Josephus will throw light upon a somewhat romantic portion of Egyptian and Jewish history. Solomon, as allowed by the Jewish law, had another wife, an Ammonite princess, who was the mother of Rehoboam, and who, of course, had the pre-eminence over the Egyptian wife, as the royal source of the favored race destined to terminate in the Messiah. It may be safely inferred that unfavorable dispositions towards Solomon were created at the Egyptian court by this circumstance. The Egyptian princess, in “Solomon’s Song,” who throughout employs Egyptian illustrations, and compares the princely address of her lover to the harmonious action of the horses in her father Pharaoh’s chariot,—and they were indeed unmatched in beauty, as the monuments show,—speaks of herself as being dark, as all the Egyptian women were, but handsome. She says that “the Son (Phra, or Pharaoh) has looked upon her,” and refers mysteriously to some anger of her “mother’s sons,” either at her love or her marriage. But, if the princess was compelled, as it is clear she would be, to play a subordinate part to the Ammonitish queen in Solomon’s harem, with no chance of the Egyptian line succeeding to the throne, the politicians of Shishak’s court would have had good reason to be dissatisfied, considering the magnificent dowry he had bestowed upon his daughter in marriage—the key fortress of Migdola, and the seaport of Utron (Gezer) Geher, on the Red Sea, communicating with the wealth of India. Hence a very clear insight is given us into the motives why Shishak and his sons, the “angry brothers” of Solomon’s wife, should encourage the rebellion of Jeroboam against Solomon’s son Rehoboam, and why Shishak should give him the second daughter as his wife, as he had already given his sister to Hadad, another rebel against Solomon. This circumstance explains the motives which prompted Shishak to “come up” against Jerusalem, and render Rehoboam his tributary, as recorded in 2 Ch. 12.

¶ Rosellini, like a magician, evokes from the tomb, after so long an interval, the chief of the very characters referred to, in all the vivid accuracy of physiognomic outline, in the costume they wore when living, and with singular associations of contemporary details. The portrait of Shishak is brought before us: the portrait of Shishak the younger, and of Osorcon, the brothers-in-law of Solomon, and possibly the “angry brothers,” referred to; the portrait of his son Rehoboam; and, in all probability, if the analogical inferences of a recent trayeller are to be believed, the portrait of Solomon’s wife, an Egyptian princess, as is evident from the structure of the sacred opera, called Solomon’s Song. If the evidences which tend to identify the above princess with two female portraits, one at Karnac, and one in the valley of the Queen’s Tombs, interpretation.* Bp. Lowth restricts it to the universal church, and conceives that it has no reference whatever to the spiritual state of individuals; while others interpret it of individuals. In this conflict of opinion, supported, as each theory is, by the highest names and talent, it is extremely difficult to decide. That Solomon was the author, is affirmed by the concurrent testimony of the Jewish and Christian churches. He is also mentioned as such in the poem itself (1:1), and the several allusions to his works and character fix it indubitably to the period of his reign. That it is an inspired composition, may be inferred from its finding a place in the Heb. canon, probably settled by Ezra, and also from its translation in the Sept. version. It forms one of the books of canonical Scripture mentioned by Josephus, and one book in the Jewish divisions of Scripture adopted by our Savior and his apostles; the only reason for which is to be inferred from its containing a mystical meaning. Under the figure of a marriage seems to be typified the intimate relation subsisting between Christ and his church, and its figures have been transferred into the N. T. See Mat. 9:15, 22:2, 25:1-11; Jn. 3:29, 2 Co. 11:2, Ep. 5:23, 27; Re. 19:7, 9, 22:17.

2. Mr. Good thinks it a series of idylls, like the cassisades of the poets of Arabia. Its style, as remarked by Bp. Lowth, is pastoral, the two principal personages being represented in the character of shepherds.

3. The manner in which the Song has been interpreted by most expositors, has exposed it to unmerited ridicule and contempt. Not entering into the style and spirit of oriental poesy, they have given to some passages a coarse and indecent appearance; and, not distinguishing between the literal and the allegorical senses, they have destroyed the consistency and beauty of the poem, while they have bewildered the mind of the reader. To understand it well, requires not only a renewed heart and an enlightened mind, but a sober and cautious judgment. The spiritual senses must be exercised to discern clearly spiritual truths, and the imagination curbed by a reverential apprehension of the majesty and condescension of God.

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE PROPHETICAL BOOKS.

SECTION I

PRELIMINARY REMARKS.

1. THIS section of the books of the O. T. is so called because its subjects are chiefly, though not exclusively, prophetic.

prove correct, imagination will have no reason to disappoint itself, as it generally does, in finding its beau ideal of beauty or accomplishment sinking, when brought to the test of ocular evidence, so much beneath anticipation. She is the same princess, in fact, whose full-length portrait, in one of the queen's tombs, started Champollion, as he says, by its beauté éclatante [dazzling beauty]. Nor does the portrait of the same personage now given by Rosellini in any degree belie Champollion's admiring description. It is that of a lady who, by any connoisseurs or artists of any period, would be pronounced of consummate beauty; and it is singular that, in the in-

2. If we take up the prophetic volume, we find that it readily divides itself into two parts, which may be called the moral or doctrinal, and the predictive. It is not a series of mere predictions — far from it. It abounds in matter of another kind: there is a continued strain of moral doctrine which runs through it, including under that name the only efficacious and sufficient moral doctrine, that which is founded upon a knowledge of God, his attributes, and his will, with a sense of the direct, personal, and responsible relation of man to Him. Accordingly, the most frequent subjects of the prophet are scription associated with her name, she is called, like Amense, the wife of the first Amenophis, by the chastely affectionate epithet which Solomon confers upon her, — that of “sister bride,” — which, as well as the situation of the tomb where the portrait is found, indicates that she was one of the Pallidi or royal muses dedicated by a temporary vow of virginity to the services of Ammon, and considered as his “virgin wives.” Foreign Review, England, 1836. There is much that is plausible and ingenious in the above, but the judicious reader will separate the curious facts from the hypotheses. ED.

the laws of God, his supreme dominion and his universal providence, the majesty of his nature, his spiritual being, and his holiness, together with the obligations of obedience to Him in the particular duties of an inward faith and worship, and of justice and mercy to man, the whole of these duties being enforced by explicit sanctions of reward and punishment. These original principles of piety and morals overspread the pages of the book of prophecy; they are brought forward, they are inculcated, from first to last. They are often the subject when nothing future is in question; they are constantly interwoven with the predictions; they are either the very thing propounded, or they are connected with it, and all the way they are impressed with a distinctness and energy of instruction, which show it was none of the secondary ends of the prophet's mission to be this teacher of righteousness; insomuch that, if we except the gospel itself, there can no where be shown, certainly not in the works or systems of pagan wisdom, so much of luminous and decisive information concerning the unity, providence, mercy, and moral government of God, and man's duty founded upon his will, as is to be gathered from the prophetic volume. Let the predictions of prophecy, then, for a time be put out of our thoughts, and let the prophetic books be read for the pure theology they contain. With what feelings of conviction they are read by the religious person, it is not hard to tell. He perceives that he is instructed and elevated by the discoveries made to him of the Supreme Being, and the kind of worship and obedience required from himself; and these discoveries, made with an authority and a commanding power which argue them to be what they are given for,—law of life and practice; doctrines, not of theory, but of self-government and direction; the most useful, therefore, to himself, and the most worthy of the source whence they profess to come. On this view of the prophetic writings, Origen, who does not overstate their persuasive force, says, that 'to the meditative and attentive reader they raise an impression of enthusiasm,' (a true and rational enthusiasm, like a spark of their own inspiration,) 'and, by his perceptions, convince him, as he reads, that these compositions can be none of the works of men which have obtained the credit of being the oracles of God.' The more skeptical reader will see in them something to arrest his attention, at least, and to excite in him a suspicion, that the teachers of so excellent and virtuous a discipline of life, and the expositors of so rational a theology, are not to be set down for vain pretenders to inspiration.

3. We may further remark, that this moral revelation, made by a succession of prophets, holds an intermediate place between the law of Moses and the gospel of Christ. It is a step in progress beyond the law, in respect of the greater distinctness and fitness of some of its doctrines and precepts; it is a more perfect exposition of the principles of personal holiness and virtue; the sanctions of it have less of an exclusive reference to temporal promises, and incline more to evangelical: the ritual of the law begins to be discontenanced by it; the superior value of the moral commandment to be enforced; and altogether, it bears a more spiritual and a more instructive character than the original law given by Moses. In a word, in the prophets there is a more luminous, a more perfectly reasoned, rule of life and faith, than in the primary law; and therefore God's moral revelation was progressive. It is more perfect in the prophets than in the law; more perfect in the gospel than in either.*

4. Lastly, the prophets had a practical office to discharge, as pastors and ministerial monitors of the people of God. To 'show Jacob his transgressions, and Israel his sins,' was a part of the commission they received. Hence their work to admonish and reprove; to arraign for every ruling sin, to blow the trumpet to repentance, and shake the terrors of the divine judgments over a guilty land. Often they bore the message of consolation or pardon; rarely, if ever, of public approbation and praise. The integrity and fortitude with which they acquitted themselves of this charge, is attested by impartial history, which recites the death and martyrdom some of them endured. But it lives also in their own writings; not in the praise of their sincerity and zeal, but in the faithful record of the expostulations and reproofs which they delivered in the face of idolatrous or oppressive kings, a degenerate priesthood, and a corrupt, idolatrous people. 'Great was the fidelity and great the boldness of the prophets,' is their just panegyric. But in this service they betray none of the spirit of turbulent and fanatical agitators; men who step out of order to make the public sin their field of triumph; but a grave and masculine severity, which bespeaks their entire soberness of mind, and argues the reality of their commission. Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, are all eminent examples of this ministerial duty. And if Paul could say of holy writ, that it 'is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness,' as he speaks of the old Scripture, so to no part of it does that idea more fitly belong, than to the admonitory homilies of the prophets.†

5. With respect to the precise nature and extent of prophetic inspiration, much has been written with which it is unnecessary that we should trouble the reader. We may rest satisfied in the assurance that these 'holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost' (2 Pe. 1:21); and that by them 'God spake, at sundry times and in divers manners, unto the fathers.' He. 1:1.

6. The 16 prophetic books are not placed in our Bibles in the order of time‡ in which they prophesied; but this circumstance should be carefully attended to, if we would understand them correctly; [and the student will find every assistance in Townsend's admirable table, given in the Comp. Comm. at p. 313, vol. iii.]

7. The great object of prophecy was a description of the Messiah and his kingdom.§ The particulars of these were gradually unfolded by successive prophets, in prophecies more and more distinct. They were at first held forth in general promises; they were afterwards described by figures, and shadowed forth under types and allusive institutions, as well as clearly foretold in the full lustre of descriptive prophecy. The prophets were oftentimes the representatives of the future dispensers of evangelical blessings; as Moses and David were unquestionably types of Christ, Ez. 31:23; Mat. 11:11. He. 6:20. 7:1-3. Persons were sometimes descriptive of things also, as Sarah and Hagar were allegorical figures of the two covenants, Ga. 4:22-31. Ro. 9:7-13. And, on the other hand, things were used to symbolize persons, as the brazen serpent and the paschal lamb were signs of our healing and spotless Redeemer. Jn. 3:14. Comp. Ex. 12:46 with Jn. 19:36. Hence it was, that many of the descriptions of the prophets had a twofold character; bearing often an immediate reference to present circumstances, and yet being in their nature predictive of future occurrences. What they reported of the types was often, in a more signal manner, applicable to the thing typified; what they spoke literally of the present was figuratively descriptive of future particulars; and what was applied in a figurative sense to existing persons, was often actually characteristic of their distant archetypes. Many passages, then, in the O. T., which, in their first aspect, appear to be historical, are in fact prophetic; and they are so cited in the N. T., not by way of ordinary accommodation, or casual coincidence, but as intentionally predictive; as having a double sense, a literal and mystical interpretation. This mode of wrapping up religious truth in allegory, gives great interest to the sacred books, in the diligent perusal of which the most admirable contrivance and unexpected beauty will be discovered. That many of the prophecies in the O. T. were direct, and singly and exclusively applicable to and accomplished in our Savior, is certain; and that some passages are cited from the O. T. by way of accommodation to circumstances described in the New, is perhaps equally true; but that this typical kind of prophecy was likewise employed, is evident from a vast number of passages; and it is this double character, of prophecy which occasions those unexpected transitions and sudden interchange of circumstances so observable in the prophetic books. Thus different predictions are sometimes blended and mixed together; temporal and spiritual deliverances are foretold in one prophecy; and greater and smaller events are combined in one point of view. To unravel this requires much attention, and a considerable acquaintance with the scope of the Scriptures.¶

8. The language of the prophets is remarkable for its magnificence; the ornaments being derived, not from accumulation of epithet, or labored harmony, but from the real grandeur of its images, and the majestic force of its expressions. Its sudden bursts of eloquence, its earnest warmth, its affecting exhortations and appeals, afford very interesting proofs of that vivid impression, and of that inspired conviction, under which the prophets wrote. No style, perhaps, is so highly figurative as that of the prophets. Every object of nature and of art, which can furnish allusions, is explored with industry; every scene of creation, and every page of science, seems to have unfolded its rich varieties to the sacred writers, who, in the spirit of eastern poetry, delight in every kind of metaphorical embellishment.

9. On the style of the prophets much has been written, particularly by Vitringa, Calmet, Lowth, Michaelis, and Newton. From the preliminary observations to Dr. Smith's 'View of the Prophets,' &c., where the principal observations of these learned writers have been abridged with great judgment, the following remarks have been selected.

10. The writings of the prophets, the most sublime and beautiful in the world, from their not being more generally understood, lose much of that usefulness and effect, which they are so well calculated to produce on the souls of men. Many prophecies are somewhat dark, till events explain them. They are, besides, delivered in such lofty and figurative terms, and with such frequent allusions to the customs and manners of times and places the most remote, that ordinary readers cannot, without some help, be supposed capable of understanding them. What is not understood is seldom read; or, if it be, it is only as a task, begun without inclination, gone through without pleasure, and ended without profit.

11. Some prophecies seem as if it were not intended that they should be clearly understood before they are fulfilled. As they relate to different periods, they have been intended for exciting the attention of mankind, from time to time, both to Providence and to Scripture, and to furnish every age with new evidence of the truth of divine revelation; by which means they serve the same purpose to the last ages of the world that miracles did to the first. Whereas, if they had been in every respect clear and obvious from the beginning, this wise purpose had been in a great measure defeated. Curiosity, industry, and attention, would at once be at an end; or, by being too easily gratified, would be little exercised.

12. Besides, a great degree of obscurity is necessary to some prophecies before they can be fulfilled; and if not fulfilled, the consequence would not be so beneficial to mankind. Thus many of the ancient prophecies concerning the destruction of Jerusalem had a manifest relation to the remoter destruction by the Romans, as well as to the nearer one by the Chaldeans. Had the Jews perceived this, which was not indeed clear enough till the event explained it, the nation would probably have wished to remain always in their captivity at Babylon, rather than be exposed, sooner or later, a second time, to a destruction so dreadful as that which they had already experienced. In like manner, the prophecies relating to the Messiah had a view both to his first and to his second coming; they spoke of Him as suffering, and yet conquering and reigning. The Jews, led by their situation first to wish, and then to expect, a conquering Messiah, did not clearly see the order of the prophecy, and that it behoved Christ first to suffer, and then to enter into his glory; and therefore ignorantly, and in unbelief, they were instrumental in fulfilling the prophecy, by shedding that blood which was to atone for the sins of mankind. But this they could never have been so impious as to have attempted, had they fully known that they were crucifying the Lord of glory.

13. With respect to our times, by far the greatest number of prophecies relate to events now past; and therefore a sufficient acquaintance with history, and with the language and style of prophecy, is all that is requisite in order to understand them. Some prophecies, however, relate to events still future; and these, too, may be understood in general, although some particular circumstances connected with them may remain obscure till they are fulfilled. If prophecies were not capable of being understood in general, we should not find the Jews so often blamed, in this respect, for their ignorance and want of discernment. That they did actually understand many of them, when they chose to search the Scriptures, we know. Daniel understood, from the prophecies of Jeremiah, the time at which the captivity in Babylon was to be at an end; and the scribes knew from Micah, and told Herod, where the Messiah was to be born. A very little attention might have enabled them in the same manner to understand others, as they probably did; such as the 70 weeks of Daniel, the destruction of the Babylonian empire, and of the other three that were to succeed; and also the ruin of the people and places around them—Moab, Ammon, Tyre, Sidon, Philistia, Egypt, and Idumea. Perhaps, indeed, a few enigmatical circumstances might have been annexed, which could not be understood till they were accomplished; but the general tenor of the prophecies they could be at no loss to understand. With regard to prophecies still future, we are in a similar situation. We know, in general, that the Jews will be gathered from their dispersions, restored to their own land, and converted to Christianity; that the fulness of the Gentiles will likewise come in; that Antichrist, Gog, and Magog, and all the enemies of the church, will be destroyed; after which the gospel will remarkably flourish, and be more than ever glorified. But several circumstances connected with those general events must probably remain in the dark, till their accomplishment shall clearly explain them.

14. Nevertheless, the obscurity which attends prophecy, does not always proceed from the circumstances or subject; but frequently from the highly poetical and figurative style in which it is generally conveyed.*

15. It is of importance to remark, that the same prophecies have frequently a double meaning, and refer to different events, the one near, the other remote; the one temporal, the other spiritual, or perhaps eternal. The prophets having thus several events in their eye, their expressions may be partly applicable to one and partly to another; and it is not always easy to mark the transitions. Thus the prophecies relating to the first and second restoration of the Jews, and the first and second coming of our Lord, are often interwoven together; like our Savior's own prediction (Mat. 24) concerning the destruction of Jerusalem and the end of the world. What has not been fulfilled in the first we must apply to the second; and what has been already fulfilled may often be considered as typical of what still remains to be accomplished.

16. Almost all the prophecies of the O.T., whatever view they may have to nearer events, are ultimately to be referred to the gospel, where only we are to look for their full completion. Thus Babylon, under the O.T., was a type of mystical Babylon, under the New; and the king of Syria, Antiochus Epiphanes, a type of Antichrist; the temporal enemies of the Jews, types and figures of the spiritual enemies of Christians. We must not, however, expect to find always a mystical meaning in prophecy; and when the near and most obvious meaning is plain, and gives a good sense, we need not without reason depart from it, nor be incurious to look beyond it.

17. In prophecies, as in parables, we are chiefly to consider the scope and design, without attempting too minute an explication of all the poetical images and figures with which the sacred writers use to adorn their style.

18. Prophecies of a general nature are applicable by accommodation to individuals; most of the things that are spoken of the church in general being no less applicable to its individual members. Prophecies of a particular nature, on the other hand, admit and often require to be extended. Thus Edom, Moab, or any other enemy of God's people, is often put for the whole of them; what is said of one being generally applicable to the rest. In like manner, what is said to or of any of God's people, on any particular occasion, is of general application and use; all that stand in the same relation to God having an interest in the same promises.

19. In the reckoning of time, a day is used by the prophets to denote a year; and things still future, to denote their certainty, are [as now in the E.] spoken of as already past.† When the prophets speak of the last or latter days, they always mean the days of the Messiah, or the time of the gospel dispensation. That day means often the same, and always some period at a distance.

20. When places are mentioned as lying N., S., E., or W., it is generally to be understood of their situation with respect to Judea or Jerusalem, when the context does not plainly restrict the scene to some other place. By the earth (or the word so tr.) the prophets frequently mean the land of Judea; and sometimes, says Sir I. Newton, the great continent of all Asia and Africa, to which they had access by land. By the isles of the sea, on the other hand, they understood the places to which they sailed, particularly all Europe, and probably the islands and sea-coasts of the Mediterranean.

21. The greatest part of the prophetic writings was first composed in verse; and still retains, notwithstanding all the disadvantages of a literal prose translation, much of the air and cast of the original, particularly in the division of the lines, and in that peculiarity of Heb. poetry of which we have already treated.

22. We shall treat of the several prophets, in the order of time, [given in the Table at the end of Pref. to Proph. Books,] dividing them into three classes; viz. those prophets who flourished before the Babylonian captivity—those who flourished near to and under it—and those who flourished after the return from Babylon.

SECTION II.

PROPHETS WHO FLOURISHED BEFORE THE BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY.

§ 1.—The Book of Jonah.

1. Jonah is generally supposed to have prophesied in the reigns of Joash and Jeroboam II., kings of Israel, the former of whom began to reign A. M. 3163, the latter died A. M. 3220, 2 K. 14:25. Jonah is said to have prophesied concerning Jeroboam, that he should restore the coast of Israel; which prophecy, not now extant, was perhaps delivered in the reign of Jehoahaz, the grandfather of Jeroboam, when the kingdom of Israel was greatly oppressed by the Syrians. [Comp. 2 K. 13:7 with 14:26.] It is therefore probable that Bp. Lloyd does not place Jonah too high in supposing that he prophesied towards the latter end of Jehoahaz, when Hazael, by his cruel treatment of Israel, was verifying the predictions of Eli-sha. 2 K. 17:12, 123, l. 22.

2. The book is a simple narrative. The beautiful prayer contained in ch. 2 has been justly admired; and, indeed, the whole book presents us with a lively and affecting description of the power and mercy of God. Dr. Gray has remarked, that the miracle by which God punished the unbecoming flight of Jonah, was, agreeably to the figurative arrangements of the O.T., rendered symbolic of an event that was to occur under the New. The prophet, in this instance a sign of Christ, (Mat. 12:39, 40, 16:4. Lu. 11:29, 30, &c.) was swallowed up by a great fish, as our Savior was admitted into the jaws of death, and for a similar length of time. The fame of Jonah's deliverance appears to have spread among the heathen nations.‡ The fictitious adventures of Hercules, who is said to have continued alive for three days in the belly of a dog sent against him by Neptune; the fable of Arion and the Dolphin, and of Perseus and Andromeda, as well as the Indian tradition of Deucalion and his wife, [and the Babylonian of Oannes; see Rob. Calm.] have all some connection with the prophet's story and deliverance.

§ 2.—The Book of Amos.

This prophet, who began his ministry in the time of Uzziah and Jeroboam II., was contemporary with Hosea, Jonah, and Isaiah, and perhaps also with Joel. The design of his prophecies appears to have been to awaken the Israelites out of that vain confidence which they appear to have placed in their outward prosperity, while they abandoned themselves to idolatry, avarice, and every kind of impiety. Hence he denounces the approaching captivity and dispersion of the people in the most terrible forms, mingling therewith predictions of their return from the coming captivity, and of the greater prosperity of the Messiah's kingdom. He also foretells the calamities with which the neighboring cities of Damascus, Gaza, Tyre, Edom, Ammon, and Moab, should be visited for their cruel oppressions of God's people. The book contains God's denunciations against the neighboring nations (1:23); against Judah (2:1, 5); against Israel (2:6, 9:10); the restoration of the tabernacle of David, in the Messiah's reign (9:11 to end).

§ 3.—The Book of Hosea.

1. This prophet dwelt in the kingdom of Samaria, and his prophecies principally regard that kingdom, then fast verging towards its ruin. He is said to have prophesied under Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah; and under Jeroboam II., king of Israel. If this be correct, he must have lived very long; for there was a period of 112 years between the commencement of Uzziah's and the termination of Hezekiah's reign. If to this we add 20 for his age when he entered on his prophetic office, it will make him above 120 years old. As there is nothing in his writings which indicates his having prophesied so long, Calmet is of opinion that the title of the book is a subsequent addition, and that the commencement of the prophet's writing is, 'The beginning of the word of the Lord by Hosea.' In this he has been followed by more recent critics.

* Of this we have copiously treated in pt. i. ch. iii. sect. 10. The section (11) on Symbolical Language should also be consulted.

GUIDE TO THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

2. Among other prophecies, Hosea foretells the deliverance of Judah from Sennacherib; the punishment of Judah, and the desolation of its cities; the gathering of the Gentiles; the present state of the Jews, and their future restoration in the general establishment of the Messiah's kingdom; the calling of our Savior out of Egypt; his resurrection on the 3d day; and the terrors of the last judgment, figuratively to be represented in temporal destruction impending over Samaria. Thus, amidst the denunciations of wrath, the people were animated and encouraged by some dawning of favor, and taught to cultivate righteousness and mercy, in expectation of the blessings of the Lord, and in the assurances of a final ransom from the power of the grave, and of a redemption from death, to be vanquished and destroyed.* The style is rather abrupt, the figures and similitudes rather lively than elegant, and traced with greater force than exactness.† His book is cited by our Lord (Mat. 9:12,13, 12:7); by the evangelist Matthew (2:15); comp. Hos. 11:1), and by Paul (Ro. 9:25,26, 1 Co. 15:4; comp. Ho. 6:2).

3. A singular circumstance connected with the history and ministry of Hosea, is that of his being enjoined (1:2) to adopt a type which may appear to involve an immoral connection. It appears, from the whole account, to have been a real transaction, though figurative as to the things it symbolized. The editor of Calmet has illustrated the circumstance by a description which the Baron Da Tott gives of those temporary marriages common in the East.‡ That the whole transaction was intended to expose and reprove the iniquity of the Israelites, is fully shown by the prophet himself.

4. The book contains a representation of the infidelity of the Israelites, under the type of the prophet's marriage with a dissolute woman (1:1-9); promises of the future restoration and prosperity of the people (v. 10,11); an exhortation on account of the people's wickedness; God's judgments against them, with promises of reconciliation (2:); the desolation of Israel before their restoration (3:); a denunciation of the iniquities of the people (4:1-17,19), and a caution to the people of Judah against being contaminated with their idolatry (v. 15,16); God's judgments against the priests, the people, and the princes of Israel (5:); a pathetic exhortation to repentance, with bitter complaints of the obstinacy and iniquity of the people (6: 7:); terrible denunciations of the captivity, distress, and destruction of Israel for their sins and idolatry (8:1-11:7); pathetic expostulations, urging the people to repentance, intermingled with threatenings of terrible punishment in case of impenitence (11:8-14:3); and a prophetic declaration of the restoration of all the tribes, their separation from idols, and the glory of the latter day (14:4, to end).

§ 4.—The Book of Isaiah.

1. Of this distinguished prophet our information is scanty and uncertain. [See Pref. to Is.] He prophesied probably 60 years. The name of Isaiah, as Vitringa has remarked, is in some measure descriptive of his character, signifying 'the salvation of Jehovah'; for no one of the prophets has foretold with such distinctness and particularity the advent and death of ^{the} man who was given for 'salvation to the ends of the earth.' He has always been regarded as a prophet of the highest eminence; and has been looked up to as the brightest luminary of the Jewish church. His style is lofty and elegant; and his metaphors and illustrations noble, and suitable to the dignity of the subjects of which he treats. Collectively viewed, his poetry forms the greatest tablet, both of awfully solemn and of joyfully beautiful conceptions, ever exhibited in poetic prediction. He is far from surpassing all the Heb. poets in individual passages; but in his fulness, force, majesty, and propriety, he comprehends more excellencies of the poetical character than any one of them.§ Ep. Lowth has selected the 34th and 35th chs. as a specimen of the prophet's style, and has ably illustrated the various beauties which distinguish the simple, regular, and perfect poem contained in the section. But ch. 11 affords the grandest specimen of his poetic powers, presenting one of the sublimest odes in the Bible, marked by the boldest personifications to be found in the whole range of poetry.

2. The clear and subsequently fulfilled predictions of Isaiah place his inspiration and authority beyond all doubt. He foretold the captivities of Israel and Judah (39:6,7; comp. 2 K. 24:13 and Da. 1:2), and described the ruin and desolation of Babylon, Tyre, and other nations (13:19-27, 14:22-24, 47:7-15). He called Cyrus by his name, and described his conquests and conduct towards the Jews, above 200 years before his birth. 44:28, 45:1-5.|| But his prophecies concerning the Messiah seem almost to anticipate the gospel history. Hence his designation, 'the evangelical prophet.' The divine character of Christ (7:14, 6:9,6, 35:4, 40:5,9,10, 42:6-8, 61:1, 62:11-63:4); his miracles (35:5,6, &c.); his peculiar qualities and virtues (11:2,3, 40:11, 43:1-3); his rejection (6:9-12, 49:7, 53:3), and sufferings for our sins (50:6, 53:1-11); his death, burial (53:8,9), and victory over the grave (23:5, 53:10,12); and, lastly, his final glory (49:7, 22:23, 52:13-15, 53:4,5), and the establishment, increase (2:2-4, 9:7, 42:1, 46:13), and perfection (9:2, 11:1-10, 16:5, 29:18-24, 32:1, 40:4,5, 49:9-13, 51:3-6, 52:6-10, 55:1-3, 59:16-21, 60:1,61:1-5, 65:25) of his kingdom are each specifically pointed out, and portrayed with the most striking and discriminating characters. It is impossible, indeed, to reflect on these, and on the whole chain of his illustrious prophecies, and not be sensible that they present the most incontestable evidence in support of Christianity.¶

3. The predictions of Isaiah may be arranged thus: the first 5 chs. relate to the reign of Uzziah; the 6th, to the reign of Jotham, his successor; and the remaining chs. must be divided between Ahaz and Hezekiah; though it is not easy to draw the line precisely between those monarchs, as to their share in the several predictions, till we arrive at the 36th ch., when we find ourselves in the 14th year of the reign of Hezekiah. The general opinion seems to be, that the reign of Ahaz embraces from the 7th to the 15th chs. incl. According to the chronology of Usher, Isaiah began to prophesy A. M. 3242, B. C. 760, and his last predictions were delivered A. M. 3306, B. C. 693; a period of 62 years.

4. According to Vitringa, this book is twofold in its matter: 1. Prophetic; 2. Historical. The former he divides into 5 parts: Five prophetic discourses directed to the Jews and Ephraimites (1:1-12); 8 prophetic discourses declaring the fate of the Babylonians, Philistines, Moabites, Syrians, Egyptians, Tyrians, and others (13-21); 3 discourses denouncing judgments on the disobedient Jews, and consoling the true followers of God (25: 35); 4 discourses referring to the Messiah, and the deliverance of the Jews from Babylon (40-48); 5 discourses pointing out the passion, crucifixion, and glory of the Messiah (49: to end). The historical part begins with ch. 36, and ends with ch. 39. It relates some of the transactions of the prophet's own time.

§ 5.—The Book of Joel.

Joel, the son of Bethuel, prophesied before the subversion of Judah, but when that event was fast approaching; in the reign, as some think, of Manasseh; or, according to others, of Josiah: we cannot determine, from his predictions themselves, precisely the time or reign in which they were delivered. He is said to have been of the city of Beth-aran, in the tribe of Reuben. He is distinguished for the fervor, elegance, and sublimity of his style; and his short but sublime work exhibits all those characters of energy for which the most illustrious prophets were celebrated, combined with a richness of imagery seldom rivalled, and never surpassed. He even surpasses Isaiah in concinnity, and is much imitated in Re. His description of the army of locusts, in ch. 2, and of the effusion of the Spirit in ch. 3, have no equal.

§ 6.—The Book of Micah.

Micah was a native of Marasha, a village in the south of Judah, in the vicinity of Eleutheropolis, and prophesied in the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah. His predictions regarded both kingdoms; hence he terms them 'a vision concerning Jerusalem and Samaria,' the two capitals. The Assyrian and Babylonian captivities were both drawing near, and the prophets Isaiah, Joel, Hosea, Amos, and Micah, were raised up by God to foretell these calamitous events, and exhort the people to repentance. Micah's style possesses great energy, copiousness, pathos, and sublimity; not without singular beauty and elegance. There are some of his predictions which will bear a comparison even with Isaiah himself. The iniquities of Israel and Judah are reproved with sharpness and fidelity: the ruin of these monarchies, and the nations by which it should be effected, and their future restoration according to the divine promise, all are made to turn on that glorious centre of providence and grace to which all prophecy hastened, and in which it terminated — the reign of the Messiah.||

§ 7.—The Book of Nahum.

1. Nahum, the Elkoshite, occupies a small but splendid place among the minor prophets. Josephus supposes him to have flourished in the reign of Jotham; and says, that his prophecies were accomplished 115 years after they were delivered. But the most accurate chronologers place him in the reign of Hezekiah, and conclude that his predictions were delivered soon after the destruction of Samaria by Shalmaneser. Accordingly, his book opens with a sublime exhibition of the power and goodness, the justice and compassion, of God. He represents 'whirlwind and storm' encompassing Him; 'clouds' scattered 'as the dust of his feet'; the sea shrinking and the rivers failing at his rebuke. Then this storm subsides instantly into a calm; every attribute of terror is laid aside, as He turns to his people; and all his majesty and power are combined for the security of those 'that trust in Him.' After this sublime expression, he directs his prophecies chiefly against Nineveh.

2. The book will be best understood by being read as a continuation or supplement to Jonah. They form connected parts of one moral history; the remission of God's judgment being illustrated in the one, the execution of it in the other. The attentive reader will perceive them to be contrasted in some of their contents, as well as in their general object: the repentance of the Ninevites and their wickedness; the clemency and just severity of the divine government being combined together in the mixed delineation of the two books.|| But of pure Christian prophecy, either direct or typical, perhaps the book of Nahum must be set down as affording no instance.*

§ 8.—The Book of Zephaniah.^t

Zephaniah was the son of Cushi, and is supposed to have been of the tribe of Simeon. It has been supposed, from the similarity of style, that Zephaniah has only abridged the prophecies of Jeremiah; but, as Dr. Gray remarks, he evidently flourished before that prophet; Jeremiah speaking of those abuses as partially removed, which Zephaniah describes as present in the most flagitious extent. This circumstance shows, also, that Zephaniah prophesied before the 18th year of Josiah, when this good king reformed the abuses of the Jewish church and state.

SECTION II.

PROPHETS WHO FLOURISHED NEAR TO AND DURING THE BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY.

§ 1.—The Book of Jeremiah.

1. This prophet exercised his office about 42 years with great zeal and faithfulness, was a man of distinguished piety and conscientious integrity, a warm lover of his country, and so affectionately attached to his countrymen, that their bitterest opposition could not sever him from their fortunes.[‡] He refused the favor of the king of Babylon, to share in the afflictions of his country. The idolatrous apostasy and other criminal enormities of the people of Judah, and the severe judgments about to be inflicted on them, intermingled with intimations of future restoration, are his principal subject-matters; excepting only ch. 45, which relates personally to Baruch, and the 6 succeeding chs., which respect the fortunes of some particular heathen nations.

2. It is observable, that, although many of these prophecies have their respective dates assigned to them, and others may be tolerably well guessed at from certain internal marks and circumstances, there appears to be a strange disorder in the arrangement, not easily to be accounted for on any principle of regular design. There is, indeed, a variation between the Heb. copies and those of the Sept. in the arrangement of those particular prophecies concerning the heathen nations, which in the Heb. are disposed all together, and, as we think, in their proper order of time with respect to each other, at the end of the book, intentionally, as it should seem, not to interrupt the course of Jewish history; whilst the authors of the Sept. have inserted them, with some difference of order among themselves, though perhaps no very material one, after 25:13. But the disorder complained of lies not here: it is common to both Heb. and Greek arrangements, and consists in the preposterous jumbling together of the prophecies of the reigns of Jehoiakim and Zedekiah, in the 17 chs. which follow the 20th in the Heb. copies; so that, without any apparent reason, many of the latter reign precede those of the former, and in the same reign the last delivered are put first, and the first last. As such an unnatural disposition could not have been the result of judgment, nor scarcely of inattention in the compiler, it follows that the original order has most probably, by some accident or other, been disturbed. Dr. Playney has endeavored with great judgment to restore the proper order of the chs. by transposing them wherever it appeared necessary, thus—

(1) The prophecies delivered in the reign of Josiah, containing chs. I to 12, incl.

(2) Delivered in the reign of Jehoiakim, comprising chs. 13-20, 22, 23, 35, 36, 43, to 45; and 40:1-33.

(3) Delivered in the reign of Zedekiah, including chs. 21, 24, 27-31, 37-39, 40; vs. 34-39, and chs. 50 and 51.

(4) Delivered under the government of Gedaliah, from the taking of Jerusalem to the retreat of the people into Egypt, and the prophecies delivered to the Jews in that country; comprehending chapters 40 to 44, inclusively.[§]

This very luminous arrangement has been adopted by most subsequent writers.

3. The following historical sketch of the times in which Jeremiah lived throws light upon his prophecies in general, and may help to explain sundry circumstances and allusions in them.

(1) In the reign of Manasseh, every species of impiety and moral corruption had been carried to the highest pitch, under the encouragement of royal example. And so thoroughly tainted were the minds of men by this corrupt influence, as to baffle all the endeavors of the good Josiah to bring about a reformation. This well-disposed prince having, in the 18th year of his reign, providentially met with the book of the law, was struck with horror at the danger to which he found himself and his kingdom exposed by the violations of it. He therefore set about removing all the abominations that were in the land, and engaged his subjects to be more dutifully observant of the law for the time to come. But though the king's heart was right, and his zeal fervent and sincere, it was all hypocrisy and dissimulation on the part of the people; their hearts were incorrigibly turned the wrong way; and God, who saw clearly the real bent of their dispositions, was not to be diverted from his designs of punishment. He began with depriving them, by a sudden stroke, of their excellent prince, under whose government they had enjoyed much happiness and tranquillity, of which they were altogether unworthy. He was slain in a battle with Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt, whom Josiah had gone out to oppose on his march against the king of Babylon, he being at that time in an alliance with the Babylonians. His death, however fatal to his kingdom, was, as to his own particular case, a merciful dispensation of Providence, that his eyes might not see all the evil that was coming on his land.

(2) Josiah being dead, his sons who succeeded him were not of a character to impede or delay the execution of God's judgments. It is said in general of them all, that they did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord. The first that mounted the throne was Shallum, or Jehoahaz, the second son, by the designation of the people. But his elevation was not of long continuance. Pharaoh Necho, having defeated the Babylonian forces, and taken Carchemish, on his return deposed Jehoahaz, after a reign of 3 months, and carried him to Egypt, from whence he never returned.^{||} In this short reign, Jeremiah does not appear to have had any revelation. Pharaoh Necho made use of his victory to reduce all Syria under his subjection; and having imposed a fine upon the kingdom of Judah of 100 talents of silver, and one talent of gold, he received the money from Jehoiakim, son of Josiah, whom he appointed king in his brother's stead. Jehoiakim was one of the worst and most wicked of all the kings of Judah; a man totally destitute of all religion; unjust, rapacious, cruel, and tyrannical in his government. In the beginning of his reign, he put Urijah, a prophet of God, to death, for having prophesied, as it was his duty to do, of the impending calamities of Judah and Jerusalem. And having either built a new palace, or enlarged the old one that belonged to the kings of Judah, he, by a strain of authority not less mean than wicked, withheld from the workmen the wages they had earned in building it. In short, he set no bounds to his evil inclinations and passions; and his people, freed from the wholesome discipline which had restrained them in his father's time, were not behindhand with him in giving way to every sort of licentious extravagance. Three years he reigned without molestation or disturbance from abroad; but towards the latter end of his 3d year, Nebuchadnezzar, being associated in the government by his father Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, was sent into Syria to recover the dismembered provinces of the Babylonian empire. In the 4th year of Jehoiakim, he beat the Egyptian army at the river Euphrates, retook Carchemish, and having subdued all the intermediate country, appeared before Jerusalem, of which he soon made himself master. Jehoiakim was at first loaded with chains, with an intention of sending him to Babylon. He was, however, released on his submission, and again suffered to reign, on taking an oath to be a true servant of the king of Babylon. But numbers of his people were sent captives to Babylon, together with several children of the blood royal, and of the first families of Judah, whom Nebuchadnezzar proposed to breed up in his own court, in order to employ them afterwards in the affairs of his empire. At the same time, many of the sacred vessels were taken away, and deposited in the temple of Belus, at Babylon; so that, from this date, the desolation of Judah may fairly be reckoned to have had its beginning.

(3) After the king of Babylon's departure, Jehoiakim continued to pay him homage and tribute for 3 years. In the mean time, both he and his people persisted in their evil courses, misinformed by the mischiefs which had already befallen them, and making light of the threatenings which God, by the ministry of his prophets, repeatedly denounced against them. At length, Jehoiakim refused to pay any longer the tribute assigned him, and broke out into open revolt. To chastise him, the king of Babylon, not being at leisure to come in person, directed his vassals of the neighboring provinces, the Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, to join with the Chaldean troops that were on the frontiers, and to ravage the land of Judah. They did so for 3 years together, and carried off abundance of people from the open country, who were sent to Babylon. Jehoiakim, in some attempt, as it should seem, to check these depredations, was himself slain without the gates of Jerusalem; and his dead body, having been dragged along the ground

(4) Jeconiah, the son of Jehoiakim, a youth of 18 years old, succeeded his father in the throne, and followed his evil example, as far as the shortness of his reign would admit. From the beginning of it Jerusalem was blocked up by the Babylonian generals. At the end of 3 months, Nebuchadnezzar joined his army in person, and upon his arrival, Jeconiah surrendered himself and his city at discretion. He was transported directly to Babylon, with his mother, his family, and his friends, and with them all the inhabitants of the land of any note or account. The treasures also of the temple and of the king's house, and all the golden vessels which Solomon had provided for the temple service, were at this time carried away. We read of no prophecy that Jeremiah actually delivered in this king's reign; but the fate of Jeconiah, his being carried into captivity, and continuing an exile to the time of his death, was early foretold in his father's reign, as may be particularly seen in ch. 24.

(5) The last king of Judah was Zedekiah, the youngest son of Josiah, whom Nebuchadnezzar made king, and exacted from him a solemn oath of allegiance and fidelity. He was not, perhaps, quite so bad a man as his brother Jehoiakim, but his reign was a wicked one, and completed the misfortunes of his country. His subjects seem to have but little respect him, whilst they considered him in no other light than as the lieutenant or viceroy of the king of Babylon, whose sovereignty they detested, and were continually urging him to throw off the yoke. Nor had he been long in the possession of his kingdom, before he received ambassadors from the kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Sidon, soliciting him to join in a confederacy against the Babylonian power. But he was wise enough at this time to hearken to the prophet Jeremiah's advice, and to reject their propositions; and for some time he consented to send his presents and ambassadors to Babylon yearly, in token of his obedience. But the iniquities of his people were now ripe for punishment; and their idolatries, as the prophet Ezekiel describes them (ch. 8), were become so enormously profligate, that the stroke of vengeance could no longer be suspended. Zedekiah, therefore, was at last prevailed on by evil counsel, and the promise of assistance from Egypt, to break his oath and renounce his allegiance, by which he drew upon himself the arms of the king of Babylon, who invaded Judah, took most of its cities, and invested Jerusalem. The Egyptians made a show of coming to his relief, and the Chaldean army, informed of their approach, broke off the siege, and advanced to meet them, having first sent off the captives that were in the camp. This produced a signal instance of the double-dealing of the Jews. For in the first moments of terror, they had affected to return to God, and in compliance with his law had proclaimed the year of release to their Hebrew bond-servants, and let them go free. But on the retreat of the Chaldeans, when they believed the danger was over, and not likely to return, they repented of their good deeds, and compelled those whom they had discharged to return to their former servitude. The Egyptians, however, durst not abide the encounter of the enemy, but faced about, and returned to their own land, leaving the people of Judah exposed to the implacable resentment of the king of Babylon. The siege was immediately renewed with vigor, and the city taken according to the circumstantial account in ch. 52.

(6) The subsequent transactions, of the murder of Gedaliah, of the retreat of the Jews that remained in Egypt, and of their ill behavior there, are so particularly related (chs. 40-44); that it were needless to repeat them here. But it may be of use to observe, that in the 2d year after the taking of Jerusalem, Nebuchadnezzar laid siege to Tyre; and in the course of that siege, which lasted 13 years, he sent part of his forces against the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Philistines, and other neighboring nations, to desolate and lay waste the country, as the prophets of God had foretold. At the same time Nebuzar-adan, the Babylonian general, again entered the land of Judah, and carried off a few miserable gleanings of inhabitants that were found there. In the next year after the taking of Tyre, the king of Babylon invaded Egypt, which he plundered and ravaged from one end to the other; and on this occasion, all the Jews that had fled into that kingdom for refuge, were almost entirely cut off or made prisoners. Such was the state of affairs in general, till, in the course of time, and precisely at the period foretold, the Babylonian monarchy was itself overturned by the prevailing power of the Medes and Persians, and the Jewish nation once more returned to their proper land.

4. The style of Jeremiah is beautiful and tender to a high degree, especially when he has occasion to excite the softer passions of grief and pity, which is not seldom the case in the first parts of his poetry. It is also, on many occasions, very elegant and sublime, especially towards the end, 46-51, where he approaches even the majesty of Isaia. The historical narratives, occasionally introduced, are written in plain, prosaic style.

5. We must not omit to notice that the writings of Jeremiah contain two or three striking predictions of the Messiah. On 23:5, 6, Dr. Hales has cited a remarkable passage from the ancient rabbinical book of Ikkauim, which well expresses the reason of the appellation given to the Redeemer: 'The Scripture calls the name of the MESSIAH, JAH, our RIGHTEOUSNESS, to intimate that HE WILL BE A MEDIATORIAL GOD, by whose hand we shall obtain justification from THE NAME; wherefore it calls HIM by the name of THE NAME, i. e. the ineffable name JAH, here put for GOD HIMSELF!'

The miraculous conception is clearly predicted in 31:22; and the spirituality and surpassing glory of the gospel dispensation is as clearly marked out in v. 31-36.

§ 2.—The Lamentations of Jeremiah.

1. Some authors suppose these the Lamentations referred to in 2 Ch. 35:25; but this cannot be, as it is evident, from the subject-matter of those we now possess, that they were not written till after the subversion of the kingdom of Judah. These pathetic compositions deplore the accomplishment of those prophecies already uttered by the prophet.

2. The Lamentations were certainly written in metre, and consist of plaintive effusions, composed upon the plan of the funeral dirges, all upon the same subject, and uttered, as Bp. Lowth thinks, without connection, as they rose in the mind of the prophet, in a long course of separate stanzas, which have subsequently been put together, and formed into one entire poem. The whole is properly divided in our Bibles into 5 parts, each of which is a distinct elegy, consisting of 22 periods, corresponding with the number of letters in the Heb. alphabet. In the first 4 elegies the several periods commence, as an acrostic, with the different letters following each other in alphabetical order. In the 1st, 2d, and 4th elegy, the prophet addresses the people in his own person, or else personifies Jerusalem, and introduces that city as a character; the 3d part is supposed to be uttered by a chorus of Jews, represented by their leader; and in the 5th, the whole nation of the Jews, on being led into captivity, pour forth their united complaints to Almighty God.†

§ 3.—The Book of Habakkuk.

1. This prophet lived in the reign of Je-hoiakim, and was contemporary with Jeremiah. That he prophesied after the taking of Nineveh, is inferred from his silence respecting the Assyrians, while he predicts the terrible judgments which threatened his country from the Chaldeans, whom he calls a 'bitter and hasty nation,' and whose ferocious character and unsparing cruelty he describes with all the force and grandeur of oriental imagery. The Chaldeans are threatened in their turn; and the book closes with a magnificent description of the majesty of God. Whoever reads the prophecies of Habakkuk must be struck with the grandeur of his imagery, and the sublimity of his style, especially in the ode in ch. 3, which Bp. Lowth ranks among the most perfect specimens of that class of poetry. Michaelis pronounces Habakkuk to have been a great imitator of former poets, but with some additions of his own, and with no common degree of sublimity.‡

2. This book contains an appeal to God on the rapid growth of iniquity and vice among the Jewish people (ch. 1:1-4). God announces the approaching captivity as a punishment for their wickedness (v. 5-11), upon which the prophet humbly expostulates with Him, for punishing his people by the Chaldeans (v. 12-21). God promises a future accomplishment of the promises made to his people, by the Messiah (which also refers to the near deliverance of Cyrus), and shows that in the mean time the just will live by faith (v. 2-4); the destruction of the Babylonian empire is then foretold (v. 5-20); and the prayer or psalm of the prophet follows, in which he implores God to hasten the redemption of his people (ch. 3).

§ 4.—The Book of Daniel.

1. During the captivity of the Jews in Chaldea, this eminent prophet was raised up by God to exhibit and uphold the true religion. He was descended from the royal family of Judah, and was carried to Babylon after the destruction of Jerusalem, when about 18 or 20 years of age. He was contemporary with Ezekiel, who mentions his extraordinary wisdom and piety, Ez. 14:14, 20. The book which passes under the name of Daniel was certainly of his composition, although some Jewish writers maintain that prophecies were never committed to writing out of the limits of Judea, and that the book in question was composed by men of the great synagogue. In many passages he represents himself as the author, in the most express and unequivocal terms. It was admitted into the Jewish canon as his, and its genuineness is confirmed by the references of the N. T. Mat. 24:15, Mk. 13:14. Josephus also affirms that Daniel himself committed his prophecies to writing. His prophecies concerning the Messiah, the destruction of Jerusalem, the revolution of states, and other remarkable events, are astonishingly clear, and their very dates precisely marked. All his prophecies are related to each other, like the several parts or members of the same body. The first is the easiest to be understood, and every succeeding prophecy adds something new to what goes before. That part which relates to the Babylonian empire is in Chaldee. He lived in great favor with the Babylonian monarchs, and his extraordinary merit procured him the like regard from Darius and Cyrus, the 1st and 2d kings of Persia. He was, indeed, the only prophet who enjoyed any great share of worldly prosperity. He lived throughout the captivity, but does not seem to have ever returned to his own country. The last of his visions which we have an account of, was in the 3d year of Cyrus (about 534 B. C.), when he was about 94 years of age; and it is not likely he lived much longer. He was then at Susa, on the Tigris, where he probably remained till he died.||

|| Smith's Summary View of the Prophets, p. 155.

2. The style of Daniel is not in general so remarkable for its poetical and figurative cast, as that of most of the other prophets; but it possesses more of the ease and simplicity of historical narration, though the visions which he records are in themselves highly figurative and emblematical. The whole book comprises a detail of regular history and remarkable prophecy; and this intermixture gives it a very novel and interesting complexion. The first 6 chs. are principally historical, with the exception of the 2d, which contains the interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's prophetic dream, respecting the successive establishment and decay of the chief kingdoms of the world, till the introduction of that which was finally to obtain unrivalled power and universality. There is such an air of truth, and such a justness of coloring, in the different accounts of the miraculous deliverance of Shadrach and his companions from the fiery furnace, to which they were consigned by the persecuting intolerance of Nebuchadnezzar; in the unhallowed and sacrilegious festivity of Belshazzar, with the awful consequences that ensued; in the story of Daniel's commitment and deliverance from the lions' den; and in all the minute details of these transactions,—that the reader is transported to the very spot, and has his feelings infallibly engrossed in every scene. The alternations of terror and of delight agitate the bosom, while sentiments of the sublimest nature are incidentally communicated. It is, indeed, a tale of wonder, divested of all fictions adornments; but a tale of great political and moral importance, and of most evident practical utility. [For, while it carried on God's designs as to Israel and redemption, it preached the true God to the two powers successively dominant from China to Ethiopia, and communicating with each,—thus leaving the whole world without excuse in destroying Him.] The events of the 6th ch. belong to the time of Darius the Mede: in the 7th and 8th, the reader is carried back to a previous period, namely, to the first 3 years of the reign of Belshazzar. The last 6 chs. consist of prophecies which, though manifestly connected, were delivered at different times.¹

3. The prophecies of Daniel were in many instances so exactly fulfilled, that those persons who would otherwise have been unable to resist the evidence which they furnished in support of our religion, have not scrupled to affirm that they must have been written subsequently to those occurrences which they so faithfully describe.² But this groundless and unsupported assertion of Porphyry, who,

Some Illustrations of Daniel (from the Pict. Bible, &c.).
At 1:4, the youths selected for the king's service are said to have been well favored and without blemish. So, says Ricart, in his "Oriental Empire," the youths designed for the service of the king were chosen from the plainest and most robust of the Persian bodies, and without any defects of nature: for it is conceived that a corrupt and sensual soul can scarce inhabit in a serene and ingenuous aspect; and I have observed, not only in the seraglio, but also in the courts of great men, their personal attendants have been of comely, lusty youths, well habited, deporting themselves with singular modesty and respect in the presence of their masters.³ Not a single intimation is there in the account of Daniel which may not be illustrated from the customs of the Turkish seraglio, previous to the changes by the present sultan.

At 3:1, "an image of gold," is stated to have been erected 60 cubits high; which may include the pedestal [or base] on which it was erected; probably, a much lower angiography by Egyptian capture arises, in imitation of the figure of the golden calf of Meroë. [Cf. Ez. iii. p. 725.] But that the Chaldeans were accustomed like the Leucani to set up vast golden images of their gods, and particularly of Belus, appears from Herodotus, who, after describing the famous temple dedicated to him, and in which there was no statue, adds, that within the precincts of this temple there was a smaller sacred edifice, upon the ground; within which there was an immense golden statue of Jupiter (Belus), in a sitting posture; with large tables about it, a throne, and steps of gold, containing 800 talents. He adds that there was also, not long since, within the sacred edifice, a statue of solid gold, 12 cubits high. Darius Hystaspes durst not remove this; but his son Xerxes did, and placed the pieces of metal upon the top of Nineveh. Perhaps one of these, or particularly this last, may have been the image Nebuchadnezzar caused to be cast in the plains of Dura, mentioned after the transaction recorded in this chapter of Daniel.

4:21. Coats, hoseen, hats, &c. Rather mantles, turbans, and wide drawers or trousers, such as are still worn by the Persians, &c., and called by a similar name: [but comp. cut.]

U. 30. Great Babylon which I have builded.] The Greeks refer the magnificence of Babylon — the scenes constantly before the eyes of Daniel — the streets so often traversed by captive Israel — the queens Semiramis, who lived before, and Nitocris, who lived after Nebuchadnezzar. But the native historian Berossus, together with Megasthenes and Alypius, expressly attributes them to him; and it would seem, moreover, that Nitocris, whom some make Nebuchadnezzar's, others his son's wife, merely completed the great works he began, while others suppose that she accomplished all of it. After the fall of Nineveh, when Babylon had become the seat of a great empire, the city increased in size and grandeur. The trust-worthy Herodotus describes Babylon from observation, and though it appears incredible, yet his account should not be rejected, and it becomes less surprising when we call to mind the pyramids and temples of Egypt, the 1500 miles of the Chinese wall, &c., and the employment, upon such works, of whole enslaved nations, fed in a mild climate, on a fertile soil, by extensive conquest, and robbery on a mighty scale.]

The palace mentioned in Daniel is that which Nebuchadnezzar is said to have built and enclosed with a triple wall, at the W. end of the bridge across the Euphrates, and a smaller one on the opposite side. [See Frontisp. to vol. iii. and notes, end of Jer. 51: &c.] 4:33. The Medes, &c. — Cyrus, the son of Cambyses, known even then that hydrocephalous madness, caused by ancient leprosy (volvulus) or epilepsy, was incurable. — Cyrus, the son of Cambyses, and J. M. Good. Such madmen went about at night, haunting wretches in their houses, opening sepulchers, &c. their limbs covered with ulcers, their bodies neglected. Comp. Virg. Eccl. 6. 48, on which passage Servius says these daughters of Proetus, in their fury fancying themselves cows, run bellowing about the fields. Thus the king, fancying himself an ox, fed on grass. Schenckius records that a husbandman of Paulus was thus slain, and imagined himself a wolf, attacked and even killed several in the fields; and, when taken, was forced in declaring himself a real wolf, except in the inversion of his skin and hair.

51. Belshazzar.] This name does not occur in the profane histories, and it is difficult to identify him: there are other perplexities in this period of Babylonian history, seen, in part, in the following differing accounts from Hale and the celebrated French work,

B.C. L'Art de servir les Dates.

605. Nebuchadnezzar, who was succeeded by his son.

552. Evil-merodach, who, having provoked general indignation by his tyranny and atrocities, was, after a short reign of about two years, assassinated by his brother-in-law.

550. Nergalzaur, or Nercessoslaazar, who was regarded as a Deliverer, and succeeded by the choice of the nation.

He perished in a battle against Cyrus the Persian, and was succeeded by his son.

553. Laboreosarchos, notorious for his cruelty and oppression, and who was assassinated by two nobles, Gobryas and Grindates, whose son he had slain. The throne was then ascended by him.

554. Nabonadius, the Lalgynetus of Herodotus, the Nabonidus of Josephus, and the Belshazzar of Daniel, who was the son of Evil-merodach, and who now succeeded to the throne of his father. After a voluptuous reign, his rule was taken by the Persians, under Ctesias, on which occasion he lost his life.

555. Could not read the writing.] It being, perhaps, in the ancient and obsolete Hebrew, resembling the Syriacian characters. See the coins, &c. He. 10:4.

5:10. Queen came into the banquet-house.] We are informed above that the "wives and concubines" of the king were present at the banquet. It therefore seems probable that the "queen" who now first appears was the queen-mother; and this probability is strengthened by the circumstance that the queen-mother was the regent during the minority of her husband and of her son, the present Belshazzar. This famous queen Nitocris could not therefore but be well acquainted with the character and services of Daniel. But how happens it that Belshazzar needed her information concerning Daniel, and was unacquainted with him, as appears from v. 13, so eminent a person and public officer? Chardin's MSS. (in Harmer) afford an ingenious and not improbable solution. Daniel, as the queen said, had been made, by Nebuchadnezzar, "master of the magicians, astrologers, Chaldeans, and soothsayers."⁴ Of this employment, Chardin conjectures that he had been deprived on the death of that king; and obtains this conclusion from the fact that, when a Persian king dies, both his astrologers and physicians are driven from court — the former for not having predicted, and the latter for not having prevented, his death. If such were the usage of the ancient Babylonian, as it is of the modern Persian court, we have certainly a most satisfactory solution of the present difficulty, as Daniel must then be supposed to have relinquished his public employments, and to have lived retired in private, in consequence of the loss of his place, and of his rank.

6:1. Darius.] The Cyaxares of the Greeks: one of 7 sisters, married to the king of Persia, who was the number of the great Cyrus and another, married to the king of Babylon. In his latter days, he was in fact governed by his nephew and heir, Cyrus. "In that noon ency," says Hale, "which great souls have always over little ones." Their interests were so much identified at this time, and the connection between them was so close, that this alone will suffice fully account for the Medes and Persians being in this book mentioned so stably together. Herodotus, remarking on the truth with which the characters of kings are drawn in the book of Daniel, observes that Xerxes planned to copy Cyrus, as well as the laws of a certain upper, easily imagined, but important part, and made his own laws. Is not that Darius — the same Darius who allowed his slaves to be cast into the lions' den, and then spent a night in lamentation for his son, and at last, in strict conformity with Zoroaster's description, condemned to death, not only his false accusers, but also their wives and children?⁵

6:16. Lions.] That this new kind of punishment should be first mentioned in Scripture as Babylonish, shows the accuracy of the sacred writers, in their references to manners and usages. For though the Babylonians' throwing offenders into lions kept in dens for that purpose, is not mentioned by any profane writer, yet the researches of modern travellers bring to light monuments both of Babylon and Susa, showing this to have been their ancient custom. The cut from Porter shows a man with his hands bound behind him, and a lion at his head, tearing it, on each side of a block of white marble found near the tomb of Daniel, at Susa. Another relic, given in Keppel, was found at Babylon, a colossal lion of granite; also a gem given by Mignan. [Compare a similar relic, cut, end of Ez.] See "Truth of Revelation demonstrated," &c. 1831. — Pict. Bibl.

6:28. Cyrus.] Son of Cambyses the Persian, and of Mandane, daughter of Astyages, king of Media-Persia. At the age of 30, Cyrus was made general of the Persian troops, and, at the head of 30,000 men, he led them to the gates of Babylon, whom the Babylonians were preparing to attack. Cyaxares and Cyrus gave him battle in the plain of Durus. After this, Cyrus carried the war into the countries beyond the river Halys; subdued Capadocia; marched against Cucusus, king of Lydia, defeated him, and took Sardis; his capital. Having reduced almost all Asia, he repassed the Euphrates, against the Assyrians; defeating them, he laid siege to Babylon, which he took on a festival day, after diverting the course of the river. On his return to Persia, he married his cousin, the daughter and heiress of Cyaxares; after wh ch he engaged in several wars, and subdued all the nations between Syria and the Red Sea. He died at the age of 70, after a reign of 30 years. And here I close concerning the manner of his death.

We leave the history of ancient Scripture; but they are more certain than those derived from other sources. He had always a particular regard for Daniel, and continued him in his great employments. The other monarchs, forgetful of his conduct, and (4:28) particularly desecrate his name, above a century before he was born. — Jehovah, the Jews of Babylon showed this passage to Cyrus; and that, in the edict he granted for their return, he acknowledged that he received the empire of the world from the God of Israel. Heir of a monarch who ruled over one of the poorest and most inconsiderable kingdoms of Asia, (though its hardly inhabitants were at that time the bravest of the brave,) he did not become acquainted with the sacred books which contained it, nor with the singular people in whose possession it was found; till he had accomplished all the purposes for which he had been sent. — The national pride of the Jews, during the days of the inundation of Nineveh, would hinder them from divulging another nation's such prophecies, as it were; — we are desirous reflections on their wicked practices and unfeathered conduct; and it was only when captives in Babylon that they submitted to exhibit, to the mighty monarch whose bondmen they had become, the prophetic record of their own sinners and punishment, and of his still higher destiny in the ruin of the builder of Jerusalem. No temptation therefore could be laid before the conqueror in his life to excite his latent ambition to accomplish this very full and explicit prophecy; and the facts of his life, recorded by historians of very opposite characters, — especially all concern in developing a series of consecutive events, which are noted in his biography, — all concur in bearing out this result. — His career, differing greatly from those rapid circles peculiar to the heroic ages, — the bold, impetuous, valiant men of war in the East; — and which, from the unbroken conversion in which they grew up, and mutually dependent. Yet this consideration does not preclude the presence of a mighty spirit working in this man; which is told him, "I will first tried thee, that thy path has not known in Me."

Xenophon in his Cyropaedia, or "Education of Cyrus," the last of which is true history, adorned and refined by philosophy, exhibits for universal imitation the life and actions of this prince, eradicating in the ancient Persian school of the Physicianians, the parent of the Socion. — Herodotus paints the portrait of Cyrus in dark colors, and has been followed in opposing to the contrary account of Xenophon. — Cicero, of Halic., Plato, Strabo, Justin, and others, in opposing to the contrary account of Xenophon. — In the Persian histories, and, apparently, the Hindu Scriptures. — The reason for this contrast of his character probably to be found in his aversion to Cyrus, for having been the murderer of his countrymen. — Xenophon informs us, that the last seven years of his full sovereignty this prince spent in peace and tranquillity at home, revered and beloved by all classes of his subjects. In his dying moments, surrounded by his family, friends, and children, he delivered to them the noblest exhortations to piety, virtue, and courage. So the Persian historians relate, that, after a long and bloody war, Cyrus, or Cyrus, subdued the empire of Tarsus, and the city of Balk. In Charos, a small residence, he kept in order his new subjects; that he exacted every year, in Persia, a sum equal to the produce of his provinces, and harmony between the Thracians and Indians; that he reformed the laws of his subjects, reformed civil and religious abuses throughout the provinces, and, at length, after a long and glorious reign, resigned the crown to his son, Artaxerxes, and retired to solitude, confessing that he had lived long enough for his own glory, and that it was then time for him to devote the remainder of his days to God. Pliny notices the tomb of Cyrus at Pasargadae, in Persia. [Cf. Dz. 10:1.] Artian and Strabo describe it; and they agree with in the 3d century, wrote against Christianity, serves but to establish the character of Daniel as a great and enlightened prophet; and Porphyry, by confessing and proving, from the best historians, that all which is included in Da. ch. II., relative to the kings of the N. and of the S. of Syria, and of Egypt, was truly, and in every particular, acted and done in the order there related, has undeniably contributed to the reputation of those prophecies of which he attempted to destroy the authority; for it is contrary to all historical testimony, and contrary to all probability, to suppose that the Jews would have admitted into the canon of their sacred writ a book which contained pretended prophecies of what had already happened. And indeed it is impossible that these prophecies should have been written after the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, since they were tr. into Greek near 100 years before the period in which he lived; and that tr. was in the possession of the Egyptians, who entertained no kindness for the Jews, or their religion. Those prophecies, also, which foretold the victories and dominion of Alexander (85. 113) were shown to him, by Jaddua, the high-priest, as we learn from Josephus (book x. c. 12, book xi. c. 8); and the Jews therupon obtained an exemption from tribute every sabbatical year, and the free exercise of their laws.

4. Daniel not only predicted future events with singular precision, but accurately defined the time in which they should be fulfilled, as was remarkably exemplified in that illustrious prophecy of the 70 weeks, in which he prefixed the period for "bringing in everlasting righteousness by the Messiah," as well as in giving the mysterious predictions that probably mark out the time or duration of the power of Antichrist, and, as some suppose, for the commencement of the millennium, or universal reign of saints, which they conceive to be foretold, for the explanation of which we must wait the event.*

5. The historical part of Daniel narrates the education of Daniel and his associates in Babylon (1); Nebuchadnezzar's dream, with its interpretation (2); the miraculous preservation and promotion of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego (3); a second dream of Nebuchadnezzar interpreted by Daniel, and its accomplishment (4); Belshazzar's impious feast, Daniel's interpretation of the mysterious writing, the death of Belshazzar, and the taking of the city by the Medes and Persians (5); Daniel's promotion under Darius, the conspiracy against him, his preservation, and Darius's decree (6).

6. The prophetic part comprises the vision of the 4 beasts, concerning the 4 great monarchies, with its interpretation (7:1); the vision of the ram and he-goat, typifying the destruction of the Medo-Persian empire by the Greeks and Macedonians, under Alexander, and its interpretation (8:1). Daniel, understanding from the prophecies of Jeremiah that the 70 years' captivity was now drawing to a close, was engaged in fasting and prayer for the restoration of Jerusalem, when the angel Gabriel was sent to him, to inform him that the holy city should be rebuilt and peopled, and should continue for a period of 70 weeks, or 490 years; at the end of which it should be utterly destroyed for putting the Messiah to death (9:1-24). The commencement of this period is fixed to the time when the order was issued for rebuilding the temple, in the 7th year of Artaxerxes. See Ezr. 7:11. Seven weeks, or 49 years, the temple was Corin, find Alexander on a funeral bier to his shade, and found not the treasure he expected, but a rotten stench Persian cimeter. And Histore records the following in Alexander: — "O man, whenever thou art, and whenever thou wilt, I am Cyrus, the founder of the Persian empire, that covered my body." At another time, which alluded at this remark: — "This is a most singular and extraordinary epigram, which I wrote for Alexander the Great, whose coming I prophesied with a prophetic spirit." For how could Cyrus know of his coming? — Very easily. Dur-ezile Ghom, who warred the hungry Nedshahzadur, i.e., of the Babylonian empire, that it should be subverted by (Da. 2:37, 39, or the Mede and the Persian). Dur-ezile also told the impious Belshazzar, Da. 5:28; we may rest assured, also, the founder of the Persian empire, the symbolical vision horn in his forehead, Alexander of Macedon, coming swift.

building; 62 weeks, or 434 years more, bring us to the public manifestation of Messiah, at the beginning of John the Baptist's preaching; and 1 week, or 7 years, added to this, will reach the time of our Lord's death, or the 33d of the Christian era; in all, 490 years, according to the prophecy (v. 25-27); Daniel's last prophetic vision in the 3d year of Cyrus, in which the succession of the Persian and Grecian monarchies is described, with the wars that should take place between Syria and Egypt, under the latter monarchy, and the conquest of Macedonia by the Romans (11:1-36); the tyranny of the Antichrist which was to spring up under the Romans, till the church be purified from its pollutions (v. 36-39); a prediction of the invasion of the Romans by the Saracens from the S., and of the Turks from the N. (v. 40-15; comp. Ez. 38:2,15,14,16,13, 39:2,1, 33:22,23; Re. 22:8,9); and the proper conclusion to these great revolutions, in the general resurrection (12:1-1). The whole concludes with a notation of the time when these events were to be accomplished; when the Jews were to be restored, Antichrist destroyed, the fulness of the Gentiles brought in, and the reign of the saints to begin (v. 5-13).⁴

§ 5.—The Book of Obadiah.

I. It is not quite certain when this prophet lived, but it is highly probable that he was contemporary with Jeremiah and Ezekiel, who denounced the same dreadful judgments on the Edomites, as the punishment of their pride, violence, and cruel insults over the Jews, after the destruction of their city. The prophecy (so Usher) was fulfilled about 5 years after the destruction of Jerusalem.

2. It divides into 2 parts — the judgments denounced on the Edomites (v. 1-16); the restoration and future prosperity of the Jews (v. 17-21). Though partly fulfilled in the return of the Jews from Babylon, and the conquests of the Maccabees over the Edomites (1 Mac. v. 3-5,65, &c.), it is thought to have a further aspect to events still future.

§ 6.—The Book of Ezekiel.

1. This prophet was the son of Buzi, a descendant of Aaron, of the tribe of Levi, and consequently of the sacerdotal order. He was carried to Babylon along with Je-hoiakim, or Jecoeniah, king of Judah. He entered upon his prophetic office in the 5th year of his captivity, and exercised its functions for about 21 years, i. e. from the year B. C. 595, and 35 years after Jeremiah had begun his office, so that the last 3 years of that prophet coincide with the first 3 of Ezekiel. His design appears to have been, chiefly, to convince the captive Jews that they erred in supposing their brethren who still remained in Judea to be in happier circumstances than themselves. Hence he describes the terrible judgments impending over the city and temple, and inveighs against the heinous sins which were the cause of such calamities. Josephus affirms that Ezekiel wrote two books on the captivity at Babylon; but as we have no intimation of the first in this larger volume, and as the

the kind in the sacred volume, and as the Jewish historian has not given his authority, this assertion may fairly be rejected.

ticularly ch. 16, which they conceived to be contradictory to the law of Moses. The discrepancy, however, completely vanishes when the prophet's scope or design is regarded; and, in fact, Moses himself has said the very thing objected against Ezekiel. See De. 24:16.

3. With regard to the style of Ezekiel [see Pref. to Ez.], Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, as far as relates to style, may be said to hold the same rank among the Hebrews, as Homer, Simonides, and Aeschylus among the Greeks. There are some elegies in Ezekiel, which are actually distinguished by the title of lamentations, and which may, with the utmost propriety, be referred to the class of elegies. Among these are the two lamentations concerning Tyre and the king of Tyre.[¶] Michaelis dissents from Lowth, and thinks the prophet displays more art and luxuriance in amplifying and decorating his subject than is consistent with poetical fervor, or, indeed, with true sublimity. He pronounces him an imitator, yet having the art to give an air of novelty and ingenuity, but not of grandeur and sublimity, to all his compositions; that the imagery which was familiar to the Hebrew poetry he constantly makes use of; and that those figures which were invented by others, but were only glanced at or partially displayed by those who first used them, he dwells upon, and depicts with such accuracy and copiousness, as to leave nothing to add to them, nothing to be supplied by the reader's imagination. Abp. Newcome, however, has entered into an elaborate investigation of the style of Ezekiel, which he concludes with remarking, that 'if the prophet's style is the old age of the Heb language and composition, it is a firm and vigorous one, and should induce us to trace its youth and manhood with the most judicious attention.'^{¶¶}

4. This book contains all Ezekiel's call to the prophetic office (1:1-28); his commission and encouragements for executing it (1:28-2:2); his instructions (3:1-27); denunciations against the Jewish people, mingled with promises of mercy and restoration (4:1-21); prophecies against the Tyrians (25-23:19), and Sidonians (v. 20-23); promises of deliverance to the Jews, and restoration to their own land (v. 24-26); a prediction of the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar (29-32); a warning, reminding the prophet of the awful responsibility of his office (33:1-9); an exhortation to the Jews to repent, with promises of mercy and acceptance on their obedience (v. 10-20). The prophet receives intelligence of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, whence he takes occasion to check the vain confidence of his countrymen, by foretelling the utter desolation of all Judea (v. 21-29); and reprobates the hypocrisy of those who listen to his instructions without obeying them (ver. 30-33). A reproof directed against the rulers of the people, and a promise to restore them to their own land under the Messiah, and render them prosperous and permanently secure (34); a resumption of the predictions against the Edomites, for their insults to the Jews (35: 36:15); and a promise of deliverance and restoration to the latter (36:16-37). A prophecy yet unfulfilled, relating to the victory of Israel over Gog and Magog (38: 39:1-22; comp. Re. 20:8,9), which is concluded with a promise of deliverance from the captivity, and of a future restoration of all Israel (v. 28,29); a vision representing a new temple and city, and a new government, typical of a universal church,

(the Persian empire (Da. 8:5,8), under the last king, Codomane, the fourth from Darius Nothus, as afterwards more distinctly explained, Da. 11:1,4. Cyrus, therefore, decidedly addresses the short-lived conqueror, O man, whoever thou art, &c. — Enye. of Re- commonly believed to be the description of a temple of corresponding construction with the celebrated temple of Solomon, but having, probably, a further reference, and really delineating a spiritual edifice, which 'shall be filled with the glory of the Lord' (40: -43).

SECTION III.

PROPHETS WHO FLOURISHED AFTER THE RETURN FRDM BABYLON.

§ 1.—The Book of Haggai.

1. This prophet lived about 520 years B. C. He was raised up for the purpose of stimulating Zerubbabel, Joshua, and the people, to resume the building of the temple, interrupted for 14 years by the intrigues of the Samaritans. He commences his work by remonstrating with the people for being so solicitous about the completion and adornment of their own houses, while they suffered the house of God to remain in an unfinished state; and encourages them to complete it (1:1-9); predicts an abundant harvest as their reward (v. 10-19); and prophesies a mighty revolution, by the setting up of Christ's kingdom (v. 20-23). He declares that the glory of the latter temple should greatly surpass that of the former—not in external splendor—but in spiritual magnificence, as it should be visited by the King Messiah.

2. Bp. Lowth pronounces Haggai to be the most obscure of the prophetic writers. His work may be considered as, in general, a prose composition; but there are some passages of much sublimity and pathos.

§ 2.—The Book of Zechariah.

1. The place of Zechariah's birth, and the tribe to which he belonged, are equally unknown. He was contemporary with Haggai, and called to the prophetic office for the same purpose* as that prophet.

2. The book contains an exhortation to repentance and to the completion of the temple (1:1-6); encouragements to the latter work (v. 7-23); an admonition for the Jews to depart from Babylon, with a promise of the divine presence (v. 6-13); further encouragements to rebuild the temple, with assurances of success, and of a great future deliverance by the Messiah (3:1); a vision, in which the divine judgments against the wicked are represented as great and swift (the vision also intimates that the Babylonish captivity was occasioned by the wickedness of the people, and that a second world occur, should they continue impenitent (ch. 5); a vision of 4 chariots drawn by several sorts of horses, denoting the succession of the 4 great empires (6:1-8); another vision, referring, probably, in its primary sense, to the establishment of the kingdom under Zerubbabel and Joshua, but, in a fuller sense, to the kingdom of the Messiah (v. 9-15). A deputation from the Jews in Babylon having been sent to Jerusalem, to inquire of the priests and prophets if they were still to observe the fasts on account of the destruction of Jerusalem, the prophet is commanded to enforce upon them the necessity of true repentance, judgment, and mercy, and the utter worthlessness of those outward observances which do not spring from a principle of obedience and love to God (7:); a promise of the restoration of Judah, with the returning favor and presence of God (8:1-17); a permission to discontinue the fasts of the captivity (v. 11,19); a promise of the future enlargement of the church in the conversion of the Gentiles (v. 20-23); predictions of the conquest of Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine, by Alexander the Great (9:1-7); a declaration of the number of Philistines who should become proselytes to Judaism, and also of the watchful care of God over his temple in those troublous times (v. 7,8); a prophecy of the advent of Christ, the peace and extent of his kingdom, and the complete subjugation of all the enemies of his people (v. 9-17; comp. Mat. 21:5, and Jn. 12:15); a denunciation of the evils of idolatry, accompanied with an exhortation to the worship of God, and a promise of great prosperity on the obedience of the people (10:; comp. Ez. 22:29); a prediction of the rejection and destruction of the Jews for their rejection of the Messiah (11:); God declares his care of his people notwithstanding their sins, and his interposition in their favor; their deep sorrow and grief for the rejection of the Messiah, and their conversion to the faith of the gospel (12:13); the destruction of Jerusalem, probably by the Romans God's interposition in the destruction of their enemies; and their subsequent prosperity (ch. 14; comp. Ez. 33:39, and Re. 20:3,9).

§ 3.—The Book of Malachi.

1. Malachi, the last of the prophets, completed the canon of the O. T. Scriptures, about 409 years B. C., towards the end of the government of Ezra and Nehemiah. It has been imagined, by some writers, that Malachi (angel or messenger) was merely a general name, expressive of office, and given to Ezra, whom they suppose the author of this book. Others conceive Malachi to have been an incarnate angel. Such opinions, however, have no good ground.

2. This prophet appears to have been raised up to reprove the sins of the people, and reform those abuses which had crept into the Jewish church and state during the absence of Nehemiah at the court of Persia. His writings contain a denunciation of the divine displeasure, in consequence of the sins and idolatry of the people (chs. 1, 2); a prediction of the coming of Christ, and ministry of his harbinger, John the Baptist (3:1); the terrible judgments to accompany the advent of the Messiah, in case of the people's impenitence (v. 2-6); reproofs for various sins committed, and a declaration that God will ultimately make a signal distinction between the righteous and the wicked (v. 7-11); another prediction of the appearance of 'the Son of Righteousness,' and his great harbinger, John, with a solemn injunction to regard the law of Moses [in letter and spirit] (v. 2-6).

CHAPTER V.

OF THE APOCRYPHAL BOOKS.

1. To these it is not our intention to do more than advert, thus bringing before the reader the connecting link between the Old and the New Testament.

2. The chasm left in history, between the events recorded in the Hebrew writings and those chronicled in the gospels, has been filled up by Joseph or Josephus, who has never been placed on a level with the canonical writers; and certain other persons, most of them now unknown, who have, by the church of Rome, been exalted to a rank equal to the inspired penmen, but who are of no authority, either as historians or as teachers of divine things. Their books are denominated apocryphal—a word of Greek origin, derived either from apo tis kryptis, because they were removed from the crypt, chest, or other receptacle, in which the sacred books were deposited; or from apo, from, and kryptō, I hide, because their original is concealed from their readers as quite destitute of proper testimonials, and of a very doubtful character.† They are of various character and qualities; some are found in Syriac, some in Greek, and some only in Latin, while others are extant in all the three languages, and also in Arabic. Tobit and the Wisdom of Solomon are the most valuable of these books for their moral precepts, and the books of the Maccabees for their historical narratives.

3. The history of the Apocrypha, however, comes down only to about the year 135 B. C.; so that the student is compelled to have recourse to other sources. Josephus we have already mentioned; but for a connected history of the Jews and neighboring nations during this period, Prideaux's 'O. and N. T. connected' is the best work extant. Dr. A. Clarke gives a succinct summary of this, as follows.

CHAPTER VI.

EPITOME OF THE JEWISH HISTORY, FROM THE TIME OF NEHEMIAH AND MALACHI TO THE BIRTH OF CHRIST, FILLING UP THE HISTORICAL CHASM BETWEEN THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS.

(After Prideaux and Dr. A. Clarke.)

As many have wished to see an epitome of the Jewish history from the days of the prophet Malachi to the advent of Christ, in order to connect the history of the O. and N. T. the following, in such a work as this, is as much as should be expected.

We have seen, in the book of Nehemiah, that on the return of the Jews from the Chaldean captivity, many of them brought strange wives and a spurious offspring with them, who, refusing to put them away, and being banished by Nehemiah, went and settled in Samaria. Among those exiles there was a son of Jehoiada, the high-priest, named Manasseh, who had married the daughter of Sanballat the Horonite, and put himself under the protection of his father-in-law, who was governor of the place. After the death of Nehemiah, Sanballat obtained a grant from Darius to build a temple on Mount Gerizim, near Samaria, of which he made Manasseh, his son-in-law, high-priest. This temple was begun to be built B. C. 403.

From the building of this temple, Samaria became the refuge of all refractory Jews. And though by this means the old superstition of the land was reformed to the worship of the God of Israel, they of Jerusalem would never consider the Samaritan Jews otherwise than apostates. On the other hand, the Samaritans maintained that Mount Gorizim was the only proper place for the worship of God. This people rejected all traditions, and adhered only to the written word contained in the five books of Moses.

Nehemiah's death¹ was also attended with a change of the Jewish government at Jerusalem. Judea had no longer a governor of its own. It was united to the prefecture of Syria; the rulers of which committed the administration of both civil and ecclesiastical affairs to the high-priest for the time being.

By this means the high-priesthood became an office under the heathen; and towards the latter end of Artaxerxes Mnemon's reign, B. C. 405, who succeeded his father Darius Nothus, B. C. 423, the office was conferred by the governor of Syria and Phoenicia. For Bagozes, the governor, took upon himself to displace Iohanan the high-priest, in favor of the said priest's brother Joshua; which nomination (though it did not take place, for Iohanan slew his brother Joshua in the inner court of the temple, as he endeavored by force to usurp the high-priest's office, by virtue of the governor's commission, B. C. 356) was attended with this bad consequence, that Bagozes, hearing of this murder, came in great wrath to Jerusalem, and laid a heavy fine upon the nation, which lasted seven years, or during the whole of his government.

Artaxerxes Mnemon died B. C. 359, with grief at the brutality of his son Ochus, who had so terrified his eldest brother Ariaspes that he poisoned himself; and had his younger brother Harpalus assassinated; so that Ochus succeeded to the dignity and empire of his father.

In the third year of Ochus, about 356 before Christ, Alexander the Great was born at Pella in Macedonia. Ochus, having reigned twenty-one years, was poisoned by his favorite Bagozes, in hopes of getting the whole government into his own hands, and to put the crown on the head of Arses his youngest son, whom also he poisoned soon after, and raised Codromannus, a distant relation of the late king, to the throne. This new king took the name of Darius; and when Bagozes had also prepared a poisonous draught for him, he obliged Bagozes to drink it himself; by which means he saved his own life, and punished the traitor.

It was about the year B. C. 336 that Alexander the Great succeeded to the kingdom of Macedon, on the death of his father Philip, who was slain by the noble Macedonian, Pausanias, as he celebrated the marriage of his daughter with Alexander king of Epirus, before he set out upon the Grecian expedition against Persia, being chosen captain-general of the united forces of Greece.

Alexander also succeeded to that command by a new election. In one campaign he overran all Asia Minor, vanquished Darius in two battles; took his mother, wife, and children prisoners; and subdued all Syria as far as Tyre, B. C. 332.

During the siege of Tyre, he demanded the submission of the neighboring provinces of Gaulilee, Samaria, and Judea. The two former submitted to him; but Judea would not renounce their allegiance to Darius, so long as he lived. This brought upon them the wrath of the conqueror, who, having taken Tyre by carrying a bank from the continent through the sea to the island on which the city stood, and burned it down to the ground, destroyed and slew all the inhabitants in a barbarous manner, both in the sackage of the town, and afterwards in cold blood, and then marched to Jerusalem to wreak his vengeance upon the Jews. Upon his approach, and the report of his having crucified two thousand of the Turcian prisoners, the high-priest Iudaea and all the city were under dreadful apprehensions. They had nothing but God's protection to depend upon. They fasted and prayed; and God in a vision directed the high-priest to go in his pontifical robes, attended with the priests in their proper habits, and all the people in white garments, and meet Alexander out of the city.

As soon as Alexander saw this procession moving towards him, and the high-priest in the front, he was overawed, drew near, bowed down, and saluted him in a religious manner; alleging that he did so in regard to that God whose priest he was; adding, moreover, that the high-priest so habited had appeared to him in a dream at Dia in Macedonia, assuring him of success against the Persians.

Iudaea conducted him into the city; and, having offered sacrifices in the temple, showed him the prophecies of Daniel, concerning the overthrow of the Persian empire by a Grecian king.

Alexander was well satisfied with his reception at Jerusalem; and, at his departure, granted the Jews a toleration of their religion, and an exemption from tribute every seventh year. And the Jews were so well pleased with the conqueror's behavior, that upon his signifying that he would receive as many of them as would enlist into his service, great multitudes entered under his banner, and followed him in his other expeditions.

The Samaritans met him with great pomp and parade, as he left Jerusalem, and invited him to their city. But Alexander deferred both their invitation and petition for certain privileges, till his return from Egypt; and left his favorite Andromachus governor of Syria and Palestine.

Andromachus, coming some time after to Samaria upon business, was burned to death in his house, as it was thought on purpose by the Samaritans, in revenge of the slight which they apprehended Alexander had shown them. But as soon as Alexander heard it, he caused those to be put to death who had acted any part in the murder, banished all the other inhabitants from Samaria, planted therein a colony of Macedonians, and gave the residue to the Jews.

Upon the ruin of the Persians, Alexander had erected the Grecian or Macedonian monarchy. But coming to Babylon, after the conquest of the most part of the then known world, he gave himself up so much to drunkenness and gluttony, that he soon put an end to his life, B. C. 323.

Here it cannot be amiss to observe that Alexander was of a [sublime] and enterprising spirit, at more full of fire than discretion. His actions, though successful, were furious and extravagantly rash. His few virtues were obscured with more and greater vices. Vain-glory was his predominant passion; and the fables of the ancient Greek heroes were the only charts by which he steered his conduct. His dragging Balis round Gaza, his expedition into India, his drunken procession through Carmania, and taking to himself the name of the son of Jupiter, are so many vouchers of this assertion. And, were all his actions duly considered and estimated, he would be properly characterized the great cut-throat of the age in which he lived; as all they are who delight in bloodshed, and will forsake all to obtain universal monarchy; whereas they only are the true heroes, who most benefit the world, by promoting the peace and welfare of mankind.—In a righteous cause, or a just defence of a man's country, all actions of valor are worthy of praise; but in all other cases, victory and conquest are no more than murder and robbery. Therefore Alexander's heroism is to be avoided, and not to be followed, as the true way to honor and glory.

Alexander was no sooner dead, than Ptolemy Soter seized upon Egypt; and having in vain endeavored to gain Suria, Phoenicia, and Judea, from Lammon, whom Alexander had appointed governor instead of Andromachus, that was burnt, invaded them by sea and land, took Laomedon prisoner, and got possession of those provinces also, except Judea; which, upon the account of their allegiance to the surviving governor, refusing to yield, felt the severity of the conqueror; who, understanding that the Jews would not so much as defend themselves on the Sabbath-day, stormed Jerusalem, took it without resistance on that day, and carried above one hundred thousand of them captives into Egypt.

From this time we may date the Jews' subjection to the kings of Egypt. And it was in the fifth year of this Ptolemy's reign that Onias the Jewish high-priest died, and was succeeded by his son Simon the Just, prised in Eccles. 50.1, &c., B. C. 292.

Simon the Just was high-priest nine years; and is supposed to have completed the canon of the Old Testament, by adding the books of Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, Hulchi, and the two books of Chronicles, with the aid and assistance of the great synagogue. He was succeeded by his brother Eleazar, his son Onias being a minor. B. C. 291.

Ptolemy Soter was succeeded by his son Ptolemy Philadelphus, B. C. 285, who completed the college or museum of learned men, and the famous library at Alexandria in Egypt, which was begun by his father, and contained seven hundred thousand volumes, and placed in that library an authentic translation of the book of the law. This translation was finished under the inspection of Eleazar the high-priest; and is called the Septuagint, on account of the joint labor of seventy-two translators employed in it, B. C. 251. [See however on pp. 9. 10.]

Ptolemy Philadelphus died in the thirty-ninth year of his reign, and sixty-third of his age, B. C. 247. He was a learned prince, and a great patron of learning; so that the men of learning flocked to his court from all parts, and partook of his favor and bounty. Amongst these were the poets Theocritus, Callimachus, Lucophron, and Aratus; and Monetho, the Egyptian historian.

B. C. 247, Ptolemy Euergetes succeeded his father Ptolemy in Egypt. He found Onias, the son of Simon the Just, in the pontificate at Jerusalem, who was very old, weak, inconsiderate, and covetous. And Euergetes, perceiving that the high-priest had for many years kept back the annual tribute, sent one Athenon, an officer at court, to Jerusalem to demand it, being a very large sum, with threats of sending an army to dispossess them of the country, upon refusal.

This demand and threatening threw the whole nation into great confusion. And one Joseph, the high-priest's nephew by his sister's side, rebuked his uncle sharply for his injustice and ill management of the public interest; proposed Onias's journey to Alexandria as the best expedient; and, upon his uncle's refusal, offered to go in person to pacify the king's wrath, which was accepted by the high-priest, and approved by the people. B. C. 226.

Joseph all this time had entertained Athenon in a most elegant manner at his own house; and, at his departure, loaded him with such valuable gifts, that, when he arrived at Alexandria, he found the king prepared much in his favor to receive him; and made himself more acceptable, by informing him concerning the revenues of Carlosyria and Phoenicia, whose value he had inquired more perfectly from their farmers, with whom he had travelled to court part of the way; and was therewith admitted the king's receiver-general of Carlosyria, Phoenicia, Judea, and Samaria. He immediately satisfied the king for his uncle's arrears, with five hundred talents he borrowed at Alexandria on the credit of his new office, which he enjoyed twenty-two years; though he met with great opposition at his first collecting, till he had brought some of the ringleaders to exemplary punishment.

B. C. 221. All things were again composed at Jerusalem; and Philopator having succeeded his father Ptolemy Euergetes in Egypt, and defeated the army of Antiochus the Great, he, in the fifth year of his reign, took the tour of Jerusalem, while he visited his coconquest. But this was very unfortunate for the Jews. For Philopator, being led by a vain curiosity to enter into the Sanctuary and the Holy of Holies, (on the great day of expiation,) B. C. 217, when no one but the high-priest was allowed to enter, he was opposed by the deprecations and lamentations of the people. And, when he would still advance beyond the inner court, he was seized with such a terror and consternation, that he was obliged to be carried back in a manner half dead. He recovered; but when he left the city he vowed revenge. And accordingly, he was no sooner returned to Alexandria than he degraded the Jews from all their rights and privileges; ordered them to be stigmatized with a burn, representing an ivy leaf, under pain of death, in honor of his god Bacchus; and excluded all persons from his presence that would not sacrifice to the god he worshipped. Then he commanded as many Jews as he could seize in Egypt to be brought and shut up in the Hippodrome, or place for horse-races, at Alexandria, to be destroyed by elephants. But God turned the wild beasts upon those that came to see the dreadful massacre; by which numbers of the spectators were slain; and so terrified the king and his subjects with other tokens of his displeasure and power, that Philopator immediately not only released the Jews from the Hippodrome, but restored the whole nation to their privileges, reversed every decree against them, and put those Jews to death who, for fear of persecution, had apostatized from their religion.

Ptolemy Philopator was succeeded, B. C. 204, by his son Ptolemy Epiphanes, then only five years old. This minority gave Antiochus the Great an opportunity to regain Cœlosyria and Palestine; in which expedition the Jews had shown so much favor to Antiochus, that he granted them many favors, a liberty to live according to their own laws and religion, a prohibition to strangers to enter within the sept of the temple, &c. But as soon as Ptolemy was marriageable, he made peace with him, and gave him his daughter, with Cœlosyria and Palestine for her portion. On this occasion, Joseph, who had been Ptolemy's receiver-general in those provinces, and displaced by Antiochus, was restored.

Ptolemy in a short time had a son; and it being customary on such occasions for all the great officers of state to congratulate the king and queen, and to carry them presents, Joseph, whose age would not permit him to take so long a journey, sent his son Hyrcanus, B. C. 187, who, upon an unlimited credit given him by his father, when he was arrived at Alexandria, borrowed a thousand talents, or two hundred thousand pounds sterling, with which, buying a hundred beautiful boys for the king, and as many beautiful young maid-servants for the queen, at the price of a talent per head, and presenting them with each a talent in their hands, and disposing of the remaining sum among the courtiers and great officers, he so obliged the king and queen, and all the court, that he found it easy to supplant his father, and obtained the king's commission for collecting of the royal revenues in all the country beyond Jordan.

Hyrcanus, having thus abused his trust, went with a strong guard to execute his office; and, being met by his brothers, killed two of them. He came to Jerusalem; but his father would not admit him to his presence; and he was shunned by every body. Upon the death of his father, which happened soon after, he endeavoured by force of arms to oust his brethren from the paternal estate. This disturbed the peace of Jerusalem for a while; till, at last, his brothers, being assisted by the high-priest and the generality of the people, drove him over Jordan, where he lived in a strong castle, till he fell upon his own sword and killed himself, to avoid the punishment with which Antiochus Epiphanes, upon his succeeding to the throne of Syria, threatened him. B. C. 175.

Antiochus the Great being slain by the inhabitants of Elymais, as he attempted by night to plunder the temple of Jupiter Belus, thereby to pay the Romans according to his agreement, his son Seleucus Philopator succeeded him in the provinces of Syria, Judea, &c., and resided at Antioch.

Seleucus, at his first advancement to the dominion of these provinces, continued his father's favors to the Jews; but being afterwards informed by one Simon a Benjaminite, that there was great treasure in the temple, he sent one Heliodorus to seize it, and to bring all the riches he could find therem to Antioch. Heliodorus attempted to execute this commission; but he was so terrified at the sight of an armed host of angels, that appeared to defend the entrance of the sacred treasury, that he fell speechless to the ground; nor did he recover till the high-priest interceded to God for him.

This same Heliodorus poisoned his sovereign Seleucus, hoping to obtain the kingdom; but his design was frustrated by Eu-menes, king of Pergamus, and his brother Attalus, who set Antiochus Epiphanes, another son of Antiochus the Great, on the throne of Syria.

Epiphanes, at his accession to the throne, finding himself hard pressed by the Romans, endeavored to raise their heavy tribute by all manner of extortions. Amongst other means, he deposed the good and pious high-priest Otias, and sold the pontificate to his brother Jason for the yearly sum of three hundred and sixty talents; and afterwards he deposed Jason, and sold it to his brother Menelaus for three hundred talents more. B. C. 174.

Menelaus, having invaded the pontificate by these unjust means, and finding himself straitened to raise the annual payment according to contract, by the means of Lysimachus, another of his brothers, he robbed the temple of many gold vessels, which being turned into money, he paid the king; and bribed Andronicus, the governor of Antioch, to murder his brother Otias, lest at any time he should stand in his way. It is true, that at the instance of the people, Andronicus was seized and executed for his villainy and murder; and Lysimachus was put to death by the mob at Jerusalem. Yet Menelaus found means, by bribery, not only to acquire himself, but to obtain sentence against, and even the execution of the three delegates that went from Jerusalem to prosecute him in the name of the Sanhedrim.

But while Antiochus was engaged in the Egyptian war, Jason, on a false report that the king was dead, marched with a thousand men, surprised the city of Jerusalem, drove Menelaus into the castle, and cruelly put to the sword, and to other kinds of death, all those that he thought were his adversaries.

The news of this revolution and massacre no sooner reached Antiochus, but he hastened to reduce the Jews to their obedience. And in his way, being informed that the inhabitants of Jerusalem had made great rejoicings at the report of his death, he was so provoked, that, having taken it by storm, B. C. 170, he slew forty thousand persons, and sold as many more for slaves to the neighboring nations. He entered the Holy of Holies, sacrificed a sow upon the altar of burnt-offerings, and caused the broth or liquor thereof to be sprinkled all over the temple. He plundered the temple of as much gold and furniture as amounted to eight hundred talents of gold. Then, returning to Antioch, he made one Philip, a most barbarous and cruel man, governor of Judea; Andronicus, as bad a man, governor of Samaria; and continued Menelaus, the worst of all, in the pontificate. And, as if this was not sufficient to satisfy his rage, he not long after sent an army of ten and twenty thousand men, under Apolloinus, his general, with commission to put all the men of Jerusalem to the sword, and to make slaves of the women and children; which was rigorously executed on a Sabbath-day, so that none escaped, but such as could hide themselves in caves, or reach the mountains by flight.

This cruelty soon after pursued the Jews, wherever dispersed; for, by a general decree to oblige all people in his dominions to conform to the religion of the king, one Athenaeus, a Grecian idolater, was pitched upon to receive and instruct all the Jews that would turn idolaters, and to punish with the most cruel death those who refused. It was at this time that the temple was dedicated to Jupiter Olympius; the books of the law were burned; and women accused of having their children circumcised were led about the streets with these children tied about their necks, and then both together cast headlong over the steepest part of the wall, B. C. 167. For many of them chose rather to die, than to renounce their God; as the very aged and pious Eleazar, a chief doctor of the law, and of the heroine Salomona, and her seven sons, do testify; whom neither the instruments of death could terrify, nor the allurements of the tyrant could persuade, to forfeit their interest with the Almighty, either by idolatry or dissimulation.

Matthias, great grandson of Asmonaeus, and a priest of the first course, retired, with his five sons, John, Simon, Judas, Eleazar, and Jonathan, from the persecution at Jerusalem, to a little place called Modin, in the tribe of Dan. But as soon as they were discovered, Antiochus sent one Apelles to that place, to oblige all the inhabitants, on pain of death, to turn idolaters.—This officer delivered his commission in such a manner to persuade Matthias to embrace idolatry, by tendering to him, the king's favor, and promising him great riches; which the good priest not only scornfully rejected, but slew the first Jew that dared to approach the idolatrous altar; and then, turning upon the king's commissioner, he despatched him and all his attendants, with the assistance of his sons, and those that were with them. After this he put himself at the head of as many Jews as he could collect; and having broken down the idols and the altars of the heathens, retired with them into the mountains. Here, as he took measures for their defence, he was joined by a great party of Assidians, a valiant people, who practised greater hardships and mortifications, and were resolved to lay down their lives for the recovery of the temple. By these and the accession of great numbers of other Jews, Matthias found himself in a capacity to take the field; but as their mistaken notion about resting on the Sabbath-day had been one great cause of their being surprised by their enemies, and brought many great misfortunes upon them, because they would not defend themselves on that day from their enemies, he caused it to be unanimously agreed and decreed, that it was lawful, and that they should defend themselves, and repel force by force, on the Sabbath-day, should they be attacked.

After this decree had passed, with the approbation of the priests and elders, Matthias left his lurking-places, marched round the cities of Judah, pulled down the heathen altars, restored the true worship and circumcision; and cut off both the apostates and persecutors, that fell in his way, till death summoned him to immortality, in the hundred and forty-seventh year of his age.

When he found death approaching, he exhorted his five sons to persevere in the cause of God, as he had begun; and he appointed his son Judas his successor in the command of the army, and Simon to be their counsellor, B. C. 166. He was buried at Modin, with great lamentation of all Israel.

Judas, who had signalized himself on former occasions for his great valor, was distinguished by the title Maccabæus; and having taken the command of his people upon him, he prosecuted the good work of reformation begun by his father, and took all the measures he was able, by fortifying towns, building castles, and placing strong garrisons, to maintain the liberty and religion of his country against all opposition.

Apolloinus was sent by Antiochus to march an army of Samaritans against him; but he was killed, and his troops defeated and entirely routed, after a great slaughter, by our young general, who, finding Apollo- nus's sword among the spoils, took it for his own use, and generally fought with it over after.

This news having reached Cœlo-syria, Seron, deputy-governor of that province, marched with all the forces he could collect to revenge the death of Apollonius; but he met with the same fate.

Antiochus was so enraged at these defeats, that he immediately ordered forty thousand foot, seven thousand horse, and a great number of auxiliaries, made up of the neighboring nations and apostate Jews, to march against Judea, under the command of Ptolemy Macron, Nicanor, and Gorgias, three eminent commanders. B. C. 162.

Upon their advancing as far as Emmons, about seven miles from Jerusalem, Judas, who may be supposed at that time besieging, or at least blocking up Jerusalem, then in the hands of the heathen, retired to Mizpeh. Here the whole army addressed themselves to God. Judas exhorted them most pathetically to fight for their religion, laws, and liberties; but at last giving those leave to withdraw from his army that had built houses, or betrothed wives within the year, or that were in any degree fearful, he presently found himself at the head of no more than three thousand men.

However, he was resolved to give the enemy battle. In the mean time, God ordained him an easy victory; for while Gorgias was detached with five thousand foot and one thousand horse to surprise his little army by night, Judas, being informed of the design, marched by another way, fell upon the camp in the absence of Gorgias, killed three thousand men, put the rest to flight, and seized the camp. Gorgias, not finding the Jews in their camp, proceeded to the mountains, supposing they were fled thither for safety. But, not meeting with them there, he was much surprised in his return at what had happened in his absence. And his army, hearing that Judas waited to give them a warm reception in the plains, flung down their arms and fled. Judas, in the pursuit, killed six thousand more, and wounded and maimed most of the rest. This victory opened to him the gates of Jerusalem, where he and his army celebrated the next day, which was a Sabbath, with great devotion and thanksgiving.

Timotheus and Bacchides, governors or lieutenants under Antiochus, marched immediately to the assistance of Gorgias; but they fell a sacrifice to the valor and conduct of Judas, who, by the spoils taken from the enemy, was enabled the better to carry on the war.

This defeat was succeeded by another of Lysias, the governor of all the country beyond Euphrates. He had penetrated as far as Bethzura, a strong fortress about twenty miles from Jerusalem, threatening to destroy the country with an army of sixty thousand foot and five thousand horse. But he was defeated also by Judas with ten thousand men only.

This victory gave him some respite; and accordingly he restored the temple to the true worship of God, removed all the profanations, built an altar of nahewin stones, and replaced the furniture that Antiochus had carried away, out of the gold and other rich spoils taken in this war. Thus he dedicated the temple again; and ordained that a feast of dedication should be kept annually, in commemoration thereof, forever, about the 20th of November.

His next care was to subdue the fortress on Mount Aera, which Apollonius had erected to command the temple, and, being yet in the power of the heathens, gave them great opportunities to annoy the Jews that went to worship in the temple. But not having men enough to spare to form a blockade, he silenced it by another fortification, which he erected on the mountain of the temple.

When this revolt and success of the Jews reached Antiochus, in his expedition into Persia, he threatened utterly to destroy the whole nation, and to make Jerusalem the common place of burial to all the Jews. But God visited him with a sudden and sore disease. He at first was afflicted with grievous torments in his bowels; his priy parts were ulcerated, and filled with an innumerable quantity of vermin; and the smell was so offensive that he became nauseous to himself and all about him. Then his mind was so tormented with such direful spectres and apparitions of evil spirits — the remorse of his wicked life and profanations gnawed him so grievously, that he at last acknowledged the justice of God in his punishment, and offered up many vows and promises of a full reparation in case he recovered. But God would not hear him: therefore, when his body was almost half consumed with abominable ulcers, he died under the most horrid torments of body and mind, in the twelfth year of his reign.

Judas Maccabeus began now to consider how the government should be fixed; and, therefore, in a general assembly held at Maspha, he revived the ancient order, and appointed rulers over thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens. And it is also probable, that he constituted the high court of Sanhedrin, in which was a settled Nasi, president or prince, who was the high priest for the time being; an Abbe-din, or father of the house of judgment, who was the president's deputy; and a Chacam, or the wise man, who was sub-deputy. The other members were called elders or senators, men of untainted birth, good learning, and profound knowledge in the law, both priests and laymen. And they in particular were empowered to decide all private difficult controversies, all religious affairs, and all important matters of state.

This was properly the senate, or great council of the nation, which grew into great power under the administration of the Asmonean princes; and was in great authority in the days of our Savior's ministry.

Lysias, who had been so shamefully routed by Judas, having the care of Antiochus' son, who was called Antiochus Eupator, and only nine years old, set him on the throne, and seized the government and tuition of the young king into his own hands; and immediately combined with the neighboring Idumeans and other nations, enemies to Judas, in an attempt utterly to destroy and extirpate the whole race of Israel.

When Judas was informed of this confederacy, he resolved to prevent their intentions, and to carry the war into Idumea. Thus he entered their country by Acrabatene, a canon of Judea, near the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, and slew there twenty thousand of them. Then, falling upon the children of Bean, another tribe of the Idumeans, he killed twenty thousand more, routed their army, and took their strong-holds. Hence, passing over Jordan into the land of the Ammonites, he defeated them in several engagements; slew great numbers of them; and took the city Jahazah, at the foot of Mount Gilead, near the brook Jazah; and so returned home.

After his return into Judea, one Timotheus, a governor in those parts, pretended to follow him with a numerous army. But Judas fell upon him; and, having overthrown him with a very great slaughter, pursued him to the city Gazara, in the tribe of Ephraim, which he took; and slew both Timotheus and his brother Chereas, governor of that city, and Apollphanes, another great captain of the Syrian forces.

This success stirred up the jealousy of the heathen nations about Gilead, who fell upon the Jews in the land of Tola; and having slain one thousand, took their goods and carried their wives and children captives, and drove the residue to seek for refuge and security in the strong fortress Dathema, in Gilead. But Timotheus, the son of him slain at Gazara, shut them up with a great army, and besieged them, while the inhabitants of Tyre, Sidon, and Ptolemais, were contriving to cut off all the Jews that lived in Galilee.

Judas, in this critical juncture, by and with the advice of the Sanhedrin, dividing his army into three parts, he and his brother Jonathan marched with eight thousand men to the relief of the Gileadites; his brother marched with three thousand into Galilee; and his brother Joseph was left with the command of the remainder to protect Jerusalem and the country round, and to remain wholly on the defensive, till Judas and Simon should return.

In their march to Gilead, Judas and Jonathan attacked Bossora, a town of the Edomites, slew all the males, plundered it, released a great number of Jews, reserved to be put to death as soon as Dathema should be taken, and burned the city. When they arrived before Dathema, which was by a forced march in the night, the brothers gave Timotheus so sudden and violent an assault that they put his army to flight, and slew eight thousand in the pursuit. And wherever he came and found any Jews oppressed, or imprisoned, he released them in the same manner as he did at Bossora.

At the same time Simon defeated the enemy several times in Galilee, drove them out of the country, and pursued them with very great slaughter to the gates of Ptolemais. But Joseph, contrary to his orders, leaving Jerusalem, was put to flight by Gorgias, governor of Syria, and lost two thousand men in that ill-projected expedition against Jamnia, a seaport on the Mediterranean.

Lysias by this time having assembled an army of eight hundred thousand men, eighty elephants, and all the horse of the kingdom, marched in person against the Hebrew conqueror. Judas met him at the siege of Bethzura, gave him battle, slew eleven thousand foot, one thousand six hundred horse, and put the rest to flight.

This victory was happily attended with a peace between Judas and Lysias, in the name of the young king; by which the heathen decree of uniformity made by Epiphanes was rescinded, and the Jews permitted to live according to their own laws.

However, this peace was soon broke by the people of Doppa and Janania: but Judas no sooner was informed that they had cruelly treated and murdered the Jews, that lived amongst them, but he fell upon Zoppa by night, burned their shipping, and put all to the sword that had escaped the fire; and he set fire to the haven of Janania, and burned all the ships in it.

Timotheus also, that had fled before this conqueror, was discontented with the peace, and gathered an army of one hundred and twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse, in order to oppress the Jews in Gilead. But when the news of this armament reached Judas, he marched against him; and, after he had defeated a strong party of wandering Arabs, and made peace with them; taken the city Caspis, which was Heshon in the tribe of Ruben; slain the inhabitants; destroyed the place; taken Caraca also, and put its garrison of ten thousand men to the sword, he came up with Timotheus near Raphon, on the river Jabbok, gave him battle, slew thirty thousand of his men, took him prisoner, pursued the remains of his army to Carnion, in Arabia, took that city also, and slew twenty-five thousand more of Timotheus's forces; but gave him his life and liberty, on promise that he would release all the Jews captives throughout his dominions.

As he returned to Jerusalem, he stormed the strong city of Ephron, well garrisoned by Lysias, put twenty-five thousand people to the sword, plundered it, and razed it to the ground, because the people refused to grant him a passage through it. This campaign was concluded with a day of thanksgiving in the temple at Jerusalem.

Thus Judas, finding himself disengaged from the treaty of peace by these hostilities, carried the war into the south of Idumea; dismantled Hebron, the metropolis thereof; passed into the land of the Philistines, took Azotus or Ashdod, destroyed their idols, plundered their country, and returned to Judea, to reduce the fortress of Aca, still in the hands of the king of Syria, and became very troublesome in time of war to those that resorted to the temple.

Judas prepared for a regular siege; but Antiochus, being informed of its distress, marched to its relief with an army of one hundred and ten thousand foot, twenty thousand horse, thirty-two elephants with castles on their backs full of archers, and three hundred armed chariots of war. In his way through Idumea, he laid siege to Bethzur, which at last was forced to surrender, after Judas, who had marched to its relief, had killed four thousand of the enemy by surprise in the night, lost his brother Eleazar in battle, crushed to death by an elephant that he had stabbed, and was forced to retreat and shut himself and his friends up in the temple.

The king and Lysias were both present in this army of the Syrians; and would have compelled Judas to surrender, had not Philip, whom Epiphanes had upon his death-bed appointed guardian of his son, taken this opportunity of their absence to seize upon Antioch, and to take upon him the government of the Syrian empire.

Upon this news, Lysias struck up a peace immediately with Judas, upon honorable and advantageous terms to the Jewish nation. But though it was ratified by oath, Eupator ordered the fortifications of the temple to be demolished.

It was in this war that Menelaus, the wicked high-priest, fell into disgrace with Lysias, while he was prompting the heathen barbarity to destroy his own people. For, being accused and convicted of being the author and fomenter of this Jewish expedition, Lysias ordered him to be carried to Berœa, a town in Syria; and there to be cast into a high tower of ashes, in which there was a wheel, which continually stirred up and raised the ashes about the criminal, till he was suffocated, and died. This was a punishment among the Persians for criminals in high life. — This wicked high-priest was succeeded, at the promotion of Antiochus Eupator, by one Aleimus, a man altogether as wicked as his immediate predecessor.

Eupator returned home; and, by an easy battle, killed the usurper Philip, and quelled the insurrection in his favor. But it was not so with Demetrius, the son of Selenus Philopator, who, being now come to maturity, claimed the kingdom in right of his father, elder brother to Epiphanes.

Demetrius had been sent to Rome, as a hostage, in exchange for his uncle Antiochus Epiphanes, in the very year that his father died. Antiochus, returning in the very nick of time, was declared king, in prejudice to the right of the minor Demetrius. And though Demetrius had often solicited the assistance of the Roman senate, under whom he was educated, to restore him to his kingdom, reasons of state swayed with them rather to confirm Eupator, a minor, in the government, than to assert the right of one of a mature understanding. Yet, though he failed in this application, Demetrius resolved to throw himself upon Providence. To which end, leaving Rome incognito, Demetrius got safe to Tripolis, in Syria; where he gave out that he was sent, and would be supported by the Romans, to take possession of his father's kingdom. This stratagem had its desired effect; every one deserted from Eupator to Demetrius; and the very soldiers seized on Eupator and Lysias, and would have delivered them into his hands. But Demetrius thought it more politic not to see them; and having ordered them to be put to death, was presently settled in the possession of the whole kingdom.

During this interval the Jews enjoyed a profound peace; but having refused to acknowledge Aleimus their high-priest, because he had unjustly in the time of the persecution, Aleimus addressed the new king Demetrius, imploring his protection against Judas Maccabæus, and so exasperated him against the whole body of his party by false representations, that Demetrius ordered Bacchides to march an army into Judea and to confirm Aleimus in the pontificate

Aleimus was also commissioned with Bacchides to carry on the war in Judea; who, upon the promise of a safe conduct, having got the scribes and doctors of the law into their power, put sixty of them to death in one day. Bacchides left him in possession with some forces for his support; with which he committed many murders, and did much mischief; and at last obtained another army from Nicanor, under the command of Nicanor, to destroy Judas, to disperse his followers, and the more effectually to support the said Aleimus in his post of high-priest.

Nicanor, who had experienced the valor of Judas, proposed a compromise; but Aleimus expecting more advantage to himself by a war, beat the king off it; so that Nicanor was obliged to execute the first order. The war was carried on with various success, till Nicanor was slain in a pitched battle near a village called Bethoron; and his whole army of thirty-five thousand men, casting down their arms, were, to a man, cut off in the flight.

This victory was followed with a day of thanksgiving, which was established to be continued every year under the name of the anniversary day of solemn thanksgiving.

Judas, observing that the Syrians paid no regard to any treaties, thought that by making a league with the Romans, his nation would be much better secured against such a perfidious people. Therefore he sent Jason and Enpomenus to Rome, who soon obtained the ratification of a league of mutual defence between them, and a letter to Demetrius, requiring him, upon the peril of having war denounced against him, to desist from giving the Jews any more meanness and trouble.

This, however, proved of no service. For, while this league was negotiating, Demetrius sent Bacchides and Aleimus a second time into Judea, with a numerous army, to revenge the defeat and death of Nicanor. At this time Judas had no more than three thousand men to oppose them; and of these all but eight hundred deserted their general, at the report of the number and strength of their enemies. Yet Judas refused to yield up the cause of God; and, being followed by that handful of brave men, he charged and broke the right wing, where Bacchides commanded in person, and pursued them as far as the mountains of Azotus; and must have gained a complete victory, had not his little army been followed and encompassed by the left wing. But being surrounded with an exceeding great force, the Jews sold their lives at a dear rate; Judas was killed, and then such as survived him were forced to flee away.

His body was carried off by his brothers, Simon and Jonathan; and buried in the sepulchres of his ancestors, at Modin, with great funeral honor, as he deserved.

Bacchides, after this success, seized on the whole country, and used the adherents of the Maccabees so inhumanly, that Jonathan was necessitated to retire at the head of his distressed countrymen to the wilderness of Tokoa. This little army encamped with a morass on one side, and the river Jordan on the other. Bacchides pursued them; secured the pass of their encampment; and, though he attacked them on the Sabbath-day, he lost a thousand men in the assault; before the Maccabees broke; and then, being overpowered by numbers, they threw themselves into the river, and escaped by swimming to the other side without being pursued.

About this time (B. C. 160), Aleimus, the wicked pontiff, died suddenly of a palsy; and Demetrius having received the Senatorial letter from Rome, commanding him to desist from vexing the Jews, recalled Bacchides; so that Jonathan found himself in a condition to bring his affairs into better order. But this state of rest lasted only for two years; for the malecontents invited Bacchides to return with his army, under a promise to support his enterprise, and to seize Jonathan. But before this association could take place, Jonathan had information of it, seized fifty of the principal conspirators, and put them to death. And when Bacchides arrived with his great army, Jonathan and his brother Simon gave him such unceasness, and so artfully distressed and harassed his army, without giving him any pitched battle, that Bacchides grew weary of his undertaking, put several of those that invited him to that expedition to death, and at last made peace with the Maccabees, restored all his prisoners, and swore never more to molest the Jews. B. C. 159.

When Jonathan found himself in quiet possession of Judea, and that there was no more to fear from Bacchides, he punished the apostate Jews with death, reformed the church and state, and rebuilt the walls about the temple and city of Jerusalem. And soon after (the high-priesthood having been vacant seven years) he put on the pontifical robe, at the nomination of Alexander, who, by the assistance of the Roman senate, and the management of one Heracles, claimed the crown of Syria in right of his pretended father, Antiochus Epiphanes.

Jonathan, though Demetrius made him more advantageous offers, suspecting that these promises were not real, but only to serve the present purpose, acceded to Alexander's proposals; which was so acceptable to the new king, that when he had beat and slain Demetrius, and was become master of the whole Syrian monarchy, he invited Jonathan to his marriage with Cleopatra, daughter of Ptolemy, king of Egypt; and, besides great personal honors, conferred on him the post of general of all his forces in Judea, and chief sewer of his household. B. C. 153.

However, this prosperity was soon disturbed by Apollonius, governor of Cœlosyria, who, taking part with Demetrius, the son of Demetrius, the late king, (who had concealed himself with his brother Antiochus in Crete, during the late troubles, and was now landed in Cilicia with an army of mercenaries,) marched with an army as far as Jannia, and challenged Jonathan to give him battle. Jonathan marched out with a body of ten thousand men; took Joppa in sight of the enemy; gave Apollonius battle; beat him, and pursued his broken forces to Azotus, where he destroyed eight thousand men, the temple of Dagon, and the city with fire and sword; which engaged Alexander's affections so much, that he gave him the golden buckle (a distinguished mark of the royal family of Persia), and the city and territories of Ercnon.

After this succeeded a surprising revolution in Syria. Alexander had called to his assistance his father-in-law Ptolemy Philometer, who, upon a jealousy that his son Alexander had conspired his death, carried off his daughter Cleopatra; gave her to Demetrius, Alexander's competitor; and, turning his arms upon Alexander, settled Demetrius upon the throne of his ancestors; and, after gaining a complete victory, forced him to flee into Arabia; where Zabdiel, the king of the country, cut off his head, and sent it to Ptolemy. B. C. 146.

This Demetrius took the style of Nicanor, or Conqueror; and, though he summoned Jonathan to appear before him to answer certain accusations, the high-priest found means to gain his favor; and not only a confirmation of former, but a grant of more privileges; which, and the promise to withdraw the heathen garrison from Acre, so recommended him to Jonathan, that when Demetrius was in danger of being murdered by the inhabitants of Antioch, he marched three thousand men to the king's assistance, burned a great part of the city, slew one hundred thousand of the inhabitants with fire and sword, and obliged the rest to throw themselves upon the king's mercy. Yet this service, and his promise also, was presently forgot by Demetrius, when he thought the storm was blown over; and he would, on the contrary, have certainly obliged him, under pain of military execution, to pay the usual taxes and tribute paid by his predecessors, had he not been prevented by the treason of a discontented courtier, whose name was Tryphon.

Tryphon (B. C. 144) at first declared for, and set Antiochus Theos, the son of the late Alexander, on the throne of Syria, after he had vanquished Demetrius, and forced him to retire into Syria.—Jonathan for his own interest declared for the new king; by which he obtained a confirmation of the pontificate, &c., and his brother Simon was made commander of all his forces from Tyre to Egypt.

As soon as Demetrius heard of Jonathan's revolt, he marched to chastise him for it; but it turned to his loss. For he was repulsed twice, and lost Gaza, with all the country as far as Damascus and Joppa in the land of the Philistines.

Tryphon intended now to pull off the mask; but not daring to attempt so foul a crime, till Jonathan could be removed, prevailed with him to disband his army, and to accompany him with one thousand men only to Ptolemais; where he was no sooner entered, but his men were put to the sword, and Jonathan put under an arrest. Then, marching his army into Judea, he proposed to restore him, or condition of one hundred talents; and that his two sons should be given for hostages of their father's fidelity. Jonathan was persuaded to comply with this demand; but the villain not only caused them and their father to be put to death, but having also murdered Antiochus privately, assumed the title of king of Syria.

Simon (B. C. 143), hearing that his brother was murdered, and buried at Bussana in Gilead, sent and brought him from thence, and buried him under a curious monument of white, wrought, and polished marble; at Modin. And after he was admitted governor in his stead, he offered his service to Demetrius, then at Laodicea; who, on condition that the Jews would assist him in the recovery of his crown, conceded to him the high-priesthood and principality, and granted the people many privileges.

But Demetrius being about this time persuaded to head the Elymaean, Parthian, and Bactrian revolts against Mithridates, king of Parthia, Simon applied himself to fortifying his cities, and redacted the fortress of Ara; which he not only took, but even levelled the mount on which it was built.

Mithridates (B. C. 141) vanquished Demetrius, and, after he had taken him prisoner, gave him his daughter Rhodogune in marriage; which so exasperated his wife Cleopatra, then shut up in Selencia, that she offered herself and the kingdom to Antiochus, his brother (B. C. 139), then in Crete. Antiochus accepted the proposal; and upon his landing in Syria with an army of mercenaries, he was so strengthened with deserters from Tryphon's forces, that he drove him into Apamea, near the mouth of the Orontes, and took him and put him to death.

Thus Antiochus became possessed of his father's throne; though not without the assistance of Simon, whom he had promised to reward with many new privileges. But he no sooner found himself delivered from all opposition, but he forgot his promises; and on the contrary demanded the restoring of Joppa and Gazara, &c., or a thousand talents in lieu of them.

Simon refused to comply; and Antiochus sent Cendebeus with an army to force him. Simon now, very old, attended by his sons Judas and John Hyrcanus, put him to flight at the first onset, and killed a great number of the enemy in the pursuit. After this, Simon and his sons Judas and Muttius (B. C. 135) were perfidiously murdered by Ptolemy. Simon's son-in-law, (whom he had made governor of the plains of Jericho, at an entertainment prepared for them in the castle of Jericho, with a design to usurp the government of Judea to himself.) He sent to Gazara to seize John Hyrcanus also. But he was informed, and so prepared to receive them, that he despatched the intended murderers; and hastening to Jerusalem, secured both the city and the temple, where he was declared his father's successor in the pontificate and principality of the Jews.

Antiochus thought to serve himself of these distractions; and accordingly marched a large army into Judea; and, after he had driven Hyrcanus into Jerusalem, obliged him to accept of a peace upon the hard terms of delivering up their arms, dismantling Jerusalem, paying a tribute for Joppa, &c., held by the Jews out of Judea, and five hundred talents to buy off the rebuilding of Ara.

Hyrcanus accompanied Antiochus to the Parthian war, in which he signalized himself with great renown. He returned home at the end of the year. But Antiochus, who chose to winter in the east, was with his whole army destroyed in one night by the natives, who, taking the advantage of their separate quarters all over the country, rose on them, and cut their throats in cold blood; so that Antiochus himself was slain, and out of four hundred thousand persons, of which his army consisted, scarce a man escaped to carry home the news of this massacre.

Phraortes, the king of Parthia, having suffered much by this invasion of Antiochus, endeavored to get quit of him by sending his prisoner Demetrius Nicator into Syria, to recover his own kingdom; so that when the news came of Antiochus's death, he was without more delay reinstated on the throne. But his tyrannical proceedings presently raised him up a new pretender to the crown (B. C. 127), one Alexander Zebina, the pretended son of Alexander Balas, who, by the assistance of Ptolemy Physcon, king of Egypt, defeated him in the field; and, taking him prisoner in Tyre, put him to death.

Zebina being raised to the throne of Syria by the king of Egypt, Ptolemy expected that he should hold it in homage from him; and, upon his refusal, gave his daughter Triphona to Antiochus Grypus, the son of Nicator, whom he made king of Syria, and pursued Zebina till he got him into his hands, and put him to death.

Hyrcanus, in the midst of these revolutions, shook off the Syrian yoke. He built the famous tower of Baris upon a steep rock. He took several cities on the borders of Judea, among which was Shechem, the chief seat of the Samaritans (B. C. 130), and destroyed the temple on Mount Gerizim. He extended his conquests over the Idumeans, (B. C. 129), who were prevailed on to embrace the Jewish religion; so that from this time they exchanged the name of Idumeans or Edomites for that of Jews. He renewed the alliance with the senate of Rome, and obtained greater privileges and advantages than his nation ever had before; and concluded his military operations with the siege and bitter destruction of Somaria, under the conduct of his sons Aristobulus and Antigonus.

After these great actions, Hyrcanus enjoyed full quiet from all foreign wars; and had nothing to trouble him at home, but the false insinuation of the Pharisee Eleazar, who declared that his mother was a captive taken in the wars; and that, therefore, he was incapable of holding the high-priesthood. Hyrcanus had been educated in this sect; but one Jonathan, an intimate friend of his, and a Sadducee, took this opportunity to draw him over to his own sect; which he effected so sincerely, that Hyrcanus renounced the Pharisee forever, abrogated their traditional constitutions, and made it penal for any one to observe them. Yet he was an excellent governor; and dying in the thirtieth year of his administration, left five sons; but the high-priesthood and sovereignty he left to Judas Aristobulus, his eldest son. B. C. 107.

Aristobulus (B. C. 107) was the first since the captivity that put on the diadem, and assumed the title of king. But he was of that suspicious and cruel disposition, that he cast his own mother into prison, and starved her to death, imprisoned all his brethren except Antigonus, whom at last he ordered to be murdered in a fit of jealousy. B. C. 106. Of which, however, he repented; and gave up the ghost in great anxiety of mind, after a reign of no more than one year; though in that time Antigonus had reduced the Iureans by his obedience, and forced them to conform to the religion of the Jews. At this time Pompey and Cicero were born.

Alexander Janneus, his third brother, was released from his confinement by Salome, Aristobulus's widow. The like favor was also extended to his two other brothers. But as soon as Janneus was settled on the throne, he put one of them to death under a suspicion of treason, and he took Abralom, the younger, into his favor.

This Alexander (B. C. 105) attempted to extend his dominions by new conquests. But in his attempts against Ptolemais and Ptolemy Lathyrus, who came to the assistance of Zoilus and the Gazarians, he lost a fine army, and was reduced to sue for protection from Cleopatra, who had seized upon Egypt, and obliged her son Lathyrus to be contented with the island of Crete.

Cleopatra at first was inclined to take advantage of Alexander's misfortunes, and to seize upon him and his dominions; but Ananias, one of her generals, by birth a Jew, and relation to Alexander, dissuaded her from so unjust a design, and obtained her protection for him.

Nevertheless, Alexander's martial spirit sought out new employments. His country being clear of foreign forces, he attacked and took Gadara and Amathus in Syria. But being followed by Theodosius, prince of Philadelphia, who had laid up his treasure at Amathus, he lost his plunder, ten thousand men, and all his baggage. B. C. 101.

This did not deter him from attempting the reduction of Gaza; which, however, he could not have taken, had it not been treacherously surrendered to him by Lysimachus, the governor's brother. Here Alexander, ordering his soldiers to kill, plunder, and destroy, was the author of a sad scene of barbarity; and reduced that ancient and famous city to ruin and desolation.

After his return from this carnage he was grossly insulted by a mob at home, while he was offering the usual sacrifices on the Festival of Tabernacles. But he made the people pay dearly for it, for he fell upon them with his soldiers, and slew six thousand. And from this time he took into his pay six thousand mercenaries from Pisidia and Cilicia, who always attended his person, and kept off the people while he officiated.

B. C. 101. All being again quieted at home, Alexander marched against the Meobites and Ammanites, and made them tributaries. In his return he took possession of Amathus, which Theodosius had evacuated; but he lost most of his army; and had like to have lost his own life in an ambuscade which Thedus, an Arabian king, had laid for him near Gadara. This raised fresh discontents among his subjects, and new troubles at home; which were attended with the most unheard-of barbarities. They were not able to overpower him; but his wickedness had so provoked them that nothing but his blood could satisfy them; and at length, being assisted by Demetrius Eucharius, king of Damascus, they entirely rooted him, so that he was forced to consult his own safety by fleeing to the mountains.

This misfortune was the cause of six thousand of his rebel subjects deserting him; which when Demetrius perceived, he withdrew and left the rebels to fight their own battle. After this separation, Alexander gained several advantages; and at last, having cut the major part off in a decisive battle, he took eight hundred of the rebels in Bethome, whom he carried to Jerusalem; and having first killed their wives and children before their faces, he ordered them all to be crucified on one day, before him and his wives and concubines, whom he had invited to a feast at the place of execution. Then, resolving to revenge himself on the king of Damascus, he made war on him for three years successively, and took several places; when, returning home, he was received with great respect by his subjects.

His next expedition was against the castle of Raguba, in the country of the Gerosenes, where he was seized with a quartan ague, which proved his death, B. C. 79. His queen Alexandra, by his own advice, concealed it till the castle was taken; and then, carrying him to Jerusalem, she gave his body to the leaders of the Pharisees, to be disposed of as they should think proper; and told them, as her husband had appointed her regent during the minority of her children, she would do nothing in the administration without their advice and help.

This address to the Pharisees so much gained their esteem, that they not only settled the queen dowager in the government, but were very lavish in their eulogiums on her deceased husband, whom they honored with more than ordinary pomp and solemnity at his funeral.

The Pharisees, having now the management of the queen regent, and of Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, her sons by Alexander, had all the laws against Pharisaism repealed and abolished, recalled all the exiles, and demanded justice against those that had advised the crucifixion of the eight hundred rebels.

The queen made her eldest son Hyrcanus high-priest. But Aristobulus was not contented to live a private life; and, therefore, as soon as his mother seeing to decline, he mediated in what manner he might usurp the sovereignty from his brother, at her decease; and he had taken such measures beforehand, that, upon the death of his mother, he found himself strong enough to attempt the crown, though Alexander had declared Hyrcanus her successor. The two armies met in the plains of Jericho; but Hyrcanus, being deserted by most of his forces, was obliged to resign his crown and pontificate to Aristobulus, and promise to live peacefully upon his private fortune.

This resignation was a subject of great discontent to some of Hyrcanus's courtiers, among whom was Antipater, father to Herod the Great; who persuaded Hyrcanus to fly to Aretas, king of Arabia, who, on certain conditions, supplied him with fifty thousand men, with which Hyrcanus entered Judea, and gained a complete victory over Aristobulus. But while he besieged him in the temple, Aristobulus, with the promise of a large sum of money, engaged Pompey, the general of the Roman army, then before Damascus, to oblige Aretas to withdraw his forces; but Aristobulus, though he was for the present delivered from his brother's rage, prevaricated so with Pompey, that he at last confined Aristobulus in chains, took Jerusalem sword in hand, retraced the dignity and power of the principality, destroyed the fortifications, ordered an annual tribute to be paid to the Romans, and restored Hyrcanus to the pontificate, and made him prince of the country, but would not permit him to wear the diadem.

Pompey, having thus settled the government of Judea, returned in his way to Rome, with Aristobulus, his sons Alexander and Antigonus, and two of his daughters, to adorn his triumph.

Alexander found means to escape by the way, and about three years after arrived in Judea, and raised some disturbances; but he was defeated in all his attempts by Gabinus, the Roman governor in Syria; who, after this, coming to Jerusalem, confirmed Hyrcanus in the high-priesthood, but removed the civil administration from the Sanhedrin into five courts of justice of his own erecting, according to the number of five provinces, into which he had divided the whole land.

When Aristobulus had lain five years prisoner at Rome, he, with his son, escaped into Judea, and endeavored to raise fresh trouble; but Gabinus soon took them again; and, being remanded to Rome, the father was kept close confined, but the children were released.

It was about this time (B. C. 43), that the civil war between Pompey and Cesar broke out; and when Aristobulus was on the point of setting out, by Cesar's interest, to take the command of an army in order to secure Judea from Pompey's attempts, he was poisoned by some of Pompey's party.

When Cesar was returned from the Alexandrian war, he was much solicited to depose Hyrcanus in favor of Antigonus, the surviving son of Aristobulus; but Cesar not only confirmed Hyrcanus in the high-priesthood and principality of Judea, and his family in a perpetual succession, but he abolished the form of government lately set up by Gabinus, restored it to its ancient form, and appointed Antipater procurator of Judea under him.

Antipater, who was a man of great penetration, made his son Phasael governor of the country about Jerusalem; and his son Herod governor of Galilee.

Soon after this appointment, Herod, who was of a boisterous temper, having seized upon one Hezekiah, a ringleader of a gang of thieves, and some of his men that infested his territories, he put them to death. This was presently looked upon as a breach of duty to the Sanhedrin, before whom he was summoned to appear. But, lest the sentence of that court should pass upon him, he fled to Sextus Caesar, the Roman prefect of Syria at Damascus; and, having with a sum of money obtained of him the government of Colosyria, he raised an army there, marched into Judea, and would have revenged the indignity which he said the Sanhedrin and high-priests had cast upon him, had not his father and brother prevailed with him to retire for the present.

While Julius Caesar lived, the Jews enjoyed great privileges; but his untimely death (B. C. 44), by the [violent] and ungrateful hands of Brutus, Cassius, &c., in the senate-house, as he was preparing for an expedition against the Parthians to revenge his country's wrong, delivered them up as a prey to every hungry general of Rome. Cassius immediately seized upon Syria, and exacted above seven hundred talents of silver from the Jews. And the envy and villainy of Melius, who was a natural Jew, and the next in office under Antipater, an Idumean, rent the state into horrid factions. Melius bribed the high-priest's butler to poison his friend Antipater, to make way for himself to be the next in person to Hyrcanus. Herod, making sure of Cassius, by obtaining his leave and assistance to revenge his father's death, took the first opportunity to have him murdered by the Roman garrison at Tyre.

The friends of Melius, having engaged the high-priest and Felix the Roman general at Jerusalem on their side, resolved to revenge his death on the sons of Antipater. All Jerusalem was in uproar; Herod was sick at Damascus; so that the whole power and fury of the assailants fell upon Phasael, who defended himself very strenuously, and drove the tumultuous party out of the city. As soon as Herod was able, the two brothers presently quelled the faction; and had not Hyrcanus made his peace by giving Herod his grand-daughter Mariamne in marriage, they certainly would have shown their resentment of the high-priest's behavior with more severity.

Again this faction was not so totally extinguished, but that several principal persons of the Jewish nation, upon the defeat of Brutus and Cassius, accused Phasael and Herod to the conqueror, Mark Antony, of usurping the government from Hyrcanus. But the brothers had so much interest with the conqueror that he rejected the complaints of the deputies, made them both tetrarchs, and committed all the affairs of Judea to their administration; and, to oblige the Jews to obey his decision in this affair, he retained fifteen of the deputies as hostages for the people's fidelity, and would have put them to death had not Herod begged their lives.

The Jews, however, when Antony arrived at Tyre, sent one thousand deputies with the like accusations; which he, looking upon as a daring tumult, ordered his soldiers to fall upon them, so that some were killed and many wounded. But upon Herod's going to Jerusalem, the citizens revenged this affront in the same manner upon his retinue; the news whereof so enraged Antony, that he ordered the fifteen hostages to be immediately put to death, and threatened severe revenge against the whole faction. But after that Mark Antony was returned to Rome, the Parthians, at the solicitation of Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, who had promised them a reward of a thousand talents and eight hundred of the most beautiful women in the country, to set him on the throne of Judea, entered that country, and being joined by the factious and discontented Jews (B. C. 37), took Jerusalem without resistance, seized Phasael and Hyrcanus, and put them in chains; but Herod escaped under the cover of night, and deposited his mother, sister, wife, and his wife's mother, with several other relations and friends, in the impregnable fortress Massada, near the Lake Asphalites, under the care of his brother Josph, who was obliged to go to Rome to seek protection and relief.

In the mean time Antigonus remained in possession of all the country, and was declared king of Judea. The Parthians delivered Hyrcanus and Phasael to Antigonus; upon which Phasael, being so closely handcuffed and ironed that he foresees his ignominious death approaching, dashed his own brains out against the wall of the prison. Antigonus cut off the ears of Hyrcanus, to incapacitate him from the high-priesthood, and returned him again to the Parthians, who left him at Selencia, in their return to the East.

Herod on this occasion served himself so well of the friendship which had been between his father and himself with the Roman general Mark Antony, and the promise of a round sum of money, that he in seven days' time obtained a senatorial decree, constituting him king of Judea, and declaring Antigonus an enemy to the Roman state. He immediately left Rome, landed at Ptolemais, raised forces, and being aided with Roman auxiliaries, by order of the senate, he reduced greater part of the country, took Joppa, relieved Massada, stormed the castle of Ressa, and must have taken Jerusalem also, had not the Roman commanders who were directed to assist him been bribed by Antigonus, and treacherously obstructed his success. But when Herod perceived their collusion, he, for the present, satisfied himself with the reduction of Galilee; and hearing of Antony's besieging Somosota on the Euphrates, went to him in person to represent the ill treatment he had met with from the generals Ventidius and Sila, whom he had commanded to serve him.

Upon his departure, Herod left the command of his forces to his brother Joseph, with charge to remain upon the defensive. But Joseph, contrary to orders, attempting to reduce Jericho, was slain, and most of his men were cut to pieces. And thus Herod again lost Galilee and Idumea.

M. Antony granted all he requested; and though at first the army which Antony had spared him was roughly handled, and he himself wounded as he approached Jerusalem to revenge his brother's death, he afterwards slew Papyrus, Antigonus's general, and entirely defeated his army; and in the next campaign, after a siege of several months, Herod, assisted by Socius, the Roman general, took it by storm. The soldiers expecting the spoils of the city as their due, and being exasperated by the long resistance of the citizens, spared neither men, women, nor children, and would certainly have utterly destroyed every thing and person with rapine and devastation, death and slaughter, had not Herod redeemed them with a large sum of money.

Antigonus surrendered himself to Socius, who carried him in chains to Antony; and he, for a good sum of money, was bribed to put him to death, that in him the Asmonaeian family, which had lasted one hundred and twenty-nine years, might be extinct.

By this event Herod found himself once more in full power, and at liberty to revenge himself upon his enemies. He began his reign with the execution of all the members of the great Sanhedrin, except Pollio and Simeas, who are also called Hillel and Shanmua. Then he raised one Ananel, born of the pontifical family at Babylon, to the place of high-priest; but Mark Antony, at the intercession of Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, who was solicited thereto by Alexandra, Mariamne's mother, and the entreaties of his own beloved Mariamne, in behalf of her young brother, prevailed with him to annul this nomination, and to prefer Aristobulus to the pontificate. But as Hyrcanus was yet alive, and the Jews, in the place of his exile, paid him all the honors and reverence due to their king and high-priest, Herod, under a pretence of gratitude and friendship to that author of all his fortunes, prevailed with the old prince to desire it, and with Phraortes, king of Parthia, to permit his return to Jerusalem, with an intention to ent him off at a proper opportunity; which he soon after did on a pretence of his holding treasonable correspondence with Malchus, king of Arabia. But in the mean time Alexandra, valuing herself upon the interest she had with Cleopatra, laid a scheme to obtain the regal dignity for her son Aristobulus, by the same means that she had got him the pontificate. But this intrigue ended in the death of Aristobulus, and her own close confinement at first, and afterwards in her own and her daughter Mariamne's death; though this tragic scene was at several times acted under disguise. Aristobulus was drowned at Jericho, as it were accidentally (B. C. 29), in a fit of jealousy; Mariamne was adjudged to die; and Alexandra was ordered for execution (B. C. 23), on a supposition that she wished his death; which unjust sentence pursued his very innocent children Alexander and Aristobulus, for expressing their dislike of their father's cruelty to their mother Mariamne. But it is very probable that he himself had fallen a sacrifice to Octavianus, after the battle at Actium (B. C. 31), and the total loss of Mark Antony, had he not hastened to the conqueror at Rhodes, and in an artful speech appeased him, and with a promise to support his faction in those parts, obtained from him a confirmation of his royal dignity.

The cruelties, however, which he exercised to his own flesh and blood filled his mind with agonies of remorse, which brought him into a languishing condition; and what helped to increase his disorder was the conspiracy of Antipater, his eldest son by Doris, born to him whilst he was a private man. But Herod, having discovered the plot, accused him thereof before Quintilius Varus, the Roman governor of Syria, and put him to death also; which occasioned that remarkable exclamation of the emperor Octavianus, that 'it was better to be Herod's hog than his son.'

The great pleasure that Herod took (B. C. 25) in obliging his protector Octavianus, and the dread he had of being dethroned for his cruelties, prompted him to compliment him with the names of two new cities, the one to be built on the spot where Nemoria stood before Hyrcanus destroyed it (B. C. 22), which he called Schaste, the Greek word for Augustus; the other was Cosarea, once called the Tower of Straton, on the sea-coast of Phoenicia. After this he built a theatre and amphitheatre in the very city of Jerusalem, to celebrate games and exhibit shows in honor of Augustus; set up an image of an eagle, the Roman ensign, over one of the gates of the temple; and at last carried his flattery so far as idolatrously to build a temple of white marble in memory of the favors he had received from Octavianus Augustus.

These advances to idolatry were the foundation of a conspiracy of ten men, who bound themselves with an oath to assassinate him in the very theatre. But being informed thereof in time, Herod seized the conspirators, and put them to death with the most exquisite torments; and, to ingratiate himself with the Jews, he formed a design to rebuild the temple (B. C. 17), which now, after it had stood five hundred years, and suffered much from its enemies, was fallen much into decay. He was two years in providing materials; and it was so far advanced that divine service was performed in it in nine years and a half more, though a great number of laborers and artificers were continued to finish the works till several years after our Savior's ascension; for when Gessius Florus was appointed governor of Judea, he discharged eighteen thousand workmen from the temple at one time. And here it should be observed that these, for want of employment, began those mutinies and seditions which at last drew on the destruction both of the temple and Jerusalem, in A. D. 70.

The general state of the heathen world was that of profound peace under the Roman emperor Augustus, to whom all the known parts of the earth were in subjection when Christ was born. This glorious event took place in the year of the Julian Period 4709, and the fifth before the vulgar era of Christ, commonly noted A. D., Anno Domini, or the year of our Lord.

CHAPTER VII.

OF THE GOSPEL S.*

SECTION I.

PRELIMINARY REMARKS.

I. THE term Gospel, as previously remarked, is the designation given to the writings of the four evangelists, Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John; which comprise an authentic account of the incarnation, ministry, miracles, sufferings, death, resurrection, and ascension of our Lord Jesus Christ. It must not be supposed, however, that these writers have related all the circumstances of the life of the Redeemer, or that they have recorded all the discourses and instructions he delivered. Their object has been to preserve a record of the most important of these; and of such a character as should disclose the nature and divine origin of the Christian system. This is in fact declared by John — 'Many other things there are, which Jesus did, which are not written in this book; but these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that, believing, ye might have life through his name.' Some things related by one evangelist are omitted by another, or related with some varying circumstances, as best suited the object for which they were severally writing. Another thing to be observed is, that the writers of the Gospels have not confined themselves to chronological order, the arrangement of events being not merely those of time, but of the various associations; such as similarity in the facts themselves, vicinity of place, &c. A want of attention to this circumstance will induce much confusion in reading the evangelical histories. Finally, it does not appear to have been any part of the design of the evangelists to preserve the very words made use of on any occasion, but rather to give the sense of what was spoken. A remarkable proof of this we have in Mat. 10:9, comp. with Mk. 6:8. In the former passage, Jesus is introduced speaking to his apostles thus: 'Provide — neither shoes, nor yet a staff;' but in the latter, which exhibits the repetition of these instructions, he commanded them that they should take nothing for their journey, save a staff only, — words in fact contradictory to the former, though in sense perfectly the same. Such of the apostles as were possessed of staves might take them; but those who were without them were not to provide them. So of Mat. 3:17, compared with Mk. 1:11; and it is a satisfactory solution of the difficulties that present themselves on comparing the quotations in the N. T. with the passages in the Old, whence they are taken; for if the meaning of the passage be truly given, the quotation is justly made.†

2. That the Gospels were written by the persons whose names they bear, we have the concurring and decisive testimony of the ancient fathers of the Christian church. (1) A passage from Polyearp (who, as Irenaeus informs us, was made bishop of Smyrna by the apostles, and conversed with many who had seen the Lord) is cited by Victor Caesarius, in which we find the names of the four Gospels, as we at present have them, and the beginning of their several histories. (2) Justin Martyr, who, according to Eusebius, lived not long after the apostles, shows that these books were then well known by the name of Gospels, and were read by Christians in their assemblies every Lord's day. We also learn from him that they were read by Jews, and might be read by heathens; and that we may not doubt that, by the 'memoirs of the apostles,' which, says he, 'we call Gospels', he meant these four, received then in the church, he cites passages out of each, declaring that they contained the words of Christ. (3) Irenaeus, in the same century, not only cites them all by name, but declares that there were neither more nor fewer received by the church, and that they were of such authority, that though the heretics of his time complained of their obscurity, depraved them, and endeavored to lessen their authority, yet they durst not wholly disown them, nor deny them to be the writings of those apostles whose names they bore. He further cites passages from every ch. of Matthew and Luke, from 14 chs. of Mark, and from 20 chs. of John. (4) Clemens of Alexandria, having cited a passage from 'the Gospel according to the Egyptians,' informs his readers 'that it was not to be found in the four Gospels delivered by the church.' (5) Tatian, who flourished in the same century, and before Irenaeus, wrote 'a chain,' or 'harmony of the Gospels', which he named 'The Gospel gathered out of the Four Gospels.' (6) Inasmuch as these Gospels were 'written,' says Irenaeus, 'by the will of God, to be the pillars and foundation of the Christian faith,' the immediate successors of the apostles, who, says Eusebius, did great miracles by the assistance of the Holy Ghost, and performed the work of evangelists in preaching Christ to those who had not yet heard the word, made it their business, when they had laid the foundation of that faith among them, to 'deliver to them the writings of the holy Gospels'.

3. It has been objected, however, that other gospels, bearing the names of apostles, are mentioned as having existed in the early ages of Christianity. But this materially tends to confirm the tradition of the church, concerning those four we now receive. This will be evident from the following considerations: — (1) We find no mention of any of these supposititious gospels till the close of the 2d century, and of but few of them till the third or the fourth; i. e. not until long after the general reception of the four Gospels by the whole church of Christ. For Justin Martyr and Ireneus, who cite large passages from these four Gospels, take not the least notice of any others, mentioned either by the heretics or by the orthodox. (2) Those writers who speak of them, in the close of the 2d, or in the following centuries, do it with this remark, that the Gospels received by the tradition of the church were only four, and that the others belonged not to them, nor to the evangelical canon. Dr. Whithy, to whom we are indebted for these remarks, and in whose general preface the reader may find the authorities for the passages here cited, sums up the argument as follows: Seeing, then, (1) that these four Gospels were received without any doubt or contradiction by all Christians from the beginning, as the writings of those apostles and evangelists whose names they bear, and that the first Christians both acknowledged and testified that these writings were delivered to them by the apostles, as the pillars or fundamental articles of their faith; Seeing (2) that the same Gospels were delivered by the immediate successors of the apostles to all the churches which they converted or established, as the rule of their faith; Seeing (3) they were read from the beginning, as Justin Martyr testifies, in all assemblies of Christians, on the Lord's day; and so must have been early translated into those languages in which alone they could be understood by some churches, viz. the Syriac and Latin; Seeing (4) they were generally cited in the 2d century for the confirmation of the faith, and the conviction of heretics; and that the presidents of the assemblies exhorted those who heard them to practise and imitate what they heard: Seeing (5) we never hear of any other Gospels till the close of the 2d century, and then only hear of them with a mark of reprobation, or a declaration that they were pseudepigrapha, falsely imposed upon the apostles; that they belonged not to the evangelical canon, or to the Gospels delivered to the churches by a succession of ecclesiastical persons, or to those Gospels which they approved, or by which they confirmed their doctrines, but were to be rejected as the inventions of manifest heretics; — all these considerations must afford us a sufficient demonstration that all Christians then had unquestionable evidence that these four Gospels were the genuine works of those apostles and evangelists whose names they bore, and so were worthy to be received as the records of their faith. What reason, then, can any persons of succeeding ages have to question what was so universally acknowledged by those who lived so near to that very age in which these Gospels were indited, and who received them under the character of the holy and divine Scriptures?

4. The remarkable agreement of the four Gospels is a convincing proof of their strict fidelity; while their occasional difference affords incontrovertible evidence that they neither copied each other, nor drew from a common source.*

5. We have, then, four separate and independent witnesses to the same transactions; the three former writing without the knowledge of each other; the latter perusing their several narratives, and, by the publication of a fourth, confirming the truth of the former three.

SECTION II.

THE GOSPEL OF MATTHEW.

1. This apostle was surnamed Levi, and was the son of Alpheus, a native of Galilee. Our Lord called him from the receipt of custom; and he was therefore a publican or tax-gatherer. He was an attendant on our Savior during the whole time of his ministry, was constituted an apostle, and after the ascension he continued at Jerusalem with the rest of the apostles till the day of Pentecost. What became of him after this period, we know not.

2. His Gospel, which is placed first in all the collections of the sacred books, is almost universally allowed to have been the earliest written. Its precise date is difficult of determination. The earliest period assigned to it is 37; the latest, 61. After a careful consideration, we prefer the earlier date.†

3. As to the language in which this evangelist wrote his Gospel, there have been three hypotheses offered, each advocated by men of profound learning and talents—that Matthew originally wrote in Heb., or the Syro-Chaldaic dialect, spoken by the Jews in our Savior's time;—that he wrote in Greek;—and that there were two originals, one Greek, the other Heb. The arguments seem to preponderate in favor of the last opinion; for, as Mr. Townsend remarks, the authorities which Dr. Lardner and Mr. Horne have collected, to prove that Matthew wrote his Gospel in Heb., or that there were some documents called the Gospel of Matthew compiled in that language, are so numerous and so decisive, that we are hardly warranted in rejecting these testimonies; and there are again, on the other hand, such evident marks of originality of the present Greek Gospel of Matthew, that we are not justified in esteeming it, with Michaelis, a mere translation. It is possible that the real state of the case might be this: When the persecution began, or was beginning, Matthew, who, perhaps, might have already committed to writing the memorable events of Christ's history, might have distributed among his own countrymen, the converts of Jerusalem, an account of the transactions and teaching of our Lord; but as the persecution was not confined to Judea, but extended to Gentile cities, the converts who had taken refuge in them would be naturally anxious to have the gospel in that language which was most generally understood, that the glorious works of redemption and salvation might be made known to them, as well as to others. It is probable, therefore, that the Hebrew Gospel was first used, while the converts remained in Judea, or at least during the continuance of the Pauline persecution; and that it might have been given about six years after the ascension, when the persecution was beginning; in the year 31 or 35, the date here assigned to it. The Greek Gospel might have been given some years later, when the converts returned to Jerusalem, and required inspired histories of our Lord to be sent to their brethren of those cities in which their safety had been secured. This hypothesis will reconcile some of the discrepancies which have embarrassed many inquirers in their research into the early history of the church. It accounts also for the early disuse and non-appearance of the Heb. Gospel, while it agrees with the early date assigned to Matthew's history.‡

4. That Matthew wrote his Gospel for the use of the Jews, not only accords with the voice of antiquity, but with the contents of the book itself, in which every circumstance is carefully pointed out which might conciliate the faith of that nation; and every unnecessary expression avoided which might serve in any way to obstruct it. Those passages in the prophets, or other sacred books, relative to the Messiah, and which were generally understood in that age to be so, are never passed over in silence. The fulfillment of prophecy was always to the Jews, convinced of the inspiration of their sacred writings, a principal topic of argument. Accordingly, none of the evangelists has been more careful than Matthew, that nothing of this kind should be overlooked.§ He has, further, been more particular than either of the other evangelists, in relating those discourses of our Lord which go to recommend internal religion and purity, and to unmask the deformities and denounce the wickedness of deceit and hypocrisy. That this was admirably adapted for the instruction of the Jewish converts, will appear from the following considerations:—

5. The Jews were much disposed to consider the letter of the law as the complete rule and measure of moral duty; to place religion in the observance of ceremonies, [see Buxtorf.] or in a strict adherence to some favorite precepts, written or traditional; to ascribe to themselves sufficient power of doing the divine will without the divine assistance; and, vain of a civil or legal righteousness, to contemn all others, and esteem themselves so just that they needed no repentance, nor any expiation, but what the law provided. They rested in the covenant of circumcision and their descent from Abraham as a sure title to salvation, however their lives were led; and though they looked for a Messiah, yet with so little idea of an atonement for sin to be made by his death, that the cross proved the great stumbling-block to them. They expected him to appear with outward splendor, as the dispenser of temporal felicity; the chief blessings of which were to redound to their own nation in an earthly Canaan, and in conquest and dominion over the rest of mankind.||

6. A tincture of these delusive notions, which they had imbibed by education and the doctrine of their elders, would be apt to remain with too many, even after their admission into the church of Christ. How necessary, then, was it, that just principles concerning the way of life and happiness, and the nature and extent of the gospel, should be infused into the breasts of these sons of Sion, that they might be able to work out their own salvation, and promote that of others; since they were to be the salt of the earth, and the light of the world; the first preachers of righteousness to the nations, and the instruments of calling mankind to the knowledge of the truth!

7. Matthew therefore has chosen, out of the materials before him, such parts of our blessed Savior's history and discourses, as were best suited to the purpose of awakening them to a sense of their sins, of abating their self-conceit and overweening hopes, of rectifying their errors, correcting their prejudices, and exalting and purifying their minds. After a short account, more particularly requisite in the first writer of a gospel, of the genealogy and miraculous birth of Christ, and a few circumstances relating to his infancy, he proceeds to describe his forerunner, John the Baptist, who preached the necessity of repentance to the race of Abraham and children of the circumcision, and by his testimony prepares us to expect One mightier than he; mightier as a prophet in deed and word, and above the sphere of a prophet, mighty to sanctify by his Spirit, to pardon, reward, and punish by his sovereignty. Then the spiritual nature of his kingdom, the pure and perfect laws by which it is administered, and the necessity of vital and universal obedience to them, are set before us in various discourses, beginning with the sermon on the mount, to which Matthew hastens, as with a rapid pace, to lead his readers. And that the holy light shining on the mind by the word and life of Christ, and quickening the heart by his Spirit, might be seconded in its operations by the powers of hope and fear, the 25th ch. of this Gospel, which finishes the legislation of Christ, exhibits him enforcing his precepts, and adding a sanction to his laws, by the most noble and awful description of his future appearance in glory, and the gathering of all nations before him to judgment. Matthew then passes to the history of the Passion, and shows them, that the new covenant, foretold by their prophets, was a covenant of spiritual, not of temporal blessings; established in the sufferings and death of Christ, whose blood was shed for many, for the remission of sins (Mat. 26:23), which it was not possible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away. To purge the conscience from the pollution of dead and sinful works required the blood of him, who, through the eternal Spirit, offered himself without spot to God.

8. With the instructions of Christ are intermixed many hints, that the kingdom of God would not be confined to the Jews, but that, while numbers of them were excluded through unbelief, it would be increased by subjects of other nations. And thus the devout Israelite was taught, in submission to the will and ordinance of Heaven, to embrace the believing Samaritan as a brother, and to welcome the admission of the Gentiles into the church, which was soon after to commence with the calling of Cornelius. And as they suffered persecution from their own nation, and were to expect it elsewhere in following Christ, all that can fortify the mind with neglect of earthly good, and contempt of worldly danger, when they come in competition with our duty, is strongly mentioned.*

9. This Gospel abounds more than any of the others with allusions to Jewish customs, and with terms and phrases of Jewish theology. The style is every where plain and perspicuous — the words are arranged in their natural order — the periods are free from obscurity and intricacy — the narrative is well conducted — the discourses, parables, and actions of Jesus, are described in an artless, unaffected simplicity, and without any encumbrance of the historian; the reader being left to draw the proper inference. The genius of his Gospel is worthy an apostle — shows the familiar friend and companion of the Savior — and its whole form and structure evinces its author to have had a perfect acquaintance with the public and private life, the principles, temper, and disposition of the Savior, whose character he delineates.†

10. There is one circumstance relative to this evangelist which demands notice; there is not a truth, or doctrine, in the whole oracles of God which he has not taught. The outlines of the whole spiritual system are here correctly laid down. Even Paul himself has added nothing; he has amplified and illustrated the truths contained in this Gospel; but neither he nor any other of the apostles has brought to light one truth, the prototype of which has not been found in the words or acts of our blessed Lord as related by Matthew in his Gospel. This is the grand textbook of Christianity; the other Gospels are collateral evidences of its truth; and the apostolic epistles are comments upon this text.‡

harmonized view of the four evangelical narratives.

SECTION III.

THE GOSPEL OF MARK.

1. There has been considerable difference of opinion, among learned men, as to the identity of the writer of this Gospel. The fathers are unanimous in calling him the companion of Peter, who, in his first epistle, mentions a person of this name, whom he calls his son (ch. 5:13), and who was, in all probability, this evangelist. But whether this were the same person of whom mention is made in several places in the Acts and some of Paul's epistles, who is called John, whose surname is Mark, whose mother's name was Mary (Ac. 12:12), and of whom we are likewise told that he was sister's son to Barnabas (Col. 4:10), is not so certain. Calmet, Dr. Campbell, and others, think there is no evidence of this. The generality of writers, however, are of the contrary opinion. Michaëlis, who has collected and compared, in very perspicuous manner, the different circumstances related of Mark in the N. T., observes, 'It appears from Ac. 12:12, that Mark's original name was John, the surname of Mark having probably been adopted by him when he left Judea to go into foreign countries; a practice not unusual among the Jews of that age, who frequently assumed a name more familiar to the nations which they visited, than that by which they had been distinguished in their own country.'

2. That this Gospel was written by Mark, and that it was the second in order of time, are points for which the unanimous voice of antiquity can evidently be pleaded. The first authority in support of both these articles, is Papias, to whom, as the oldest witness, and, consequently, in a case of this nature, the most important, we are chiefly indebted for what has been advanced in relation to the evangelist Matthew. What he has said concerning Mark may be thus rendered, from Eusebius: 'This is what is related by the elder (i. e. John, not the apostle, but a disciple of Jesus); Mark, being Peter's interpreter, wrote exactly whatever he remembered, not indeed in the order wherein things were spoken and done by the Lord; for he was not himself a hearer or follower of our Lord, but he afterwards, as I said, followed Peter, who gave instructions as suited the occasions, but not as a regular history of our Lord's teaching. Mark, however, committed no mistake in writing such things as occurred to his memory; for of this one thing he was careful, to omit nothing which he had heard, and to insert no falsehood into his narrative.'§

Such is the testimony of Papias, which is the more to be regarded, as he assigns his authority. He spoke not from report, but from the information he had received from a most credible witness, John the elder or presbyter, a disciple of Jesus, and companion of the apostles, by whom he had been intrusted with a ministry in the church. 'To this might be added the testimony of Clement of Alexandria, and of Origen; to add these, however, would be superfluous. Suffice it to say, that what is above advanced by Papias, on the authority of John, is contradicted by no one. It is, on the contrary, confirmed by all who take occasion to mention the subject. We therefore only subjoin the account given by Irenaeus, because it serves to ascertain another circumstance, namely, that the publication of Mark's Gospel, the second in the order of time, soon followed that of Matthew. After stating that Matthew published his Gospel while Peter and Paul were preaching at Rome, he adds, 'After their departure, Mark also, the disciple and interpreter of Peter, delivered to us, in writing, the things which had been preached by Peter.'¶ Many things seem to prove that Mark's Gospel was written, or dictated, by a spectator of the actions recorded. Thus, ch. 1:20, 'They left their father in the ship with the hired servants.' In v. 29, the names of James and John, omitted by Matthew (3:14), are mentioned. In v. 33, the crowd at the door; compare Mat. 6:16, and Luke 4:10, 41. In v. 35, 36, his disciples seeking Christ when he had risen to pray; see Luke 4:42. In v. 45, the conduct of the leper after his cure; see Mat. 8:4, and Lu. 5:14, 15. Comp. the cure of the paralytic, 22, with Mat. 9:1, and Lu. 5:18, 19. Hence it appears that the opinion which has been held by some writers, that Mark only abridged Matthew's Gospel, is destitute of foundation. Indeed, Michaëlis, who formerly adopted this notion, but afterwards abandoned it, has shown, that the insertions and omissions of this evangelist, as well as his deviations from Matthew, in the order of time, render this hypothesis highly improbable. Dr. Townson, too, has fully proved, from a variety of minute incidents, not noticed by the other evangelists, that Mark's Gospel must have been either written or dictated by an eye-witness. Among these things are Christ's looking round on the people, 35; see Mat. 12:9-13, Lu. 6:6-11. The mention (v. 17) of the names omitted by the other evangelists (v. 21), and which is peculiar to Mark. In 4:26, the parable of the growing corn, so applicable to the call of the Gentiles, is also peculiar to Mark (ver. 34, compared with Mat. 13:31-34). Mark also, in v. 36, relates the cause of our Lord's sleep in the ship; that it was after the fatigue of the day. This is omitted in Mat. 8:21-26, Mk. 4:37-38, Lu. 8:23, 24. He also says, in v. 36, 'other little ships were with them'; and in v. 38, 'he was in the hinder part of the ship, asleep on a pillow'; — both which things are omitted by the others. The particulars mentioned in the account of the Gadarene demoniacs. See Mat. 8:28-31, Mk. 5:1-19, Lu. 8:26-39. The number of the swine; the mentioning of the very words which our Lord spake to the daughter of Jairus (ch. 5:11); the blind man casting away his garment (10:50); the mentioning of the names of those who came to him privately (13:34); all which minutiae could have been known only to a spectator and hearer of our Lord's words and discourses.††

3. So far in proof of this Gospel having been written under the direction of an eye-witness of the transactions it records; and that this eye-witness was the apostle Peter, agrees extremely well with the contents of the gospel, as well as with the current of tradition; ‡‡ and this circumstance will further serve to explain several particulars which at first sight appear extraordinary. For instance, where Peter is concerned in the narrative, mention is sometimes made of circumstances which are not related by the other evangelists, as at 1:29-33, 9:34, 11:21, 14:30. And on the contrary, the high commendations which Christ bestowed on Peter, as appears from Mat. 16:17-19, but which the apostle, from modesty, would hardly have repeated, are wanting in Mark's Gospel. At 16:17, Mark mentions neither the name of the apostle who cut off the ear of the high-priest's servant, nor the circumstance of Christ's healing it. We know that this apostle was Peter, for his name is expressly mentioned by John; but an evangelist who wrote his Gospel at Rome during the life of Peter, would have exposed him to the

¶ When the fathers call Mark 'the interpreter of Peter,' we must not understand an 'interpreter,' in the common acceptance of the word, of which Peter stood less in need than Mark himself. It is similar to the phrase Interpres Diuum, when applied to Mercury, which signifies 'messenger of the gods.' Interpres Petri, or Ermeneutes Petrou, therefore, when applied to Mark, signifies nothing more than 'a person commissioned by Peter to execute his commands.' — Michaëlis.

‡‡ Without attempting to dispute this well-attested fact, the late ingenious and learned editor of Calmet has attempted to prove that Mark must have been well qualified from his own personal observation and knowledge to narrate many things in the gospel history. See Fragments to Calmet, No. DCCXXXV.

daugher of being accused by his adversaries, if he had openly related the fact. Had Mark written after the death of Peter, there would have been no necessity for this caution.*

4. That Mark wrote for the especial instruction of Gentile converts, is evident from the care with which in several instances he explains oriental circumstances and Jewish customs. Thus (32) he explains the meaning of koinias chersi, defiled or common, by adding, that is, unwashen. And further, the rite there alluded to is, in the following vs., explained in a manner which, to one in Matthew's circumstances, who wrote for the immediate use of the natives of Judea, familiarized to such observances, must have appeared entirely superfluous. The word mammon, used by Matthew and Luke, is by Mark altogether avoided, who uses the common word riches, because the former, though familiar in Judea, and perhaps through all Syria, might not have been understood even by the Hellenist Jews at Rome, whereas the latter could not be mistaken anywhere. In 7:11, he employs the oriental word Corban, but immediately subjoins the interpretation, that is, a gift; and in like manner (15:42) he explains the meaning of paraskewē.†

5. Concerning the time when Mark published his Gospel, writers are not agreed. It is allowed by all the ancient authorities that it was written at Rome; but the precise time is difficult of determination. Mr. Townsend, as we have seen, supposes it to have been published as early as the year 44; i. e. 7 years after the publication of Matthew's Gospel; but some writers bring it down as low as the year 65. That it was written at the time when the devout Gentiles were first admitted into the church, is pretty clear from internal evidence. In 7:14-23, the spirituality of the law is compared with Peter's address to Cornelius. In v. 24-30, the Syrophenician woman is received; a Greek having faith in Christ — so Cornelius was not a Jew, but accepted. The parable of the vineyard, 12:1-12, is descriptive of the calling of the Gentiles; the event which had now taken place. Ch. 13 has a prediction of the fate of the temple — the result of the rejection of the Jews. In 14:21, is the expression, ‘My blood, which is shed for many,’ which Dr. Lardner refers to the calling of the Gentiles. From 16:15, Dr. Lardner says, Mark evidently understood the extent of the apostolic mission.‡

6. The testimony of the fathers goes to confirm this hypothesis. Eusebius asserts that it was composed at Rome, in the reign of Claudius; and Theophylact and Euthymius state that it was written ten years after Christ's ascension.

7. There are two objections to this early date of Mark's Gospel. One, that he is said (Acts 12:25) to have gone to Antioch with Saul and Barnabas; the other, an allusion to the progress of the apostle in the last verse of his Gospel. In reply to the former, it may be said, that it is probable he would leave Rome immediately on hearing of the death of Herod, and arrive there at the time when Saul and Barnabas were about to return to Antioch; which event is placed by Dr. Lardner at this period. It appears from the manner in which 16:8 so abruptly terminates, and the evident commencement of a new summing up of the evidence, that some extraordinary interruption took place while Mark was composing his Gospel. The v. terminates with the words, for they were afraid; and many critics have, from the rapid transition to the subject of the following v., impugned the authenticity of the remaining vs. Mr. Townsend, however, attributes it, with great judgment, to the circumstances just related.

8. In all probability Mark returned to Jerusalem after the death of Herod, with his unfinished Gospel; afterwards accompanied Saul and Barnabas on their return to Antioch; and, having attended the latter on his journey, he was finally settled at Alexandria, where he founded a church of great celebrity. This agrees with Jerome, Chrysostom, and Eusebius.§

9. The last v., which contains an allusion to the progress of the gospel, is supposed to be of a later date than the rest of the history, which has given rise to a doubt as to the authenticity of the last 12 vs.; || but if we suppose the Gospel was first published at Rome, and completed at Alexandria, and the last 12 vs. added there, we can have no difficulty in accounting for this difference of date.

10. The conclusion at which Dr. Townsend has arrived, after considering the evidence in favor of the early date of Mark's Gospel, does not materially differ from this. He supposes that it was published in Italy, but that the evangelist came to Rome by himself, studied the state of the church there, returned to Asia in conjunction with Peter, and drew up his Gospel for the benefit of the converts in that city. He has adopted this perplexed theory to avoid the opinion that Peter came to Rome in the reign of Claudius.||

11. After considering the whole evidence respecting the Gospel of Mark, says Mr. Townsend, I cannot conclude but that it was written at a much earlier date than has been generally assigned to it by Protestant writers. The Gospel of Matthew was written in the first persecution, when the tidings of salvation were preached to the Jews only. The Gospel of Mark was published during the second persecution of the Christian church, when the devout Gentiles, such as Cornelius, were appealed to. Both were mercifully adapted to these two stages of the church's progress.

12. The only thing remaining to be noticed, regards the original language of Mark's Gospel. That the evangelist wrote in the Greek tongue, is conformable to the testimony of antiquity; and we believe it was never disputed till the time of Cardinal Baronius, who, from a desire, as it should seem, to exalt the language in which the Vulgate was written, affirmed that Mark wrote his history in Latin. The only argument, however, which merits attention, in favor of this hypothesis is, that this Gospel being published at Rome, for the benefit of the Romans, it is not to be supposed that it would be written in any other language than that of the place? To this argument Dr. Campbell has offered a short but satisfactory reply. — First, the Greek language, having become a kind of universal language, was more used by strangers at Rome than the language of the place. Secondly, the apostle Paul wrote to the Romans in Greek, and not in Latin. Now, if there was no impropriety in Paul's writing to the Romans a very long epistle in Greek, neither was there any in Mark giving them his Gospel in that language. The only thing which appears to support the opinion of Baronius, is the inscription subjoined to the Syriac and some other oriental versions of this Gospel. But it should be remembered, that these postscripts are not the testimonies of the translators, but the mere conjectures of some unknown transcriber, and therefore are of no authority.††

13. The style of Mark is plain, simple, and unadorned, and sometimes appears to approach to a degree of rusticity or inelegance. Whoever reads the original, must be struck with the frequent, and often pleonastic, occurrence of euthos, immediately, and, again, and such like; but these detract nothing from the accuracy and fidelity of the work. The Hebraisms which abound in it may be naturally expected from a native of Palestine, writing in Greek. The Latinisms, which frequently occur, are accounted for on the ground of the work being written for the Gentiles, and particularly for the Roman people. On the whole, the Gospel according to Mark is a very important portion of divine revelation, which God has preserved, by a chain of providences, from the time of its promulgation until now; and for which no pious reader will hesitate to render due praise to Him whose work is ever perfect.|||

SECTION IV.

THE GOSPEL OF LUKE.

1. This evangelist bears the same relation to Paul as Mark did to Peter, having been a companion and assistant to that apostle, and writing his Gospel under his direction. Our knowledge of the history of Luke is chiefly derived from his own work, the Acts of the Apostles. In the introduction to this work he plainly intimates that he was neither an apostle nor an eye-witness of the transactions he has narrated, but that he derived his information from those who were such. It has been questioned whether Luke were a Jew or a Gentile. The latter opinion has been inferred by Michaelis from an expression of Paul, in his Epistle to the Colossians, where, after naming some ‘who are of the circumcision,’ he mentions others, and among them Luke, without any such addition (1:14), and who are, therefore, supposed to have been Gentiles. But this, though a plausible inference, is not, as Dr. Campbell remarks, a necessary consequence from the apostle's words, who might have added the clause, ‘who are of the circumcision,’ not to distinguish the persons from those after mentioned, as not of the circumcision, but to give the Colossians particular information concerning those with whom, perhaps, they had not previously been acquainted. If they knew what Luke, and Epaphras, and Demas, whether Jews or Gentiles, originally were, the information was quite unnecessary with regard to them. Some writers, on the contrary, have maintained that Luke was not only a Jew, but one of the seventy.||| But this does not comport with his own declaration, before referred to. That he was a convert to Christianity from Judaism, however, is upon the whole sufficiently evident both from his style and the intimate knowledge which he displays of Jewish doctrines and customs. If he be the same as the person named in the Epistle to the Colossians, he was, by profession, a physician; and, according to Eusebius, a native of Antioch. He is mentioned for the first time in Ac. 16:10,11,||| where we find him with Paul at Troas; thence he accompanied him to Jerusalem; remained with him during his afflictions in Judea; and was exiled with him when he was sent as a prisoner from Cesarea to Rome, where he staid with him during his two years' confinement. None of the ancient fathers having mentioned his martyrdom, it is probable he died a natural death.|||

2. The Gospel of Luke was always received as authentic. It was published during the lives of the apostles John, Peter, and Paul, and was approved and sanctioned by them, and received as such by the churches, in conformity with the Jewish canon, which decided on the genuineness or spuriousness of the books of their own church, by receiving him as a prophet who was acknowledged as such by the testimony of an established prophet.|||

3. Luke has himself stated the occasion

¶¶¶ The late editor of Calmet contends, with much plausibility, that ‘Lucius of Cyrene,’ in Ac. 13:1, is the same person as Luke the evangelist, and consequently that the author of this Gospel was an Egyptian. See Fragments, No. 636-648. A further proof of this opinion, the reader will find in Fragment 729, some curious remarks on the style in which Luke has dated his Gospel.

of his writing, which was, to supply an ample and authentic account of the life and ministry of Christ (1:1-4). The only difficulty which meets us here is, the previous publication of the Gospels of Matthew and Mark. But this may be set aside by considering, that, in all probability, Matthew's narrative, which was originally written in Hebrew, had not yet been written in the Greek language; and that, although the Gospel of Mark was extant in that language, it was comparatively but a compendium of the history.

4. In composing his narrative, Luke is supposed to have drawn his information chiefly from the apostle Paul, whose companion he was; and some have even gone so far as to affirm that when Paul uses the expression "my Gospel" (Ro. 10:16, 16:25, 2 Ti. 2:3), he means the Gospel according to Luke. This, however, is inconsistent with the evangelist's declaration, that the source of his intelligence, as to the facts related in his Gospel, was from those who had been eye and ear witnesses of what Jesus both did and taught — of which number Paul was not. The probability is, that Luke, being a constant companion of this apostle in his various journeys, availed himself of the opportunities which his situation afforded him of conversing with those apostles and disciples who had heard the discourses and witnessed the miracles of our Lord.

5. The particular time and place at which Luke published his Gospel is by no means certain, and it would be useless to lay before the reader the conjectures of the learned on this topic of inquiry.* Various hypotheses have been rendered apparently probable by the learning and ingenuity of their advocates; but each one is, after all, but a conjecture, destitute of historical testimony. The year 53 is the earliest date which has been assumed, and the year 64 the latest. The latter one we have adopted; and think the place of its publication to have been either Achia or Syria.

6. That Luke published his Gospel for the instruction of the Gentile converts, is affirmed by the unanimous voice of the church, and is clearly to be gathered from the document itself. Hence he inserts many things which Matthew had omitted, but which were necessary for the information of strangers. There is also a striking difference between the genealogy of Christ given by Luke, and that inserted by Matthew; the latter only deducing the promised Messiah from Abraham, according to Jewish custom, whereas the former ascends up to Adam, agreeably to Gentile custom. Further, Luke has inserted several of our Lord's parables and discourses, which were particularly designed to encourage the faith and hope of the Gentiles, but which had been passed over by the former evangelists. Of this description are the parables of the lost sheep and the piece of silver (15:1-10); of the prodigal son (15:11-32); and of the grain of mustard-seed, &c. (13:18-21).†

7. To conclude: Luke appears to have been, upon the whole, at more pains than any of the other evangelists to ascertain the dates of some of the most memorable events on which, in a great measure, depend the dates of all the rest. In some places, however, without regard to order, he gives a number of detached precepts and instructive lessons, one after another, though probably not spoken on the same occasion, but introduced as they occur to the writer's memory, that nothing of moment might be omitted.‡

8. Had not Paul informed us that this evangelist was by profession a physician, and consequently a man of literary attainments, his writings would have afforded ample evidence that he had enjoyed a liberal education. Grotius states that he is eminently distinguished for his fine classic Greek,§ and that he abounds with expressions of classical purity.|| The distinguished sweetness of his style, the smoothness of his periods, and the beautiful and perspicuous arrangement of his words, cannot fail to strike and delight every reader possessed of an elegant taste in polite literature. Nothing can be better accommodated to the grand transactions he records, than his elegant simplicity, divested of all studied ornaments, plain, chaste, and perspicuous, — one easy, regular, well-conducted narrative — greatly resembling Xenophon's history of the expedition of Cyrus, or his history of Greece, for the simple, artless, unaffected manner of the narration,¶ or the Commentaries of Julius Caesar, for its plainness, elegance, and true sublimity. The evangelist begins at the fountain-head, follows with careful footsteps the stream in its heavenly course, till, after the death of Christ, we see it divided into a thousand different channels, in every direction, to refresh and bless the whole world.

SECTION V. THE GOSPEL OF JOHN.

1. The evangelist John was a native of Bethsaida, and the son of Zebedee and Salome. Comp. Matt. 27:56 with Mark 15:40 and 16:1. With his father, and his brother James, he followed the occupation of a fisherman, on the sea of Galilee, whence he was called, with the latter, by our Lord (Mat. 4:21, 22. Mk. 1:19, 20. Lu. 5:1-10), as is generally supposed, about 25 years of age, and unmarried. Theophylact conceives him to have been a relative of our Lord, and gives his genealogy thus: 'Joseph, the husband of the blessed Mary, had 7 children by a former wife, 4 sons and 3 daughters; Martha (or, as Dr. Lardner thinks, Mary), Esther, and Salome, whose son John was; before Salome was reckoned our Lord's sister, and John was his nephew.' If this be correct, it will, perhaps, account for some things mentioned in the Gospels; as the petition of Salome for the two chief places in the kingdom for her sons; John being the beloved disciple and most intimate friend of Jesus; and our Lord committing to his charge the care of his mother, as long as she should live. Theophylact's conjecture is confirmed by a marginal note in a MS. copy of the Greek Testament, preserved in the imperial library of Vienna, the writer of which professes to have taken his account from the commentaries of St. Sophronius.

2. It is evident that John was present at most of the things related by him in his Gospel; and that he was an eye and an ear witness of our Lord's labors and discourses. After the ascension, he returned with the other disciples from Mount Olivet to Jerusalem, and took a share in all the transactions previous to the day of Pentecost; at which time he partook with the rest of the mighty out-pouring of the Holy Spirit, by which he was evidently qualified for the place he afterwards filled in the Christian church. In conjunction with Peter, he cured a man who had been lame from his mother's womb, for which he was cast into prison (Ac. 3:1-10). He was afterwards sent to Samaria, to confer the Holy Spirit on those who had been converted there by Philip the deacon (ch. 8: 5-25).

Paul states that he was present at the council of Jerusalem, of which an account is given in Acts 15. The fathers state that John was a long time in Asia, continuing there till the time of Trajan, who succeeded Nerva, A. D. 98. Domitian having declared war against the church in A. D. 95, John, it is said, was banished from Ephesus, and carried to Rome, where he was immersed in a caldron of boiling oil, out of which he came unburnt. After this he was banished to the isle of Patmos, where he wrote the book of Revelation. Upon the accession of Nerva to the imperial dignity, he is said to have returned to Ephesus (A. D. 97), being then about 90 years of age. In this city he is supposed to have written his three epistles and Gospel; and to have died in the 100th year of his age. Michaelis thinks it probable that the evangelist was one of the two disciples of John who followed Christ, a circumstantial account of whom is given in this Gospel, (1:37-41).††

3. It is evident that John had seen the three former Gospels before he wrote his own; and hence he carefully omits those transactions and discourses which had been recorded in them; or if he is obliged to notice them for the purposes of connection, or otherwise, it is done in the most cursory manner. This affords an incontrovertible proof, too, that he had not only seen but approved of the foregoing Gospels as faithful and true histories, and that he partly composed his own as supplement to them.‡‡

4. The evangelist has stated the design of his Gospel, in 20:31 — 'These are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that, believing, ye might have life through his name.' Hence he has especially recorded those discourses of our Lord, in which he spoke of Himself, of his divine legation, of his august majesty, and of the work committed to Him by the Father — subjects which are rarely discussed by the other evangelists, and no where so evidently, clearly, and systematically treated of as in this Gospel. It must be observed, too, that in the other evangelists our Lord's phraseology is, for the most part, highly figurative and parabolical; but in this usually literal and perspicuous. In the epistles the inspired writers have explained the fundamental doctrines concerning Jesus the Messiah, in expressions mostly their own; but John, in the very words of Jesus Himself. In the other Gospels, we hear Him speaking like an inspired person, indeed, but as a man; in this, as the Son of God, the Messiah Himself. The other evangelists have, indeed, delivered this fundamental doctrine which respects his divinity and Messiahship, but only on occasions supplied by other subjects, and have only sometimes touched upon it; John has professedly and systematically explained it — a method most efficacious, and calculated both to instruct and to persuade. Hence it is truly astonishing that theologians should, in explaining the work of salvation by Christ, have had recourse to these figurative modes of expression employed by Paul (for the wisest purposes, doubtless, and in reference to the peculiar circumstances of those times), and not rather have followed the authority of our Lord Himself, and employed his very words, literal and perspicuous as they are, attended with few difficulties, and liable to little ambiguity of interpretation, or perversion of sense.§§

5. It appears, however, as well from internal evidence as from the voice of antiquity, that John had some particular classes of men in view in prosecuting this design. Ireneus, who wrote in less than a century after the publication of John's Gospel, affirms the occasion of his writing to have been the errors of the Cerinthians and Nicolaitans.||| Eusebius, quoting Clement, says — 'John, who is the last of the evangelists, having seen that in the three former Gospels corporeal things had been explained, and being urged by his acquaintance, and inspired of God, composed a spiritual Gospel.' Thus it appears to have been a very early tradition in the church, that this Gospel was composed, not only to supply what had not been fully communicated in the former Gospels, but also for the purpose of refuting the heresies of Cerin-

thus and the Gnostics.* Indeed, had not this been asserted by Irenaeus, the contents of the Gospel itself, as Michaelis justly observes, would lead to the conclusion.

6. The object proposed by Cerinthius, who was by birth a Jew, was to found a new system of doctrine, by a monstrous combination of the religion of Christ with the errors of the Jewish and Gnostic systems. From the latter he borrowed his pleroma or fulness, his aeons or spirits, and his Demiurgus or creator of the visible world, which fictitious he so modified as to give them an air of Judaism, which must considerably have favored the progress of his heresy. The most high God he represented as being utterly unknown before the manifestation of Christ, dwelling in a remote heaven called pleroma, with the chief spirits or aeons — that this supreme God first generated an only-begotten Son, who again begot the Word, which was inferior to the first-born — that Christ was a still lower eon, though far superior to some others — that there were two higher aeons distinct from Christ; one called Life, and the other Light — that from the aeons again proceeded inferior orders of spirits, and particularly one Demiurgus, who created this visible world out of eternal matter — that this Demiurgus was ignorant of the supreme God, and much lower than the aeons, which were wholly invisible — that he was, however, the peculiar God and protector of the Israelites, and sent Moses to them, whose laws were to be of perpetual obligation — that Jesus was a mere man, of the most illustrious sanctity and justice, the real son of Joseph and Mary — that the eon Christ descended upon Him in the form of a dove when He was baptized, revealed to Him the unknown Father, and empowered Him to work miracles — that the eon Light entered John the Baptist in the same manner, and therefore that John was in some respects preferable to Christ — that Jesus, after his union with Christ, opposed himself with vigor to the God of the Jews, at whose instigation he was seized and crucified by the Hebrew chiefs; and that when Jesus was taken captive, and came to suffer, Christ ascended up on high, so that the man Jesus alone was subjected to the pains of an ignominious death — that Christ will one day return upon earth, and, renewing his former union with the man Jesus, will reign in Palestine 1000 years, during which his disciples will enjoy the most exquisite sensual delights. Some of the Cerinthian sect denied also the resurrection of the dead.†

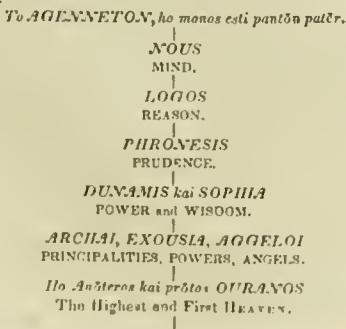

* See Lardner's Suppl. vol. i. p. 355, &c., and Michaelis, vol. iii. pt. He then gives the annexed brief outline of the notions of Valentinius:

‡ Some of the early Christians had imbibed the notion that John would live till the day of judgment; a notion to which a false interpretation of a saying of Christ, and the great age which the evangelist actually attained, had given rise. For this reason John has related at full length, in the last ch., the conversation which took place between Christ, Peter, and himself, after the resurrection; and has shown in what connection and in what sense Christ said of John, "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?" || Vitrina gives the following scheme of the opinions or theory of Basilides: —

7. Bearing these dogmas in mind, we shall find John's Gospel divides into 3 parts. I. Doctrines laid down in opposition to those of Cerinthius (1:1–13). II. The proofs of those doctrines in a historical manner (1:19–20:29). III. A conclusion or appendix, giving an account of the person of the writer, and of his design in writing his Gospel (20:30–31).‡

8. Besides refuting the errors of Cerinthius and his followers, Michaelis is of opinion that John had also in view to confute the erroneous tenets of the Sabaeans, a sect which acknowledged John the Baptist for its founder; and has adduced a variety of terms and phrases, which renders his conjecture not improbable. Perhaps we shall not greatly err if we conclude with Rosenmüller, that John had both these classes of heretics in view, and that he wrote to confute their respective tenets.§

9. The Gnostics and Saturnians both taught that the Son of God had descended from above to destroy evil and restore man to his primeval state, but that He had not assumed a material or real body, but merely the shadow or resemblance of one. In opposition to these, John affirmed that the Word was made flesh. Carpocrates, on the other hand, taught that the world was created by angels; that Jesus was the real son of Joseph and Mary; and he consequently denied his divinity, though he considered him as superhuman. In opposition to Carpocrates, John taught that the world was created, not by angels, but by the Logos, who was revealed to man as the Christ, the divine Personage, promised by the prophets and expected by the world.

10. Omitting much more, relative to the Elcesaites, Valentinians, and other heretics, enumerated by Irenaeus and Epiphanius, and discussed by Mosheim and Lardner, we pass on to notice the sentiments of Basilides of Alexandria, who lived about this time. Irenaeus observes that Basilides, in order to appear to have a more sublime and probable scheme than others, outstripped them all; and taught that from the self-existent Father was born Nous, or understanding; of Nous, Logos, or the Word; of Logos, Phronesis, or Prudence; of Phronesis, Sophia and Dynamis, or Wisdom and Power; of Dynamis and Sophia, powers, principalities, and angels, i. e. the superior angels, by whom the first heavens were made; from these proceeded other angels, which made all things. The first of these angels he represents as the God of the Jews, who, desiring to bring other nations under the dominion of his people, was so effectually opposed, that the Jewish nation was in danger of being totally ruined, when the self-existent and infinite Father sent his first-begotten Noe, who is also said to be Christ, for the salvation of those who believed in Him. He appeared in the world as a man — taught worked miracles — but did not suffer — for Simon of Cyrene was transformed into his likeness, and was crucified; after which Christ ascended into heaven. Basilides taught also that men ought not to confess Him who in reality was crucified, but him who came in the form of man, and was supposed to be crucified. Any reader of John's Gospel, who acknowledges the authority of that evangelist, must be convinced of the errors of Basilides, as this inspired writer plainly declares that the Logos itself was made flesh, had become a teacher of the Jews, had dwelt among them, and as a man among men was crucified.¶ Vitrina concludes his dissertation by summing up the precise objects for which each verse of John's Introduction might have been more especially written, in allusion to the heresies prevalent at the time of the writing of his Gospel. They will be found, he concludes, to overthrow all the subtleties of each of the Gnostic heresies.||

II. In addition to the Jews, and the heretics of his day, the third class of persons to whom John addressed his Gospel were his contemporaries among the primitive Christians. The word Logos has been supposed by many to be used in the same sense as in this gospel in several passages of the N. T. — Ia. 1:2. Ac. 20:32. He. 4:2. Re. 19:13. If from the writers of the N. T. we turn to the apostolic fathers, we shall find, though their testimony is express in favor of the divinity of Christ, that their evidence is not deduced from the doctrine of the Logos. The reason of this might be, that John had in their opinion so completely decided the question, that the necessity of their resuming the argument had been suspended. The fathers who succeeded the apostolic age, however, lived at a time when the discussions respecting the identity of the Messiah and the Logos required further attention; and we accordingly find that, from the time of Justin Martyr to Athanasius, the works of the fathers abound with arguments in proof of this fundamental doctrine of Christianity. The greater part of these authorities, in support of the doctrine that the Logos of John was the angel Jehovah of the

 It is very natural to inquire what sense the Jewish reader would attach to the account given by the evangelist of the Logos; or, in other words, what were the sentiments of the Jews in the time of St. John concerning the Logos, and in what respects did he design either to confirm or rectify the opinions of his countrymen on that subject. That the Chaldeo term Mitra, or WORD, is taken personally in a multitude of places in the Jewish Tongue, and also the Greek Logos, or word, in the writings of Philo, who is reasonably supposed to have represented the faith of the ancient Jewish church, has been ably demonstrated by Dr. Allix, in his valuable, though sometimes inaccurate, work on 'the testimony of the ancient Jewish church,' and by the learned Bryant, in his 'Sentiments of Philo Judaeus concerning the ΑΟΓΟΣ, or WORD of GOD.' Dr. A. Clarke has given some extracts from both these works, and also from the Zend Avesta and other writings attributed to Zoroaster, in his notes on John ch. 1, to which the reader is referred.

GUIDE TO THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

Jewish, as certainly as it was the Messiah of the Christian church, will be found in the works of Bp. Bull.

12. The fourth class of persons whom John may be supposed to have addressed, were the unconverted heathen. Of these the more ignorant were familiar with the doctrine of the incarnation; and the evangelist might desire, when any of them should become converts to the Christian religion, that they should have correct ideas of the only available incarnation—that of God manifest in the flesh. The more educated of the heathen were of course well acquainted with the popular philosophy of the day,* and would learn also, should they ever be brought to the knowledge of the truth, that the only real doctrine of the Logos was that which was maintained by the Christian church, and is so satisfactorily set down by John in the commencement of his invaluable Gospel.

13. It thus appears from a careful investigation of the principal authorities that can now be collected, that the preface to John's Gospel is the most important passage in the N. T. It is the passage which is the foundation of the Christian doctrine of the divinity of Christ—the point where the Jewish and Christian churches meet and divide—the record which identifies the faith of the Mosiac church with that of the Christian. And as the preface to a book is generally the last part written, this passage may be considered as the last of the inspired writings, and as a sacred seal placed on the whole of the Old and New Testaments. The government of the Jewish church was consigned by the Supreme Being, the Father, to that manifested Being who assumed the titles, and exerted the powers, and declared Himself possessed of the attributes of the Most High God. Without the consent of this Being, the Jewish church could not have been overthrown. He was accustomed repeatedly to appear. He called Himself the Captain of the Lord's host (Jos. 5:14, 15, 6:2); the Angel in whom the name of God was (Ex. 23:21); and to this Angel, or Jehovah, are attributed all the great actions recorded of God in the O. T. We do not read any where in the O. or N. T. that this Being ceased at any time to protect the Jewish nation and its church. The prophet Malachi, in a passage (3:1-6, 4:2-6) which has been uniformly considered by the Jewish as well as the Christian commentators to refer to the Messiah, declares that this Angel Jehovah, the Jehovah whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple—to the temple which had been rebuilt after the return from the captivity, and which was destroyed by the Roman soldiers. But we have no account whatever, neither have we any allusion in any author whatever, that the ancient manifested God of the Jews appeared in the usual manner in the Jewish temple, between the time of Malachi and the death of Herod the Great. The Christian fathers, therefore, were unanimous in their opinion that this prophecy was accomplished in the person of Jesus, and in Him only. They believed that Christ, even Jesus of Nazareth, was the Angel of the Covenant; that He, and He only, was Jehovah, the Angel Jehovah, the Logos of St. John, the Mimra Jah of the Targumists, the expected and predicted Messiah of the Jewish and Christian churches. This is the doctrine rejected by the Unitarian as irrational, by the Deist as incomprehensible, by the Jew as unscriptural; but it is the doctrine which has ever been received by the Christian church in general with humility and faith, as its only hope, and consolation, and glory.†

14. The extreme importance of these subjects to a right understanding of this Gospel must furnish an apology for the length of the discussion. To understand the expressions of any writer, particularly when they are at all dubious, or liable to misrepresentation, we must endeavor to place ourselves in the situation of those to whom they were originally addressed; and it is the more necessary here, in consequence of the efforts made in these times to explain away the direct and satisfactory testimony of John to the proper divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ.‡

15. The style of John is pronounced by Michælis to be better and more fluent than that of the other evangelists. It seems, he adds, as if he had acquired a facility and taste in the Greek language from his long residence at Ephesus. His narrative is very perspicuous; and in order to promote perspicuity, the same word is sometimes repeated; though, perhaps, the advanced age in which he wrote had some influence upon his style, since he is always inclined to repetitions. An unaffected simplicity marks his writings. All is plain truth, divested of every adventitious ornament. No pomp of words, no labor of composition, no smooth arrangement of periods, are here studied. Negligently plain and simple, and familiar in his language, but disclosing the grandest ideas, opening the most glorious prospects, and fraught with doctrines of the greatest sublimity, every page of his divine writings is impressed with hardly any other characters than those of the purest love and obedience. His heart seems to be entirely occupied and possessed with the amiable spirit and genius of the Gospel; and both in his Gospel and in his Epistles, he is continually inculcating upon his reader these most amiable qualities, as the highest perfection of human nature, and the distinguishing glory of the Gospel—repeating, inculcating, and enforcing them in the most affectionate terms, by the most pathetic, persuasive, and artless eloquence, in a plain, honest, and affecting manner, that clearly discovers to us the probity and sincerity of the author's heart.||

GUIDE TO THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

1. This interesting and important record of the early history of the Christian church has had several titles. Oecumenius aptly termed it ‘The Gospel of the Holy Spirit’; and Chrysostom, as happily, ‘The Book, the Demonstration of the Resurrection’; titles much more descriptive of its contents than the one now generally given.

2. That the evangelist Luke was the author, is affirmed by the voice of antiquity, and also demonstrated from its introduction. His long attendance on Paul, as well as his having been an eye-witness of many of the occurrences he records, renders him a most respectable and credible historian. His medical knowledge enabled him to form a proper judgment of the miraculous cures performed by Paul, and also to give an accurate and authentic detail of them. But he himself does not appear to have possessed the power of healing by supernatural means; at least, no instances are on record: and when the father of Publius and other sick persons were suddenly cured, it was not by Luke, but by the prayers of Paul * — another proof of the wisdom of God; for had the physician been employed to work miracles of healing, the excellence of the power would have been attributed to the skill of man, and not to the power of his Maker.

3. The time of writing this book, though not expressly defined, may with some certainty be inferred; for the last ch. brings the history to the 2d year of Paul’s imprisonment, and therefore could not have been written before 63; and as it relates no further particulars of this apostle, whose history it chiefly regards in its latter part, the inference that it was written at this time is perfectly reasonable. [See Pref. to Ac.]

4. Not designing a general history, Luke passes by all the transactions in the church of Jerusalem, after the conversion of Paul, though the apostles continued for some time in Palestine. He also omits to notice the propagation of Christianity in Egypt, or in the countries bordering on the Euphrates and the Tigris; Paul’s journey into Arabia; the state of Christianity in Babylon (1 Pe. 5: 13); the foundation of the church at Rome, which had already received an Epistle from Paul; several of Paul’s voyages; and many other matters of which he could not possibly be ignorant, as may be seen in Lardner.† Here, therefore, as in the Gospels, a selection of facts, not regularly disposed in chronological order, was designed to serve for the evidence or illustration of certain important religious truths.

5. The two great points to which this selection of facts seems subservient are, that the Christian religion is of divine origin, and that it was intended for the benefit, not of the Jewish nation alone, but of every nation on earth. As peculiarly striking examples of this, reference may be made to the passages where are severally related the descent of the Holy Spirit on the apostles at the day of Pentecost, the vision of Peter, and the conversion of Paul (2:1-36, 10:9-11, 9:1-20), in which, while the miracles are fitted to prove the truth of the religion, in the cause of which they took place, the end or purpose of the miracles proclaims or prepares for its general propagation. On this supposition, there is a sufficient reason why the names of some of the apostles never occur throughout the book, and why so little is said of Peter and John; as it did not matter that the labors of this or of that apostle should be preserved, or that even a distinct history of the first propagation of Christianity should be composed. On any other supposition it would be difficult to explain why the work has not materials for this, as its title, early, but perhaps injudiciously prefixed, almost leads us to expect.‡

6. In addition to external evidences derived from the early and unbroken tradition of the Christian church, the most indubitable evidences of the truth of the book may be deduced from its style and composition. The language and manner of every speaker whose addresses it purports to give, are strikingly characteristic; and the same speaker is found to adapt his manner to the character of his audience. The speeches of Stephen, Peter, Cornelius, James, Tertullus, and Paul, are all different, and such as might naturally be expected from the characters in question, and their circumstances. The historical details, also, and especially the incidental circumstances mentioned by Luke, so exactly correspond, and that evidently without any design on the part of the writer, with the accounts furnished in Paul’s Epistles, and in ancient historians, as to afford the most incontrovertible evidences of its truth, and the strongest demonstration of the Christian religion.||

7. Although Luke has not annexed any dates to the transactions which he records, nor followed uninterruptedly the thread of the history, we may perceive more regularity and continuity in this work than in any of the Gospels. Indeed, in both his works, Luke has shown most apparently the design of defining within what period of the history of the world the gospel history is to be placed; for, by comparing some of his facts with the coincident facts in Roman history, he has enabled us with great accuracy to ascertain when the history in the N. T. begins and terminates. From these data Michaëlis has attempted to settle the chronology of this book, dividing the history into five epochs.¶ It will be evident, however, from an inspection of his scheme, and a careful perusal of the book itself, that the time occupied by the narrative cannot be so divided into distinct periods, within one or other of which each fact may with certainty be placed.

8. The following division, adopted by Bp. Percy, is, perhaps, the most just and useful. Part I. The account of the first Pentecost after Christ’s death, and of the events preceding it (1:2). II. The acts at Jerusalem, and throughout Judea and Samaria, among the Christians of the circumcision (3-9: 12). III. The acts in Caesarea, and the receiving of the Gentiles (10: 11). IV. The first circuit of Barnabas and Paul among the Gentiles (13: 14). V. The embassy from Antioch, and the first council at Jerusalem, wherein the Jews and Gentiles were admitted to an equality (15). VI. Paul’s 2d circuit (16-19). VII. Paul’s first journey to Rome (19: 21-28).

9. In Acts we see how the church of Christ was formed and settled. The apostles simply proclaim the truth of God relative to the passion, death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ, and God accompanies their testimony with the demonstration of his Spirit. What was the consequence? Thousands acknowledge the truth, embrace Christianity, and openly profess it at the imminent risk of their lives. The change is not a change of merely one religious sentiment or mode of worship for another; but a change of tempers, passions, prospects, and moral conduct. All before was earthly, or animal, or devilish, or all these together; but now all is holy, spiritual, and divine; the heavenly influence becomes extended, and nations are born unto God. And how was all this brought about? Not by might, nor power, nor by the sword, nor by secular authority, nor through worldly motives and prospects; not by pious frauds and cunning craftiness; not by the force of persuasive eloquence; in a word, by nothing but the sole influence of truth itself, attested to the heart by the power of the Holy Spirit.††

10. The style of Luke, in this book, is pronounced by Michaëlis to be much purer than that of most other books of the N. T., especially in the speeches delivered by Paul at Athens, and before the Roman governors, which contain passages superior to anything even in the Epistle to the Hebrews, though the language of this Epistle is preferable in other respects to that of any other book in the N. T. But the book is by no means free from Hebraisms; and even in the purest parts, which are the speeches of Paul, we still find the language of a native Jew.‡‡ There is here the same complete absence of labor and pomp, of every art to magnify and exalt, as characterizes the Gospels; there is a simplicity of design and diction which forcibly bespeaks the sincerity and fidelity of the writer, and makes the most powerful impression on the mind and heart.

CHAPTER IX.

OF THE EPISTLES OF PAUL.

SECTION I.

THE CONVERSION AND CHARACTER OF PAUL.

1. WHOEVER will be at the trouble of collecting together the scattered materials of the life and character of Paul, now dispersed up and down in the Acts, and in his own divinely-inspired Epistles, and then of steadily following out the thread of his history and labors, will rise from the task with a conviction that he was the most able, as he was also the most extraordinary, minister of the N. T. raised up by the great Head of the church. A most determined and implacable enemy to the cross of Christ, the ebullitions of whose wrath swept away in one common destruction ‘men and women’

— a bigoted and unrelenting persecutor, ‘breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord, and making havock of the church.’ — he was brought over from the ranks of the enemy, and became, not only an able preacher of the faith he had once destroyed, but its most steady and successful defender. The conversion of Paul to the faith of Christ was not the occasion of annihilating any of those striking features in his character which distinguished him while engaged in the work of destruction. It only brought them under the influence of principles which rendered them instruments of the most extensive and lasting good. Possessing a determination of purpose which no obstacles could thwart—a burning charity which no opposition could quench—and an ardent zeal which no suffering could subdue,—he united these moral qualities to an intellect of no ordinary kind, improved by accessions of almost every species of learning which was then cultivated; and consecrating the whole to the undivided service of his Lord, he became the most able expositor and the most successful defender of the Christian faith, in that or in any other age of the church.

2. To enter fully into the life of the great apostle of the Gentiles, would greatly exceed our limits. A very few remarks on his character and writings must suffice. The conversion of Paul has been justly regarded as affording a most convincing proof of the truth of the Christian religion. Lord Lyttleton considered this circumstance of itself a demonstration sufficient to prove Christianity to be a divine revelation; and, indeed, when we consider the character of Saul, the manner in which he was brought to a knowledge of the truth, the impression made on his own mind and heart by the vision he had on his way to Damascus, and the effect produced on all his subsequent life, we cannot reasonably resist this conclusion. Saul of Tarsus was not a man of a light, fickle, and uncultivated mind. His natural powers were vast; his character was most decided; and his education, as we learn from his historian and from his writings, was at once both liberal and profound. He was born and brought up in a city enjoying every privilege of which Rome itself could boast, and which was a successful rival both of Rome and Athens in arts and science. Though a Jew, it is evident that his education was not confined to matters that concerned his own people and country alone. He had read the best Greek writers, as his style, allusions, and quotations, sufficiently prove; and in matters which concern his own religion, he was instructed by Gamaliel, one of the most celebrated doctors the synagogue had ever produced. He was evidently master of the three great languages which were spoken among the only people who deserved the name of nations—the Hebrew, and its prevailing dialect, the Chaldeo-Syriac, the Greek, and the Latin—languages that, notwithstanding all the cultivation through which the earth has passed, maintain their rank over all the languages of the universe. Was it likely that such a man, possessing such a mind, cultivated to such an extent, could have been imposed upon or deceived? The circumstances of his conversion forbid the supposition; they do more—they render it impossible, as one consideration alone will prove: Saul had no communication with Christians; the men that accompanied him to Damascus were of his own mind, virulent, determined enemies to the very name of Christ; and his conversion took place in the open day, on the open road, in company only with such men as the persecuting high-priest and Sanhedrim thought proper to be employed in the extermination of Christianity. In such circumstances, and in such company, no cheat could be practised. But was not he the deceiver? The supposition is absurd and monstrous, for this simple reason, that there was no notice that could prompt him to feign what he was not, and no end that could be answered by assuming the profession of Christianity. Christianity had in it such principles as must excite the hatred of Greece, Rome, and Judea. It exposed the folly and absurdity of Grecian and Roman superstition and idolatry, and asserted itself to be the completion, end, and perfection of the whole Mosaic code. It was therefore hated by all those nations, and its followers despised, detested, and persecuted. From the profession of such a religion, so circumstanced, could any man, who possessed even the most moderate share of common sense, expect secular emolument or advantage? No! Had not this apostle of the Gentiles, therefore, the fullest conviction of the truth of Christianity, the fullest proof of its heavenly influence on his own soul, and the brightest prospect of the reality and blessedness of the heavenly world, he could not have taken one step in the path which the doctrine of Christ pointed out. Add to this, that he lived long after his conversion, saw Christianity and its influence in every point of view, and tried it in all circumstances. What was the result? The deepest conviction of its truth, so that he counted all things dross in comparison of the excellency of its knowledge. Had he continued a Jew, he would have infallibly risen to the first dignities and honors of his nation; but he willingly forfeited all his secular privileges and well-grounded expectations of secular honor and emolument, and espoused a cause from which he could not only have no expectation of worldly advantage, but which most evidently and necessarily exposed him to all sorts of privations, sufferings, hardships, dangers, and even death itself. These were not only the unavoidable consequences of the cause he espoused, but he had them fully in his apprehension, and constantly in his eye. He predicted them, and knew that every step he took was a progressive advance in additional sufferings, and that the issue of his journey must be a violent death! The whole history of Paul proves him to have been one of the greatest of men; and his conduct, after he became a Christian, had not sprung from a divine motive, of the truth of which he had the fullest conviction, would have shown him to have been one of the weakest of men. The conclusion, therefore, is self-evident, that in Paul's call there could be no imposition; that in his own mind there could be no deception; that his conversion was from heaven; and that the religion he professed and taught was the infallible and eternal truth of Jehovah. In this full conviction he counted not his life dear unto him, but finished his rugged race with joy, cheerfully giving up his life for the testimony of Jesus; and thus his luminous sun set in blood, to rise again in glory.¹ The conversion of Paul is the triumph of Christianity; his writings, the fullest exhibition and defense of its doctrines; and his life and death, a glorious illustration of its principles. Armed with the history of Paul's conversion and life, the feeblest believer needs not fear the most powerful infidel. The ninth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles will ever remain an impregnable fortress to defend Christianity, and defeat its enemies.*

3. Dr. Harwood thus characterizes Paul:—All his writings speak him a man of a most exalted genius, and the strongest abilities. His composition is peculiarly nervous and animated. He possessed a fervid conception, a glowing but chastised fancy, a quick apprehension, and a most immensely ample and liberal heart. Inheriting from nature distinguished powers, he carried the culture and improvement of them to the most exalted height to which human learning could push them; an excellent scholar, an acute reasoner, a great orator, a most instructive and spirited writer. Longinus classes the apostle among the most celebrated orators of Greece;† His speeches in the Acts of the Apostles‡ are worthy the Roman senate. They breathe a most generous fire and fervor, are animated with a divine spirit of liberty and truth, abounding with instances of an fine address as any of the most celebrated orations of Demosthenes or Cicero can boast; and his answers, when at the bar, to the questions proposed to him by the court, have a politeness and a greatness which hardly any thing in antiquity ever equalled. His writings show him eminently acquainted with Greek learning and Heb. literature. He greatly excelled in the profound and accurate knowledge of the O. T., which he is perpetually citing and explaining with great skill and judgment, and pertinently accommodating to the subject he is discussing. A negligent greatness, if I may so express it, appears in his writings. Full of the dignity of his subject, a torrent of sacred eloquence bursts forth, and bears down every thing before it with irresistible rapidity. He stays not to arrange and harmonize his words and his periods, but dashes on as his vast ideas transport him, borne away with the sublimity of his theme, and like Pindar, when seized with poetic inspiration, with strong pinions soars above the clouds, and far, far below, at an immense distance, leaves all mortal things. Hence his frequent and prolix digressions, though at the same time his comprehensive mind never loses sight of his subject, but he returns from these excursions, resumes and pursues it with an ardor and strength of reasoning that astonishes while it convinces. He introduces any subject which he is afraid will prejudice and disgust his countrymen, the Jews, with a humility and modesty that secures your attention, and with an insinuating form of address to which you can do nothing. Upon occasion, also, we find him employing the most keen and cutting railing in satirizing the faults and foibles of those to whom he wrote.¶

SECTION II.

PRELIMINARY REMARKS ON THE EPISTLES OF PAUL.

1. The Epistles of Paul form no inconsiderable part of the N. T., either in bulk or importance. His apostolic letters number 11; and in these every doctrine of the Christian system is discussed, amplified, illustrated, and defended, with the utmost success. Their importance will be immediately manifest when it is considered that they are commentaries on the Gospels. The apostle has not, as a recent writer has disingenuously intimated, introduced and taught doctrines not previously revealed by our Savior, and preserved in the Gospels; but, watching over the infant churches which had been established, and observing the rise and spread of error and abuse, he was induced, under the influence of divine inspiration, to exhibit in a variety of lights, and to illustrate by a number of methods, the several parts of that important system of doctrines which had already been laid down by his Lord and Master, for the purpose of preserving in the purity of the faith those who had made a profession of it, and of checking and putting down those mistaken or malignant men who exerted themselves in sullying the purity of the Christian scheme. The Epistles, then, fill their station as additional records, as inspired corroborations, as argumentative concentrations, as instructive expositions, of truths already revealed, of commandments already promulgated. In some few instances a new circumstance, collateral to an established doctrine, is added; as when Paul, in applying to the consolation of the Thessalonians the future resurrection of their departed friends, subjoins the intelligence that the dead in Christ shall served in the Acts, that he must have had a purer language at his command than he generally adopted in his writings. And the reason he did not compose in better Greek, he thinks, was to avoid giving offence to the Jews, by departing from a language already consecrated to the purposes of religion.—Introd. vol. i. p. 153.

rise first, to meet the Lord in the air, before the generation alive at the coming of our Savior shall exchange mortal life for immortality. In the explication of moral precepts, the Epistles frequently enter into large and highly-beneficial details. And as one of their principal objects at the time of their publication was to settle controversial dissensions, to refute heresies, and to expose perversions of scriptural truth, they in consequence abound in discussions illustrating the nature and the scope of sound doctrine, and guarding it against the false and mischievous interpretations of the ignorant, of the subtle, and of the unholy.*

2. Hence Paul's Epistles will generally be found controversial; first discussing and settling the questions of difference between the members of the churches to whom he wrote, or refuting the erroneous sentiments they had imbibed; and then applying the truths which had passed under review to the purposes of personal edification and holiness. There is not one of his inspired letters of a merely speculative character.

3. Their purpose, then, is to be learned by reading them with care; for an epistle may be made the vehicle of every species of information, and in all various ways. Every thing, whether of doctrine or precept, contained in them, has, more or less, the complexion of familiar letters, and is therefore more easy or difficult to be understood, according to the knowledge which may still be acquired of those contingencies, by which the train of thought in the mind of the writer must have been so much regulated. Sometimes, from the contingencies being preserved by collateral testimony, or incorporated with the allusions, we can read the Epistles with all, or more than all, the advantages of those to whom they were addressed. Sometimes it is easy to see that the train of thought has allusions to such contingencies as are now irrecoverably lost. But sometimes it is impossible to determine whether the train of thought has, or has not, any such allusions. This is particularly observable in the moral precepts with which the apostle Paul generally concludes his Epistles.†

4. It is admitted on all hands that the Epistles of Paul are the most difficult part of the N. T. This results in a great measure, as we have just shown, from the character of the writings themselves. But there are difficulties in the interpretation of these writings, resulting almost entirely from the peculiar manner and style in which the apostle has composed them. His numerous parentheses, and frequent change of person, without the least intimation of it, render a diligent and close attention requisite on our part, lest we mistake his meaning and object. But, as Macknight justly observes, the apostle always treats of some important article of faith, which, though not formally proposed, is constantly in his view, and is handled according to a preconceived plan, in which his arguments, illustrations, and conclusions, are all properly arranged. This the intelligent reader will easily perceive, if, in studying any particular Epistle, he keep the subject of it in his eye throughout. For thus he will be sensible that the things written are all connected with the subject in hand, either as proofs of what immediately goes before, or as illustrations of some proposition more remote; or as inferences from premises, sometimes expressed, and sometimes implied; or as answers to objections which, in certain cases, are not stated, perhaps, because the persons addressed had often heard them proposed. Nay, he will find that, on some occasions, the apostle adapts his reasoning to the thoughts which he knew would, at that instant, arise in the mind of his readers, and to the answers which he foresaw they would make to his questions, though these answers are not expressed. In short, on a just view of Paul's Epistles, it will be found that all his arguments are in point; that whatever incidental matter is introduced, contributes to the illustration of the principal subject; that his conclusions are all well founded; and that the whole is properly arranged.‡

5. We have the most convincing evidence of the genuineness and authenticity of the Epistles here attributed to Paul. The Acts of the Apostles and these writings, as we have before remarked, reciprocally elucidate and confirm each other; the Christian church from the beginning has attributed them to Paul, without dispute, except the Epistle to the Hebrews; and even those heretics, as the Cerinthians, Ebionites, and Marcionites, who have rejected their divine authority, have never ventured to deny that they were his genuine writings. The fathers have spoken of some other books which were attributed to the pen of this apostle; as the 'Acts of St. Paul,' the 'Travels of St. Paul and Theela,' an Epistle to the Laodiceans, and a 3d Epistle to the Corinthians. These, however, have always been deemed spurious by the church generally, and destitute of all marks of veracity. Eusebius does not notice them, while he affirms of those which we now possess (excepting that to the Hebrews), that they were universally acknowledged to be the work of St. Paul.§

6. With regard to Paul's quotations from the O. T., it is necessary to observe that they are generally taken from the Sept., at that time commonly used by the Jews. He sometimes unites many passages together, without distinguishing what is taken from one prophet, and what from another. At other times he gives the sense of a passage without regarding its exact language.|| We must discriminate, in the passages which he quotes from the O. T., between those that are only allusions and applications, and those mentioned as oracles, and which serve as proofs. Thus, when the apostle applies to justification by faith what Moses has said respecting the law, 'Say not in your hearts, Who shall ascend to heaven? &c.,' it cannot be imagined that this is a prophecy, of which he discovers the profound and concealed sense. It is a mere application of what has been said of the law to the gospel; but a very beautiful and just application. The same may be said of a citation from Ps. 19: 'Their words have gone out to the ends of the earth;' which was said of the stars, and is here applied to the ministers of the gospel.¶

7. In noticing the Epistles separately, we shall take them in their chronological order [given at end of Pref. to Epistles. Comp. Comm. vol. v. p. 172].

SECTION III.

EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS.

1. Some place its date as early as the year 43, and others as low as the year 53. The internal evidence afforded by the Epistle itself, as well as the general voice of antiquity, decide, we think, in favor of the early date; or, at least, for a date not later than 50 or 51; that is, very shortly after the council of Jerusalem (Ac. 15).

2. To understand its design we must notice the state of the church to which it was addressed. [See the Pref. to Gal.]

3. It appears, then, from the work itself, that not long after the Galatians had embraced the gospel, to which they had been converted by the personal preaching of Paul, certain Jewish Christians, zealous of the law of Moses, appeared among them, and taught that unless they were circumcised and kept the law, they could not be saved (5:2); and so successful were they in propagating this error, that some of the Galatians actually submitted to be circumcised. The principal arguments used by the seducers of the Galatians were the following: —

(1) That the apostles at Jerusalem, especially Peter, and the whole church at Jerusalem, considered circumcision as necessary; and that Paul was only a deputy from that church, his teaching and precepts being authoritative only so far as they agreed with its doctrine. That the former part of this assertion is false, appears both from Ac. 15:24, and from the first two chapters of the Epistle; and that the latter part is equally false, appears also from the Epistle, where Paul shows at large that he was neither a missionary from the church at Jerusalem, nor a disciple of the apostles, but an immediate apostle of Christ Himself; that the gospel which he preached was delivered to him by a divine revelation, and that its truth, therefore, by no means depended on its agreement with what the other apostles taught. It was absolutely necessary that Paul should be explicit on this subject, because, Galatia being at some distance from Palestine, the inhabitants of that country could be more easily deceived in respect to the doctrines which were taught by the apostles and elders at Jerusalem.

(2) But these false teachers further asserted 'that Paul had altered his opinion, and now preached the Levitical law' (1:18-10, 5:11). Perhaps they pleaded in support of this argument, that he had ordered Timothy to be circumcised shortly before his first visit to the Galatians (Ac. 16:3, comp. with Ga. 2:3). To these averments they added, 'that all the promises of God were made to the posterity of Abraham; and that whoever would partake of Abraham's blessing, must, like Abraham, be circumcised.' This objection Paul answers, 3:7-13.

(3) Lastly, they urged, 'that Isaiah had foretold an approaching conversion of the Gentiles, and had promised children to Zion, on Jerusalem, from among the heathen; and that, if the Gentiles desired to be children of Jerusalem, they ought to conform to the worship and ceremonies of that church.' In answer to this argument, Paul shows (4:19-31) that these children were promised, not to the Jewish, but to the ancient Jerusalem, where the true God was worshipped in the time of Melchizedek, without either temple or Levitical law.††

4. The Epistle divides into three parts: I. A vindication of Paul and his doctrine, showing that he derived his authority from Christ Himself, and was in no way inferior to the other apostles (ch. I); that he preached the same gospel as the other apostles (2:1-10); that his practice was consistent with his doctrine (v. 11-21). II. A series of proofs, drawn from the O. T., that the law had been abolished by Christ. Justification is only to be obtained by faith (3:1-5); the nature of the covenant made with Abraham proves this (v. 6-13); the design of the Mosaic law was not to disannul the promise, but to prepare men for its reception (v. 19-4:8); the Galatians repented for their defection from the gospel (v. 9-5:12). III. Practical inferences from the foregoing discussion. Cautions against abusing the doctrines of grace (v. 13-15); the works of the flesh and the fruits of the Spirit contrasted (v. 16-21); directions for the regulation of the Galatians' conduct towards each other (v. 23-6:10); the conclusion of the Epistle, with Paul's usual benediction (v. 11-18).

SECTION IV.

THE FIRST EPISTLE TO THE THESALONIANS.

1. Thessalonica was a large seaport town, situated on the Thermaic Gulf, and was the metropolis of all the countries comprehended in the province of Macedonia. It was distinguished for the number, the wealth, and the learning of its inhabitants. Paul visited this city immediately after leaving Philippi, and for three successive Sabbath-days entered into the synagogue, and reasoned with the Jews out of the Scriptures. His labors were not very successful in the conversion of his own countrymen; but of the religious proselytes a great multitude believed, among whom were many women of great distinction (Ac. 17:1). Among his converts, too, were many idolatrous Gentiles; which so excited the envy of the Jews, that, 'moved with indignation,' they employed 'certain lewd fellows of the baser sort,' who set the city in an uproar, assaulted the house of Jason, where the apostle lodged, dragged him and certain brethren before the rulers, and charged them with sedition and treason against the Roman emperor. The apostle's life being thus placed in danger, Paul and Silas were sent away by night, who, going to Berea, a neighboring city of distinction, there preached the gospel with great success. The persecuting Jews, however, following Paul to Berea, he was obliged to fly to Athens. Silas and Timothy remained behind at Berea, but with directions to follow Paul, who waited for them at Athens, as early as possible (Ac. 17:14, 15, 16). Their actual arrival there is not mentioned by Luke; but that they came there appears from 1 Th. 3:1, 2. Timothy, however, remained but a short time, being sent back to Thessalonica by Paul, who, before his return, had left Athens, and arrived at Corinth. The apostle had not been long at Corinth before Timothy returned from Thessalonica, and no doubt gave him such an account of the state of the church as convinced him that his presence was much needed in that city. The success with which he was then preaching the gospel in Corinth, however, rendered it improper for him to leave it at that time; he therefore wrote this Epistle to supply his place, about the end of A. D. 51.

2. With regard to the state of the church at Thessalonica, a knowledge of which is requisite to understand this Epistle, we may remark—(1) It consisted chiefly of Gentiles, the teachers mentioned in 5:12 being, probably, converts from Judaism; or at least such Greeks as had before been proselytes to the Jewish religion. (2) The church, being still in its infancy, and oppressed by the powerful Jews, required to be established in the faith. Paul, therefore, in the first 3 chs., endeavors to convince the Thessalonians of the truth and divinity of his gospel, both by the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit which had been imparted, and by his own conduct when among them. (3) An error prevailed with respect to the doctrine of the last judgment. The Thessalonians, like most of the primitive Christians, thought the day of judgment would happen in their time, and that those who lived to see it take place would have great advantage over the deceased faithful, which was probably to consist in their entering immediately on the millennium. This error is combated in ch. 4. (4) Some of the church, who refused to subject themselves to their teachers, had at the same time given themselves up to disorder; which they indulged under the pretence of teaching or edifying others: on this account the apostle gives the admonitions in 5:11—11.*

3. The Epistle is divided into 5 chs., viz. the introduction (1:1); a thanksgiving for the grace received by the Thessalonians (2:10); a declaration of the sincerity and love of the apostle and his fellow-laborers

(2:1-12); the effect produced at Thessalonica by their preaching (13-16); and their desire, care, and joy, on account of the converts (17-23, 3:1-13); an exhortation to grow in holiness (4:1-4); in brotherly love and industry (9-12); declarations concerning those that sleep, and those who shall be alive, at the coming of Christ (12-18); concerning the times (5:1-11); sundry exhortations (19-26); an adjuration for this Epistle to be read to all the brethren, and the usual benediction (v. 27, 28).

4. The importance of the following remarks, from Dr. Macknight's preface, justify their insertion:—

(1) In the opinion of the best critics and chronologers, this being one of the first inspired writings Paul addressed to the Greeks, whose philosophical genius led them to examine matters of science and opinion with the greatest accuracy, he very properly chose for the subject of it the proofs by which the gospel is shown to be a revelation from God. The reason is, by furnishing a clear and concise view of the evidences of the gospel, he not only confirmed the Thessalonians themselves in the faith thereof, as a revelation from God, but enabled them to persuade others also of its divine original; or, at least, he taught them how to confute their adversaries, who, by misrepresentations and false reasonings, endeavored to overthrow the gospel.

(2) The arguments proposed in this Epistle, for proving the divine original of the Christian revelation, are the four following:—(1) That many and great miracles were wrought by the preachers of the gospel, professedly for the purpose of demonstrating that they were commissioned by God to preach it to the world. —(2) That the apostles and their assistants, by preaching the gospel, brought upon themselves, every where, all manner of present evils, without obtaining the least worldly advantage, either in possession or in prospect; that in preaching this new doctrine, they did not, in any respect, accommodate it to the prevailing inclinations of their hearers, nor encourage them in their vicious practices; that they used none of the base arts peculiar to impostors for gaining belief; but that their manner of preaching and acting was, in all respects, suitable to the character of missionaries from God; so that, on account of their personal character, they were entitled to the highest credit as teachers. —(3) That the first preachers of the gospel delivered to their disciples, from the very beginning, precepts of the greatest strictness and holiness; so that by the sanctity of its precepts, the gospel is shown to be a scheme of religion every way worthy of the true God, and highly beneficial to mankind. —(4) That Jesus, the Author of our religion, was declared to be the Son of God, and the Judge of the world, by his resurrection from the dead; and that by the same miracle, his own promise, and the predictions of his apostles concerning his return from heaven, to reward the righteous and punish the wicked, especially them who obey not his gospel, are rendered absolutely certain.

(3) In setting forth the proofs of the divine original of the gospel, the apostle with great propriety insisted, in a particular manner, on the character, behavior, and views of the Christian preachers; because an argument of that kind could not fail to have great weight with the Greeks, as it made them sensible that the ministers of the gospel were the very reverse of their philosophers, the only teachers to whom that intelligent and inquisitive people had hitherto listened. Wherefore we shall not be mistaken, if we suppose that, in describing the character, manners, and views of the Christian teachers, the writer of this Epistle tacitly contrasted himself, not only with impostors in general, but with the Greek philosophers in particular, who, though in high estimation with the people, were many of them unprincipled impostors, and excessively debauched in their morals.

5. To the arguments offered in this Epistle, in proof of the gospel revelation, little can be added, except what arises from the fulfillment of the prophecies of the O. T.; and therefore the very same arguments have often, since the apostle's days, been urged by those who have undertaken the defence of the Christian religion. But it is proper to remark, that in the mouth of Paul and his assistants these arguments have double weight; for it is not the miracles, the character, and the precepts of other persons which they have appealed to, but their own. And as in this Epistle they have affirmed, in the most direct terms, that the Thessalonians were eye-witnesses of the miracles which were wrought for the confirmation of the gospel, and that they knew the sanctity both of the apostles' manners and of their precepts, no doubt can be entertained of these things. For it is not to be supposed, that three men of common understanding would have joined in writing after this manner, to such numerous societies as the Thessalonian church, and the other churches in which they ordered this Epistle to be read, unless the things which they affirm to have been done in their presence had really been true. And if they are true, there can be no doubt that Paul and his assistants were commissioned of God; and that the gospel which they preached is of divine original, and of universal obligation.

SECTION V.

THE SECOND EPISTLE TO THE THESALONIANS.

1. The contents of this Epistle plainly show it to have been written very soon after the former one. It was written from the same place; and the same brethren—Silvanus and Titus—are both mentioned in the introduction. From 3:2, it seems it was written a little before or a little after the insurrection of the Jews at Corinth, when Paul was dragged before Gallio (Ac. 18:12), as he there seems either to apprehend or anticipate this violence, or else prays to be delivered from these unbelieving and unreasonable persecutors. We may, therefore, assign it to the year 52.

2. The writing of this Epistle appears to have been occasioned by the misrepresentation which some among the Thessalonians had made of certain expressions of the apostle in his former letter. The language which he had adopted in chap. 4 of that Epistle, taken literally, would imply that he included himself in the number of those who should remain alive at the last day. This turn of the expression naturally arose from the strong hold that the expectation of the thing, in its due season, had taken of the writer's imagination, and from his full persuasion of the truth of the doctrine he was asserting—namely, that those who should before the Lord's coming, and those who should then be alive, would find themselves quite upon an even footing. In the confident expectation of his own reward, his intermediate dissolution was a matter of so much indifference to him, that he overlooks it. His expression, however, was so strong, that his meaning was mistaken, or, as we have before said, misrepresented. There appears to have been a set in the apostolic age which looked for the resurrection in their own time. Some of these persons seem to have taken advantage of the apostle's expressions, to represent him as favoring their opinion. To correct this error was his present object; and he therefore peremptorily decides against the doctrine, and desires that no expression of his may be understood as giving it countenance.[†]

3. To convince them that such an expectation was unfounded, he assures them, in the most express terms, that before the day of the Lord there will be a great apostasy in the church; that the man of sin will be revealed; * that he will oppose and exalt himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; and that he will sit, or continue a long time in the church, as God.†

4. The Epistle consists of 3 chs., and contains the inscription (1:1-2); thanksgiving and prayer for the Thessalonians (3-12); the doctrine concerning the man of sin (2:1-12); the Thessalonians comforted against this trial (13,14); exhortation and prayer (v. 15-35); directions to correct the disorderly (6-16); and the conclusion (v. 17,18).

SECTION VI.

THE EPISTLE TO TITUS.

1. This Epistle, as Michaelis observes, might not improperly be called an Epistle to the Cretans; for the design of it was not so much to instruct Titus in matters which he must have known without it, as to put into his hands an order, which he might lay before the Cretans, and to which he might appeal whenever unworthy and unqualified persons attempted to intrude into the pastoral office. Its contents are nearly of the same kind as those of 1 Ti. The churches of Crete were hitherto without bishops; Titus, therefore, was ordered to appoint them, and at the same time was cautioned against some who were of the circumcision, and who endeavored to procure for themselves the ecclesiastical offices.

2. From Ga. 2:3 we learn that Titus was a Greek, and was probably converted to Christianity by Paul, though the time of his conversion is not known. It has been thought remarkable, that Luke has not once mentioned his name throughout the Acts, though Paul frequently mentions him in his Epistles. But Luke's silence will cease to be extraordinary, when we consider the period in which Titus attended Paul. He was present with the apostle at three different times — First, on the journey to Jerusalem, described Ac. 15:, as Paul states in express terms (Ga. 2: 1-3). But in this instance, though Luke has not mentioned him by name, he has included him under the general expression, 'several other of them' (Ac. 15:2); i. e. of the Gentile converts. From this period, judging from Paul's Epistles, some time must have elapsed before Titus was again with him; but in 2 Co. he is frequently mentioned, where it appears that he had been with the apostle at Ephesus, and was sent from that city to Corinth. Paul, on his own departure from Ephesus, expected to meet Titus again at Troas, but was disappointed (2 Co. 2:12, 13); for he did not meet with him till his arrival in Macedonia (7:6-13), whence he was sent again with a new commission to Corinth. Now, these engagements of Titus occurred during the period in which Luke was absent from Paul; † and this accounts for his silence with regard to the transactions of Titus, as also of many transactions of Paul, which took place in the interval. When Luke again joined company with Paul, Titus does not appear to have been with him, so that these two Gentile converts attended the apostle, perhaps, alternately. The third and last time that we find Titus with Paul, was shortly before 2 Ti. was written, in which the apostle says (4:10), that Titus had departed for Dalmatia.§

3. Michaelis and Dr. Hales refer the publication of this Epistle to the year 53; and their hypothesis appears to be much strengthened by the consideration, that there is no allusion to Paul's suffering or approaching death, to his age or imprisonment; all of which things are frequently mentioned in those Epistles which we have more decided reason for referring to a late period of the apostle's life. It has been said, that the verbal harmony subsisting between this Epistle and 1 Ti. cannot be naturally accounted for, but by supposing that they were both written about the same time, and while the same ideas and phrases were present to the author's mind. But is it not natural to expect such coincidences, when they were both written on similar occasions, and for similar purposes?

4. This Epistle has 3 chs., containing the inscription (1:1-4); instructions for Titus to ordain good presbyters (5-9); to reprove and admonish the Cretans, taking care to be himself an example of good works (10-16); to teach aged men and women their respective duties (2:1-8), and urge adequate upon servants and magistrates (v. 9-3:7); directions to maintain good works, avoid foolish questions, and shun heretics (3-11); an invitation of Titus to Nicopolis, with some admonitions (12-14); and the conclusion (v. 15).

5. Upon a review of this and the two Epistles to Timothy, it is natural to reflect how much they tend to illustrate and confirm the internal evidence of Christianity. It has often been observed, and very justly, that nothing sets the character of great men in so true a light as their letters to their particular friends. While they are acting in the eye of the world, they frequently appear in disguise, and the real motives of their conduct lie out of sight; but in their familiar correspondence they open their minds with freedom, and throw off all reserve. If, therefore, any should object to the argument drawn from Paul's Epistles to the churches, that, as they were designed for the public view, he would be upon his guard, not to let any expressions escape him that might give the world an unfavorable idea of himself, or the cause in which he was engaged; yet certainly, when he is writing, as in this and the other Epistles referred to, to his most intimate friends, who were embarked with him in the same design, and with whom, therefore, he could use the utmost confidence, we may reasonably expect to find him disclosing his real sentiments, stripped of all artifice and disguise. And now, upon the most accurate and impartial examination of these Epistles, what do we discover? Can we trace any marks of insincerity or imposture? Does the apostle wear any other character than that in which he had appeared to the whole world? Does he drop the least hint that can lead one, so much as to suspect that he had been only acting a part, and imposing upon mankind? Can we perceive the least shadow of inconsistency between the views he gives of religion in these and in his other writings? Is there any thing like that double doctrine which some have charged upon the ancient philosophers? On the contrary, is it not most evident that he founded his own hopes and formed his own character upon the very same principles which he recommended to others? that he had no views of secular interest or ambition to gratify, and was influenced by no other motives than those which he openly avowed in the face of the world? in a word, that his character, as well as his doctrine, was consistent and uniform, and his inward sentiments the same as his outward profession? The instructions he gives his friends for the exercise of their office had nothing of art or subtlety, but were all plain and simple, and centred in that grand design of advancing the interests of religion and the happiness of mankind, which ever lay near his heart; and so far is he from flattering them with the prospect of any worldly advantage, that he exhorts them to be ready, after his example, to sacrifice every temporal interest, and even life itself, in the cause they had undertaken to support.

6. If this be allowed to be a just representation of the case, it will certainly follow, that the apostle was himself thoroughly persuaded of the truth and importance of those doctrines he had taught; and since it may be easily proved, that the evidence on which he built his faith was of such a nature as to exclude all possibility of mistake, we may safely conclude, upon the credit of his testimony alone (had we no other arguments to produce), that the Christian religion is not a cunningly-devised fable, formed to answer the ambitious or interested views of its authors, but that it is, indeed, the power of God, and the wisdom of God.||

SECTION VII.

THE FIRST EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

1. The date is ascertained from internal evidence. Paul, on leaving Corinth, where he was engaged in establishing a Christian church, and where he wrote his two Epistles to the Thessalonians, proceeded to Asia, and visited Ephesus, Jerusalem, and Antioch; and then, passing through Galatia and Phrygia, returned to Ephesus, where he remained 3 years. Towards the close of this residence at Ephesus, he wrote this Epistle, as appears from 16:8, where he says, 'I will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost.' Hence the subscription which states it to have been written at Philippi, is erroneous. And that it was written at the preceding passover appears from 5:7, 'Ye are unleavened,' i. e. 'ye are now celebrating the feast of unleavened bread.' Paul's departure from Ephesus being in the year 57, this Epistle must consequently have been written at that time.

2. Corinth was the residence of many Jews, as we find from Ac. 18:4, and to them Paul, on his visiting this place, first addressed himself; but finding their opposition to the gospel unremitting, he turned to the Gentiles (v. 7), of whom the church was principally composed. On Paul's departure from Corinth, he was succeeded by Apollos, who preached the gospel with great success (v. 21-28); to whom may be added Aquila and Sosthenes (v. 3. 1 Co. 1:1). False teachers, however, soon arising, the peace of the church was disturbed, and great disorders ensued. Some Gentile converts set themselves up for teachers, confounding the Christian doctrine with their own philosophical speculations, and, out of respect to the oratory of Apollos, called themselves his disciples. On the other hand, some of the Jewish converts contended strenuously for the observance of the Mosaic ceremonies, and styled themselves the followers of Cephas, that is, Peter, the apostle of the circumcision; while many of the native Corinthian unbelievers still continued addicted to that uncleanness and lasciviousness which had been common to them in their heathen state. Two factions were raised in the church; and the apostle was called upon to fight against Jewish superstition, heathen licentiousness, and all the sepulchre of human learning, which were alike leagued against him, derrogating from his authority. On hearing of the lamentable state of his newly-established church, it appears that the apostle sent Erasmus and Timothy to the Corinthians, as his messengers and fellow-labourers in the gospel, intending shortly to visit them himself (Ac. 19:22); but before he could accomplish this, he received messengers from Corinth, with a letter from the church, requesting his advice and directions on various subjects, which had been the occasion of so many animosities and divisions among them (1 Co. 7:1, 16,17), and on which those who remained steadfast to him were anxious to obtain his opinion. In answer to these applications, this Epistle seems to have been written.||

3. This Epistle has been variously divided: the following particulars comprise the whole subject-matter: The introduction (1:1-9); exhortations relative to the dissensions of the Corinthians (v. 10-4:10); concerning the person who had married his step-mother, commonly called the incestuous person (5); concerning the unlawfulness of going to law before unbelievers, and the duty of being entirely separate from them (6); concerning marriage and virginity (7); the question concerning the lawfulness of eating things that had been offered to idols (8). The apostle shows his liberty, affirms his right to a maintenance, which he generously foregoes, and then points out the motives by which he was animated in his course (9). From this he takes occasion to advert to some of the typical events in the Jewish history, which are proposed for our instruction, and concludes with some directions for our conduct in things of an indifferent nature (10); various ecclesiastical regulations concerning public worship, the Lord's supper, and the exercise of spiritual gifts, which give occasion to an animated discourse on charity (11-14); the important question concerning the resurrection of the dead (15); miscellaneous matters, containing exhortations, salutations, commendations, &c. (16).

In ch. 9, there are evident allusions to the Isthmian games, which were celebrated every 5th year on the isthmus, or narrow neck of land, which joins the Peloponnesus, or Morea, to the main land, and with which, therefore, the Corinthians were well acquainted. As a knowledge of the exercises in these games will materially illustrate the apostle's expressions, we have drawn up an account [at the end of 1 Co. 9].

SECTION VIII.

THE FIRST EPISTLE TO TIMOTHY.

1. The person to whom Paul addressed this letter was a native of Lystra, a city of Lycania, in Asia Minor. His father was a Gentile, but his mother was a pious Jewess, who carefully and diligently instructed his infant mind in the truths of the O. T. (Ac. 16:1-3, 2 Ti. 1:5). On visiting Lystra a second time, the apostle found Timothy, then a youth, an exemplary and zealous member of the Christian church. His piety and talents induced the apostle to take him as his companion in his travels, and as a joint laborer in publishing the gospel of Jesus Christ. To conciliate the prejudices of the Jews, and, indeed, to obtain from them, both for Timothy and himself, a hearing, in the work of their ministry, the young evangelist was circumcised under the direction of the apostle (Ac. 16:1-3), and after the imposition of hands (1 Ti. 1:1), he accompanied him and Silas in their apostolic mission, and never afterwards left Paul, except when sent by him on some special errand.

2. The date of this Epistle has been a subject of much controversy; some assigning it to the years 56, 57, or 58, which is the common opinion; and others to 61 or 65. We have adopted, with Dr. Doddridge, the hypothesis that it was written about the year 57 or 58, when Paul had lately quitted Ephesus on account of the tumult raised there by Demetrius, and was gone into Macedonia (Ac. 20:1). This is the opinion of many learned critics, ancient and modern, particularly of Athanasius, Theodoret, Baronius, Lodovic Cappellos, Blondel, Hammond, Grotius, Salmasius, Lightfoot, Benson, Lord Barrington, Michaelis, and others. On the other hand, Bp. Pearson, and, after him, Rosenmüller, Macknight, Paley, Bp. Tomline, &c., endeavor to prove that it could not be written till the year 61 or 65, between the first and second imprisonment of Paul at Rome; and L'Enfant, without any hesitation, goes into this hypothesis. To this late date, however, there are three objections:

(1) If it was written after the apostle's release, he could not with any propriety have said to Timothy (4:12), 'Let no man despise thy youth.'

(2) When the apostle touched at Miletus, in his voyage to Jerusalem with the collections, the church at Ephesus had a number of elders, that is, of bishops and deacons, who came to him at Miletus (Ac. 20:17); what occasion, then, was there, in an Epistle written after the apostle's release, to give Timothy directions concerning the ordination of bishops and deacons, in a church where there were so many elders already?

(3) Dr. Paley defends the later date, from the superscription of 2 Co., which is spurious, from the apparently short interval between Paul's leaving Ephesus, to go into Macedonia, and the writing of 2 Co., in the beginning of which Timothy is joined with Paul. But to this it may be answered, that Timothy might have left Ephesus for a short time only. Besides, arguments of this theoretical nature ought to weigh but little against a proposition which seems opposed to the plain and literal meaning of Scripture.

3. Michaelis has endeavored to prove that this Epistle was principally written against the Essenes, or Therapeutae; but his references do not appear to support his hypothesis. These people, even if they sometimes came into towns, could not have been there in sufficient numbers to endanger the faith of the Christian communities. They were, no doubt, included among the various false teachers whom Paul condemned; but they were not the exclusive objects of his censure.

4. Though the errors of the Judaizing teachers in Ephesus, which gave rise to Paul's Epistles to Timothy, have long ago disappeared, the Epistles themselves are still of great use, as they serve to show the impiety of the principles from which these errors proceeded. The same principles are apt, in every age, also, to produce errors and vices, which, though different in name from those that prevailed in Ephesus in the apostle's days, are precisely of the same kind, and equally pernicious. These Epistles are also of great use in the church, as they exhibit to Christian bishops and deacons, in every age, the most perfect idea of the duties of their function; teach the manner in which these duties should be performed; describe the qualifications necessary in those who aspire to such holy and honorable offices; and explain the ends for which the offices were originally instituted, and are still continued in the church.

5. The very same things, indeed, the apostle had before written to Titus in Crete; but more briefly, because Titus was an older and more experienced minister than Timothy. Nevertheless, the repetition of these precepts and charges is not without its use to the church still, as it makes us more deeply sensible of their great importance; not to mention that in the Epistle to Titus there are things peculiar to itself, which enhance its value. In short, the Epistles to Timothy and Titus taken together, containing a full account of the qualifications of the duties of the ministers of the gospel, may be considered as a complete body of divinely-inspired ecclesiastical canons, to be observed by Christian ministers of all communions, to the end of the world.

6. These Epistles, therefore, ought to be read frequently, and with the greatest attention, by those in every age and country who hold sacred offices, or who have it in view to obtain them; not only that they may regulate their conduct according to the directions contained in them, but that by meditating seriously on the solemn charges delivered to all the ministers of the gospel, in the persons of Timothy and Titus, their minds may be strongly impressed with a sense of the importance of their function, and of the obligation which lies on them to be faithful in discharging every duty belonging to it.

7. This Epistle contains six chapters, comprising the introduction (1:1,2); instructions to Timothy how to behave at Ephesus, with reference both to his own ministry and to the legalizing teachers (v. 3-11); a confirmation of the sum of the gospel as exemplified in the person of the apostle (v. 12-20); particular directions relative to prayer (2:1-3);—good works (9-15);—the qualifications of a bishop (3:1-7); the duties of deacons (v. 8-13); further instructions to Timothy, relative to his teaching (v. 14-15);—his personal conduct (v. 7-16);—and pastoral duties (5). Concerning servants, false teachers, and riches (6:1-10). The concluding charge to Timothy (v. 11-21).

SECTION IX.

THE SECOND EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

1. This Epistle is supposed to have been written about a year after the former one to the same church; and the hypothesis appears to be supported by the words, 'Achaia was ready a year ago' (9:2); for the apostle having given instructions for that collection to which he refers in these words, at the close of the preceding Epistle, they would not have had the 'forwardness' there mentioned, till a year had elapsed. As he had purposed to stay at Ephesus till Pentecost (1 Co. 16:8), but staid some time in Asia after his purpose to leave this city, and go to Macedonia (Ac. 9:21,22), and yet here makes his apology for not wandering in Corinth, as he thought to do (1 Co. 16:5), the Epistle must have been written after the winter; and consequently when a new year was begun. It therefore seems to have been written after his second coming into Macedonia, mentioned in Ac. 20:3. For, (1) it was written after he had been at Troas, and had left that place to return to Macedonia a second time (2:12). (2) It was written when Timothy was with him; not sent before him (Ac. 19:22); and this was at his second going through Macedonia (Ac. 20:4). (3) He speaks of some Macedonians, who were likely to accompany him (1 Co. 9:1); and at his second leaving Macedonia, there accompanied him Aristarchus, Secundus, and Gaius of Thessalonica, the metropolis of Macedonia (Ac. 20:4). (4) The postscript says, that it was written from Philippi, where Paul was till the days of unleavened bread (Ac. 20:5); it therefore seems to have been sent from thence to them, by Titus and some other person, not long before Paul's coming to them; which he speaks of as instant (13:1); and that which he was now ready to do (12:14). This he did, according to Lightfoot, in his journey from Philippi to Corinth, to make good his promise; while the rest who were with him (Ac. 20:4) went direct to Troas, and there waited for him.

2. From the contents of this Epistle it is evident that it was occasioned by the accounts the apostle had received of the reception and effects of the former one. Titus, who carried the first letter to Corinth, having made himself acquainted both with the sincere part of the church and with the state of the disaffected party, gave the apostle a particular account of their whole proceedings. Paul, therefore, in this second letter skilfully introduces the arguments, objections, and scoffing speeches, by which the faction were endeavoring to bring him into contempt; and not only confutes them by the most solid reasoning, but even turns them against the false teacher himself, and against the faction, in such a manner as to render them ridiculous. But while he thus pointedly derides the faction and its leaders, Paul bestowed just commendations on the sincere part of the church for their perseverance in the doctrines he had taught them, and for their ready obedience to his orders concerning the incestuous person. And to encourage them, he states that, having boasted of them to Titus, he was glad to find his boasting well founded in every particular.

3. Paul himself has directed us to distinguish the sincere part of the Corinthians from the faction (1:11). 'Ye have acknowledged us in part,' i. e. a part of you have acknowledged that we are your boasting (2:5); 'Now, if a certain person hath grieved me, he hath not grieved me, except by a part of you, that I may not lay a load on you all.' It is therefore plain that the matters in the two Epistles to the Corinthians, which appear inconsistent, are not really so, as they belong to different persons; thus every appearance of contradiction vanishes.*

4. This Epistle contains the preface (1:1-7); an account of the persecution which the apostle had suffered in Asia, and from which he had been miraculously rescued (8-11); his purpose to visit Corinth (15-21); concerning the sorrow the Corinthians had suffered, on account of the excommunication of the incestuous person (2:7); his own vindication against the false apostle; in which he gives an account of his doctrine (3:6-13); his conduct (1:1-6), and his bodily infirmities (1:7-5); exhortations to a holy life (6:7); of the alms that had been collected, and were yet to be collected (3:9); his defense against the false apostle and his calumniators in general (10-12); miscellaneous matters (13).†

SECTION X.

THE EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.

1. It is now impossible to ascertain at what time or by whose ministry the gospel was introduced into Rome. In support of the opinion that Christianity was planted there by the apostle Peter, no argument can be adduced; but the probability is decidedly against it, both from the silence of the Acts of the Apostles, and also of Paul in this Epistle. The same may be said of the opinion that the church of Rome was founded by the joint labors of Peter and Paul; for it is evident from 1:13, &c., that the latter had not at this time visited that city.

2. The reader will recollect that, on the day of Pentecost, there were present at Jerusalem 'strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes'; and it is quite natural to suppose that they, on their return, would relate the extraordinary transactions they had witnessed, as connected with the miraculous effusion of the Holy Spirit; and by a testimony similar to that borne by the apostles in other parts of the world, lay the foundation of a Christian society. Against this reasoning there is nothing to oppose, and it is every way more reasonable than either of the two opinions above referred to.

3. Dr. Paley, with his usual ability, has demonstrated the genuineness and authenticity of this Epistle, and its existence in the ancient Ante-hieronymian Versions, and the Syriac, as well as its being referred to by the apostolic fathers, Barnabas, Clement of Rome, Ignatius, and Polycarp.

4. There have been some doubts concerning the language in which this Epistle was written. Bolten and Berthold endeavor to prove that Paul wrote it in Aramaic, and that it was translated into Greek by Tertius, who acted as the apostle's amanuensis (16:22); but this supposition has been amply refuted by Griesbach. Others think that it must have been written originally in Latin, the language of the people to whom it was addressed. But this opinion appears, from the following considerations, to be as destitute of foundation as the former: — First, the voice of antiquity refers it to a Greek original; Secondly, the universal cultivation of the Greek language at the time of its publication; and, Thirdly, the familiarity of the Jews, for whose use it was primarily designed, with the Sept., which afforded them many facilities for understanding the apostle writing in the same language, and which they would not have possessed had he written in Latin.

5. Concerning the design of the Epistle, there has been much controversy—a remarkable circumstance, as the apostle's object appears to be clearly pointed out in the Epistle itself. It seems that he had been apprized of all the circumstances of the Christians at Rome, by Aquila and Priscilla, and by other Jews, who had been expelled from the city by the decree of Claudius (Ac. 13:2); and finding that the church at Rome was composed partly of converted heathens and partly of Jews who had, with much remaining prejudice, embraced the gospel, and that many contentions arose from the claims of the Gentile converts to equal privileges with the Jews, and from the absolute refusal of the Jews to concede these rights unless the Gentiles submitted to circumcision, he wrote to adjust and settle their differences.‡

6. To understand the apostle's reasoning properly, we must briefly notice the erroneous notions that were entertained by the Jewish people concerning justification, and the election of their own nation.

(1) Of Justification. Of this the Jews assumed three grounds: First, 'The extraordinary piety and merits of their ancestors, and the covenant made by God with those holy men.' They conceived that God could not hate the children of such pious parents; and that as He had made a covenant with them in which He promised to bless their posterity, He was by this covenant obliged to pardon their sins. Secondly, 'The knowledge which they had of God through the law of Moses, and their diligent study of that law.' This advantage they estimated so highly as to make it a plea for the remission of their sins. Thirdly, 'The works of the Levitical law,' which were to expiate sin. Among these works they reckoned sacrifices to which God had promised remission of sins, and circumcision. The inference which they deduced from the preceding doctrines is obvious; namely, that they had much easier access to justification than the Gentiles; and that these, if they wished to be justified and saved, must receive the law of Moses.

(2) Of Electio. Concerning this, the Jewish doctrine was, that 'in the promise which God made to Abraham to bless his seed — to give it, not only the spiritual blessing, but also the land of Canaan, and to consider it as his church upon earth' — the whole nation was included, and that God was therefore bound to fulfil these promises to every Jew, as being a descendant of Abraham, whatever his principles or whatever his conduct might be. They even believed that a prophet ought not to pronounce against their nation the prophecies with which he was inspired; but was rather to beg of God to blot his name out of the book of the living.

7. In this important, though in some respects difficult, Epistle, the object then seems to be, to place the Gentile converts upon a parity of situation with the Jewish, in respect of their religious condition, and their rank in the divine favor; to fix upon the mind of both Jew and Gentile a deep sense of the excellency of the gospel, and to engage them to act in a manner agreeable to their profession of it. For this purpose, after a general salutation (1:1-7), and a profession of his ardent affection for them (v. 8-15), he declares that he shall not be ashamed openly to maintain the gospel at Rome; for this general reason, that it is the great and powerful instrument of salvation, both to Jews and Gentiles, by means of faith (v. 16, 17). And then, to demonstrate and vindicate its excellency in this view of it, the apostle shows, (1) That the world greatly needed such a dispensation; the Gentiles being fallen into a most abandoned state (v. 18 to end), and the Jews, though condemning others, being themselves no better (2), as, notwithstanding some cavils, which he obviates (3:1-8), their own Scriptures testify (v. 9-19); so that there was a universal necessity of seeking for justification and salvation in this method (v. 20 to end). (2) That Abraham and David themselves sought justification in such a way as the gospel recommends, i. e. by faith (1:1-12); and that a very illustrious act of it entitled everlasting honor on that great patriarch from whom the Jews boasted their descent (v. 13 to end). (3) That hereby believers are brought into so happy a state as turns the greatest afflictions of life into an occasion of joy (5:1-11). (4) That the calamities brought on the seed of the first Adam, by his ever-to-be-lamented fall, are with glorious advantage repaired to all who by faith become interested in the second Adam (v. 12 to end). (5) That, far from dissolving our obligations to practical holiness, the gospel greatly increases them by peculiar obligations (6:1-14), which he strongly urges upon them (v. 15 to end).

8. By these general considerations, Paul illustrates the excellency of the gospel, in the first six chs. of his Epistle.

9. To make the Jews more sensible how glorious a dispensation this was, and to weaken their attachment to the Mosaic law, now they were married to Christ by a solemn profession of his religion (7:1-6), the apostle largely represents how comparatively ineffectual the motives of the law were to produce those degrees of obedience and holiness which by a lively faith in the gospel we obtain (7:7-8:2). And in the remaining part of the ch. he gives a more particular view of those things which rendered the gospel so much more efficacious for this great purpose — that of forming the soul to holiness — than the legal economy had been (8:3); the discovery it makes of the incarnation and death of Christ (v. 3:4); the spirituality of temper to which it calls us (v. 5-8); the communication of the sanctifying and comforting influences of the Spirit of God, by which true believers are formed to filial temper (v. 9-17); the views which it exhibits of a state of glory, so great and illustrious that the whole creation seemed to wait for the manifestation of it (v. 18-25); while in the mean time believers are supported under all their trials by the aids of the Spirit (v. 26, 27); and an assurance that all events should cooperate for their advantage (v. 28), since God has, in consequence of his eternally glorious plan, already done so much for us (v. 29, 30); which unbundles us to conclude that no accusation shall prevail against us, and no temptations or extremities separate us from his love (v. 31 to end).

10. As the blessings so affectionately displayed above had been spoken of as the peculiar privileges of those who believed the gospel, this evidently implied, that as all believing Gentiles had a full share in them, so all unbelieving Jews must necessarily be excluded from them. But as the calling of the Gentiles and the rejection of the Jews was a topic of great importance, the apostle employs the ninth, tenth, and eleventh chs. in the discussion of it, and so concludes the argumentative part of his Epistle. He introduces what he had to say on this interesting subject, by declaring that he thought most honorably and affectionately of the Jewish nation (9:1-5); and then shows, (1) That the rejection of a considerable part of the seed of Abraham, and even of the posterity of Isaac, was an incontestable fact, which the Jews themselves could not deny, with respect to the descendants of Ishmael and Esau (v. 6-13). (2) That the sovereign choice of some individuals to peculiar privileges, to which none had any claim, and the sovereign appointment of some, from among many criminals, to peculiar and exemplary punishment, was perfectly consistent both with reason and Scripture (v. 14-21). (3) That the taking of the Gentiles to be God's peculiar people when Israel should be rejected, had been actually foretold, by both Hosea and Isaiah (v. 22 to end). (4) That God has graciously offered the gospel salvation to Jews and Gentiles on the same equitable and easy terms; though Israel, by a bigoted attachment to their own law, had rejected

‡ This agrees with Hug, who supposes that the apostle seeks to reconcile the differences between the Jewish and Gentile Christians; and animadverts upon the arrogant pretensions which they respectively made.

ace to the Romans.

it (ch. 10). (5) That, nevertheless, the rejection of Israel, though according to our own prophecies it be general, and attended with astonishing blindness and obstinacy, yet is not total, there still being a number of happy believers among them (11:1-10). (6) That the rejection of the rest is not final; but that the time shall come when, to the unspeakable joy of the whole Christian world, the Jews shall in the body be brought into the church of Christ (v. 11-31). (7) And lastly, that in the mean time their obstinacy and rejection are overruled to such happy purposes, as serve, through the whole various scene, to display, in a glorious manner, the unsearchable wisdom of God (v. 32 to end)."

II. The remainder of the Epistle is taken up in a variety of practical instructions and exhortations, which hardly admit of, and indeed do not need, such a particular analysis. The grand design of the whole is, to engage Christians to act in a manner worthy of that gospel, the excellency of which he had been illustrating. The apostle more particularly urges an entire consecration to God, and a care to glorify Him in their respective stations, by a faithful improvement of their several talents (12:1-11); devotion, patience, hospitality, mutual sympathy, humility, peace, and meekness (v. 12 to end); and in the thirteenth ch. obedience to magistrates, justice in all its branches, love as the fulfilling of the law, and a universal sanctity of manners, correspondent to the purity of those religious principles which they professed. In the fourteenth and part of the fifteenth

chs. he dilates more largely on mutual candor, especially between those Christians who did, and those who did not, think themselves obliged in conscience to observe the ceremonies enjoined by Moses; and pleads a variety of most pertinent and affecting considerations in this view (14:1-15:17), in prosecuting some of which, he is led to mention the extent of his own labors, and his purpose of visiting the Romans; in the mean time, recommending himself to their prayers (v. 18 to end). After many salutations (16:1-16), and a necessary caution against those who would divide the church, he concludes with a benediction and a doxology suited to the general purport of what he had been writing (v. 17 to end).†

12. Mr. Townsend has judiciously observed, that we must be careful not to confine our views of this Epistle to the narrow limits within which Dr. Taylor, of Norwich, the Socinian writers in general, and the presumptuous reasoners of this school, have endeavored to do. These men have rejected the very foundations of the apostle's argument, the doctrines upon which Christianity rests, and without which the Scriptures are devoid of meaning,—the doctrines of the atonement of Christ, and the fall of man. Semler, indeed, still further degrades the apostle's argument, by the supposition that Paul wished to substitute Christianity, merely as a purer and more intelligible system of morals than the law of Moses, but less burdensome, tedious, and unattractive.

13. Dr. Taylor's system is well described by the late Dr. Magee to be a mere adaptation of Christian phrases. The general principle of the theory is, that God, having rejected the Jews, has admitted all who believe in Christ into the same relation to Himself which the Israelites once held; and that the peculiar terms which He used to describe the condition and privileges of the Jews, were used in the N. T. to describe the state and privileges of the Christian converts; whereas the terms which are used in the O. T. to describe the privileges of the Jews, are to be interpreted with reference to their peculiar situation, as the subjects of the visible theocracy. The same terms, when used in the gospel, refer to the spiritual advantages conferred on Christians by the new covenant. The law was the shadow or emblem—the gospel is the accomplishment of the designs of God; and the same terms, when applied to the two covenants, will consequently have a different meaning. Dr. Taylor degrades the Christian, and elevates the Jewish scheme, by making, as an excellent critic has observed, the law the enduring dispensation, and the gospel a mere dependency upon it. In an excellent work, by Mr. Needham, entitled Claris Apostolica, the argument of Dr. Taylor is well analyzed and refuted.‡

14. To conclude: The commentators, and the various writers on this Epistle, have exhausted the language of eulogy on its structure, arguments, and language. Nothing need be added to their well-deserved praises. The Epistle is, indeed, a masterpiece of

* Michaelis, who takes a more contracted view of this Epistle, gives the following logical view of its argumentative part:—

After the salutation and introduction, the apostle insensibly introduces the principal point which he intended to prove, namely, the subject of the gospel (1:16, 17). This reveals a righteousness unknown before, which is derived solely from faith, and to which the Jews and Gentiles have an equal claim.

In order to prove this point, he shows (1:18-3:20) that both Jews and Gentiles are under sin, i. e., that God will impute their sins to Jews as well as to Gentiles. Here it must not be imagined that Paul meant by a chain of conclusions to prove, what every man's experience will suggest to him, that Jews and Gentiles have sinned; his intention was to prove that God will call the Jews to an account for their sins, and, consequently, that they stand in need of justification by faith.

His proof of this position may be reduced to the following syllogisms:—

'The wrath of God is revealed against those who hold the truth in unrighteousness, i. e., who acknowledge the truth and yet sin against it (1:18).

'The Gentiles acknowledged truths; but, partly by their idolatry, and partly by their other detestable vices, they sinned against the truths which they acknowledged (1:19-31).

'Therefore the wrath of God is revealed against the Gentiles, and punishes them.

'The Jews have acknowledged more truths than the Gentiles, and yet they sin (2:17-24).

'Therefore the Jewish sinners are still more exposed to the wrath of God (2:1-12).

Having thus proved his point, he answers the following objections which might be made to it:—

Obj. 1. 'The Jews were well grounded in their knowledge, and studied the law.' Paul answers: If a knowledge of the law, without the performance of it, could justify, God would not have condemned the Gentiles, who knew the law by nature (2:13-16).

Obj. 2. 'The Jews were circumcised.' Answer: i. e., they were admitted by no outward sign to a covenant with God; but this sign will not avail those who violate the covenant (2:25-29).

Obj. 3. 'According to this doctrine of Paul, the Jews have no advantages above the Gentiles, which is manifestly false.' Answer: They still have advantages, for to them were committed the oracles of God; but their privileges do not extend so far that God should overlook their sins, which the Scripture earnestly condemns even in Jews (3:1-19).

Obj. 4. 'They had the Levitical law, and sacrifices.' Answer: Hence no remission, but only the knowledge of sin (3:20).

From the preceding arguments Paul infers that Jews and Gentiles must be justified by the same means, namely, without the Levitical law, through faith in Christ; and in opposition to the imaginary advantages of the Jews, he states the declaration of Zacharias, that God is not the God of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles (3:21-31).

As the whole blessing was promised to those who were the faithful descendants of Abraham, whom both Scripture and the Jews call his children, he proves his former assertion from the example of Abraham, who was an idolater before his call, but was declared just by God, on account of his faith, long before his circumcision. Hence Paul takes occasion to prove, from the equity of God, that the Jews had no advantages above the Gentiles, in respect to justification. Both Jews and Gentiles had forfeited life and immortality, through the common father of the human race, whom they themselves had not chosen as their representative. If, therefore, it was the will of God to restore immortality by a new spiritual head of a covenant, which was Christ, it was equitable that Jews and Gentiles should have an equal share in the advantages to be derived from this now representative of the human race (5:12-21).

He shows that the doctrine of justification, as he had stated it, lays us under the strictest obligations to holiness (5:1-23); and that since the death of Christ we are no longer concerned with the law of Moses. For our justification arises from our appearing in the sight of God as if we were actually dead with Christ on account of our sin; but the law of Moses was not given to the dead. On this occasion he evinces at large, that the preceding consideration does not affect the eternal power of God over us; and that, while we are under the law of Moses, we become perpetually subject to death, even for sins of inadvertency (7:1-25). The conclusion is, that all those, and those only, who are united with Christ, and for the sake of this union live not according to the flesh, are free from the condemnation of the law, and have an undoubted right to eternal life (8:1-17).

Having described the happiness of all such persons, he is aware that the Jews, who expected temporal blessings, would object to him, that the Christians, notwithstanding what he had said, still endured many sufferings in this world. This objection he obviates (8:18-39); and then shows that God is not the less true and faithful, because He does not justify, but rather rejects and punishes the Jews, who would not believe in the Messiah (chs. 9; 10:11). His discourse on this subject is arranged as follows:—

a. The introduction, displaying the utmost caution (9:1-5).

B. The dissertation itself, in three principal parts:—a) The promises of God were never made to all the posterity of Abraham; God always reserved to Himself the power of choosing those sons of Abraham, whom, for Abraham's sake, He intended to bless, and of punishing the wicked sons of Abraham; and in respect to temporal happiness or misery, even their good or ill conduct did not determine his choice. Thus Ishmael, Esau, the Israélites in the desert in the time of Moses, and the greater part of that nation in the time of Isaiah, were rejected, and made a sacrifice of his justice (9:6-29). b) God had reason to reject most of the Jews then living, because they would not believe in the Messiah, though the gospel had been plainly preached to them (9:30-10:21). c) Yet God rejected not all his people, but was still fulfilling his promises on many thousand natural descendants of Abraham, who believed in the Messiah, and at a future period would fulfil them upon more, since all Israel would be converted (11:11-32).

C. Conclusion, expressing admiration of God's wise counsels (11:23-36).

From the doctrine's hitherto laid down, and particularly from this, that God has in his mercy accepted the Gentiles, he argues that the Romans should consecrate and offer themselves wholly to God. This leads him to mention in particular some Christian duties (ch. 12 to the end).

t. Because God had chosen the Jews for his subjects, and as their King had dictated to them a system of laws, they considered it impious to submit to heathen laws and rulers. In the same light they regarded the payment of taxes for the support of the heathen governments (Mat. 22:17). In short, the zealots of that nation laid it down as a principle, that they would obey God alone, as their King and Governor, in opposition to Caesar, and all kings whatever, who were not of their religion, and who did not govern them by the laws of Moses. This turbulent disposition some of the Jews who embraced the gospel did not immediately lay aside; and even of the believing Gentiles there were a few, who, on pretence that they had a sufficient rule of conduct in the spiritual gifts with which they were endowed, affirmed that they were under no obligation to obey ordinances imposed by idolaters, nor to pay taxes for the support of idolatrous governments. Hence they refused to the magistrates that honor and obedience to which, by their office, they were entitled. These principles and practices the apostle here opposes, and inclemates the duties which subjects owe to magistrates; and testifies to them, that the disciplines of Christ were not exempted from obligation to the wholesome laws even of the heathen countries where they lived, nor from contributing to the support of the government by which they were protected, although it was administered by idolaters. The argument which the apostle uses is this: 'That God having formed mankind for society, and some government, whatever form of government happens to be established in any country is authorized of God, and is subordinate to his general government of the world.' Civil government, therefore, being authorized of God, he who resists its established exercise, on any pretence, really resists the ordinance of God, and brings on himself just condemnation, both from God and man.' See Michaelis, Macknight, and other commentators.

beautiful reasoning, surpassing all human wisdom. It evidently bears the stamp of divine inspiration; it enforces, in an irresistible manner, all the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, gradually unfolding, from the fall of our first parents, the great mysteries of redemption, and fully displaying the wisdom and goodness of God in his dispensations towards man. Every argument that the ingenuity of man could devise against the gospel system, the apostle himself advances in the person of the unbelieving Jew, and answers in the most satisfactory and convincing manner. Guided by divine inspiration, he has happily anticipated and removed every doubt and difficulty that can be raised to the truths of revelation; he has communicated to man the hidden counsels of God; and, by a long and convincing train of argument, has fully demonstrated that the gospel of Christ is the power of God unto salvation, and that there is no other means under heaven by which men can be saved. For sublimity and truth of sentiment, for brevity and strength of expression, for regularity in its structure, but, above all, for the unspeakable importance of the discoveries which it contains, it stands unrivaled by any mere human composition; and as far exceeds the most celebrated productions of the learned Greeks and Romans, as the shining of the sun exceeds the twinkling of the stars.*

SECTION XI.

THE EPISTLE TO THE EPHESIANS.

1. Ephesus was the very throne of idolatry; the worship of idols being performed in no part of the heathen world with greater splendor. The Christian religion was introduced here by Paul, in the year 51.

2. It is evident, from some expressions in this Epistle, that it was written by Paul while he was a prisoner at Rome (3:1, 4:1, 6:20), and probably soon after his arrival there, in the year 61 or 62. Its genuineness has never been doubted. It is referred to as the work of Paul by Ignatius, Irenaeus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Tertullian, and Origen, and has ever been received as such by the Christian church.

3. Paul's design in this Epistle appears to have been to give the Ephesians more exalted views of the love of God in the scheme of redemption, and to guard them against the false philosophy of their countrymen and the erroneous notions of the Judaizing teachers.

4. From the frequent use of the word mystery, Macknight and other commentators have supposed that the apostle intended to illustrate the truths he enforced, by referring to the mysteries of Diana, then celebrated at Ephesus. This is probable; but that is all we can say. The reader may see Macknight's arguments in his pref., sects. 3, 7.

5. It has been a question of extended discussion among learned men, whether this Epistle was addressed to the Ephesians, or to the Laodiceans. To discuss the subject here would greatly exceed our limits; we must therefore refer the reader to Paley, in support of the new theory, and to Lardner & Macknight|| in favor of the older one. Our belief is, that the Epistle was addressed to the church whose name it now bears, for the following, among other reasons: — That, notwithstanding the words 'at Ephesus' are not read in all the MSS. now extant, the external evidence preponderates with manifest excess on the side of the received reading, as even Paley confesses. 2dly, Lardner has shown that among the early Christian fathers there was no doubt as to this Epistle being addressed to the Ephesians. It is mentioned as being so, by Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, in the end of the 1st cent. 3dly, It is not true, as supposed by Paley, that there is no proof furnished in the Epistle of the apostle's personal acquaintance with those to whom he wrote. See, particularly, 1:13, 1:20, 2:1, 6:21, 22. 4thly, The salutation sent to the brethren in Laodicea (Col. 1:15) is a strong presumption that no epistle was sent to them. For the Epistle to the Colossians being written at the same time as the supposed Epistle to the Laodiceans, and sent by the same messenger (Ep. 6:21, Col. 1:7, 8), is it probable that, in the Epistle to the Colossians, the apostle would think it needful to salute the brethren in Laodicea, to whom he had written a particular letter, in which he had given them his apostolical benediction? With respect to the 'letter from Laodicea,' it is probable, as remarked by Rosenmüller, that Paul referred to a letter addressed to him by the church of Laodicea, in answer to which he wrote his Epistle to the Colossians, as being the larger church, desiring that they would send it to the Laodiceans, and get a copy of the letter which the latter had sent to Paul, in order that they might better understand his reply.

6. Concerning the style of this Epistle, Grotius says it expresses the sublime matters contained in it in words more sublime than are to be found in any human language; and this character is so just, that no Christian can read the doctrinal part of it, without being impressed and roused as by the sound of a trumpet.||

SECTION XII.

THE EPISTLE TO THE PHILIPPIANS.

1. The Philippians seem to have conceived a very strong affection towards Paul, which they showed by their generous contributions, &c. [See Pref. to Phil.] The Epistle, therefore, was written as a grateful acknowledgment. The time of it is generally supposed to have been towards the end of the apostle's first confinement at Rome, and after a residence there of considerable duration; circumstances made out by different intimations, preserving among themselves a just consistency, and a consistency certainly unimpeachable. First, the apostle had already been a prisoner at Rome so long, as that the reputation of his bonds, and of his constancy under them, had contributed to advance the success of the gospel (1:12-14). 2dly, The account given of Epaphroditus imports that Paul, when he wrote the Epistle, had been in Rome a considerable time (2:26). Epaphroditus was with Paul at Rome; he had been sick: the Philippians had heard of his sickness, and he again had received an account how much they had been affected by the intelligence. The passing and repassing of these advices must necessarily have occupied a large portion of time, and must have all taken place during Paul's residence at Rome. 3dly, After a residence at Rome, thus proved to have been of long duration, he now regards the decision of his fate as nigh at hand (2:23, 17.) This consistency is material, if the consideration of it be confined to the Epistle. It is further material, as it agrees, with respect to the duration of Paul's first imprisonment at Rome, with the account in the Acts, which, having brought him to Rome, closes the history by telling us, 'that he dwelt there two whole years in his own hired house' (28:30). This fixes the date to the year 62.

2. The design is altogether practical, and seems to be, 'to comfort the Philippians under their concern at his imprisonment; to check a party-spirit that appears to have broken out among them, and to promote, on the contrary, an entire union and harmony of affection; to guard them against being seduced from the purity of the Christian faith by Judaizing teachers; to support them under the trials with which they struggled; and, above all, to inspire them with a concern to adorn their profession by the most eminent attainments in the divine life.'†

SECTION XIII.

THE EPISTLE TO THE COLOSSIANS.

1. Colosse, Laodicea, and Hierapolis, mentioned Col. 4:13, as cities in which there were Christian churches at the time this Epistle was written, were situated not far from each other, in the Greater Phrygia, an inland country in the Lesser Asia. We have no account by whom the Christian church was planted here; nor is it certain whether Paul had ever visited Colosse, though it seems highly probable that he had, as we learn that he passed through Phrygia twice (Ac. 16:6, 18:23); and several passages in Col. have been adduced to show an intimacy between the apostle and the Colossian converts.‡ See 1:25, 2:5, 4:7.

2. That this Epistle was written about the same time as that to the Philippians, i. e. in the year 62, is rendered probable by the following circumstances: — In the former Epistle (Phil. 2:19), Paul purposed to send Timothy to Philippi, who was then with him at Rome, that he might know their state. As Timothy joins in the salutation at the beginning of this Epistle, it is evident that he still continued at Rome, and had not yet been sent to Philippi; and as Paul wrote the former Epistle nearly at the close of his first imprisonment at Rome, the two Epistles must have been written at a short interval from each other.

3. Epaphras, who was sent by the Colossians to comfort the apostle by the assurances of their affectionate regard under his imprisonment, and to inform them of the circumstances in which he was placed, became so obnoxious to the Roman magistrates, that he was imprisoned by them (Phile. v. 23), on account of his exertions in the spread of the gospel; and on this account Tychicus, who was the apostle's messenger to Ephesus (Ep. 6:21), and Onesimus, whom the apostle had converted and sent back to Colosse, charged with the Epistle to his master Philemon, were made the bearers of this letter (1:7-9).

4. Having ascertained from Epaphras the state of the church at Colosse, — that they were persevering in the faith and remarkable for their love and concord (1:4), but that certain false teachers had crept in among them, who were endeavoring to beguile them with enticing words and false philosophy (2:13), — the apostle writes to guard them. Michaelis is of opinion that these false teachers were Ussites;§§ But Macknight thinks it more probable that they were superstitious Judaizing teachers, who blended the doctrines

* Townsend's Arrangement, vol. ii. p. 369, &c.; and Macknight's concluding remarks on this Epistle. Thobuck's Exposition of Romans (tr. by Rev. R. Maynes, its 1st vol. forming vol. v. of the Bib. Cab.) is an able and evangelical work, which will amply repay its study.

† See the passages in Lardner and Whithy. Paley (in Horne Pauline) has successfully established its genuineness by internal evidence. His principal proofs are given by Dr. A. Clarke, Introd. to the Ephesians.

‡ Usher, Bengel, Michaelis, and others, have supposed that this Epistle was an evangelical or circular letter, addressed to the Ephesians, Laodiceans, and other churches in Asia Minor, and that the different copies transmitted had 'at Ephesus' at Laodicea, &c., as occasion required. The reason why all our MSS. read 'at Ephesus,' is supposed to be, that when the books of the N. T. were first collected, the copy used was

of Moses and Christ with those of Pythagoras and Plato. Be this as it may, it cannot be denied that the Pythagorean precepts, both concerning abstinence from animal food, and the mortification of the body by fasting and other severities, together with the doctrines of Plato, concerning the agency of angels in human affairs, and the honor which is due to them from men on that account, are all expressly condemned by the apostle in this Epistle. With respect to such of the Colossians as were tinctured with the Platonic philosophy, we know that, to persuade them to worship angels, or at least to make use of their mediation, they affirmed that it was arrogance in sinners to worship God without some mediation, and therefore they exhorted them, as an act of humility befitting them, to send up their prayers to God by the mediation of angels; which, they said, was more acceptable to Him, and more effectual than the mediation of Christ, who could not be supposed to have power with God like the angels, his ministers, in the government of the world. Lastly, as the heathen in general, trusting to propitiatory sacrifices for the pardon of their sins, were extremely attached to that kind of sacrifice, we may suppose, although it is not mentioned, by the apostle, that the Judaizers told the Colossians, since there were no propitiatory sacrifices prescribed in the gospel, it was undoubtedly the will of God to continue the sacrifices and purifications of the law of Moses, which He Himself had appointed as the means of procuring the pardon of sin. It was necessary that an effectual remedy should be provided for putting a stop to so pernicious a scheme of error. And such a remedy the Spirit of God actually provided, by inspiring the apostle to write this excellent Epistle,* the leading design of which is to prove that the hope of man's salvation is founded on the atonement of Christ alone.

SECTION XIV.

THE EPISTLE TO PHILEMON.

1. Philemon was an inhabitant of Colosse, of some wealth and influence, and appears, from v. 19, to have been a convert of Paul. He is generally supposed to have been a pastor or deacon of the church at Colosse.

2. This Epistle was evidently written while Paul was a prisoner at Rome (v. 1, 10, 13, 23), and at a time when he had a good prospect of soon regaining his liberty (v. 22). From the same persons joining in the inscription and salutations in this Epistle, as in those in the Epistle to the Colossians (Phile. 1, 23, 24; Col. 1, 1; 4, 10, 11), it has been reasonably inferred that they were written about the same time; and the conjecture is further confirmed, by the same messenger bearing the two Epistles to Colossa (Col. 4, 7, 9; Phile. 12, 17).†

3. The occasion of writing this letter was as follows: — Onesimus, a slave belonging to Philemon, whom he had probably robbed, fled from his master's service to the city of Rome, where he met with Paul, and was by him converted to the Christian faith. The apostle appears to have kept him about his person for some time, and when fully convinced that his profession was sincere, determined to send him back to his master, to repair the fault he had committed. Naturally supposing that Philemon would be strongly prejudiced against one who had left his service in so disgraceful a manner, he addressed to him this letter, in which he employed all his influence to procure Onesimus a favorable reception, and to induce Philemon to regard him 'no longer as a servant, but as a brother in the Lord.'

* See Macknight's Preface to the Colossians, sect. 1, from which the preceding observations have been compiled.

† See Macknight, Preface to Philemon, sect. 4; and Paley, Horne's Pauline Epistles, ch. xiv. No. 2, § 4.

§ These positions do not appear to be made out from the premises; for the master may treat slaves so badly, that even the law may take them from him: [and as to the rest, Paul (1 Co. 7:21) says simply, it is not wrong in itself to remain a slave, nor to be free. Negation of all rights cannot claim the benefit of a rule of right. Eo.]

|| Macknight, Preface to Philemon, sect. 3.

4. The tenderness and delicacy of this Epistle have been long admired. There are some passages in it most touching and persuasive, especially v. 8, 9. Yet, as Paley observes, the character of Paul prevails in throughout. The warm, affectionate, authoritative teacher is interceding with an absent friend for a beloved convert.

5. Whether Philemon pardoned Onesimus is not known; but it is difficult to suppose that he could refuse to listen to so pathetic an appeal as is this of Paul; the tradition of the ancient church, too, is express, that Onesimus obtained his freedom.

6. The genuineness of this Epistle has never been questioned; and it has always been inserted in the catalogues of canonical books. But it has by some been thought singular that a private letter should be admitted into the sacred canon, and be published for the edification of the church. That it was designed by the apostle, however, as a private letter, is a gratuitous assumption, and the contrary is far more probable. Chrysostom has pointed out two uses to which it may be applied, and to these Macknight has added several others; as, (1) That it sets an excellent example of charity, in endeavoring to mitigate the resentment of one in a superior station towards his inferior who had injured him. (2) That it sets before churchmen of the highest dignity a proper example of attention to the people under their care, and of affectionate concern for their welfare. (3) That all Christians are on a level. Onesimus the slave, on becoming a Christian, is the apostle's son, and Philemon's brother. (4) That Christianity makes no alteration in men's political state. Onesimus the slave did not become a freeman on embracing Christianity, but was still obliged [by his duty to God?] to be Philemon's slave forever, unless his master gave him his freedom; [for God had placed him in this station, and in it, not another, he owed God his service?] (5) That slaves should not be taken nor detained from their masters, without their masters' consent. (6) That we should not contemn persons of low estate, nor disdain to help the meanest, when it is in our power to assist them; but should love and do good to all men. (7) That where an injury has been done, restitution is due, unless the injured person gives up his claim. (8) That we should forgive sinners who are penitent, and be heartily reconciled to them. (9) That we should never despair of reclaiming the wicked, but do all in our power to convert them.||

SECTION XV.

THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS.

1. There is, perhaps, no part of the sacred writings which has been so much contested as this Epistle. Its author — the language in which it was written — its date — canonical authority — the persons to whom it was addressed — and the design of the writer — have each been the subject of lengthened and able dispute. To enter here into a discussion of these several topics, is impossible. To do justice to their claims, and their importance with reference to the canon of Scripture, would require much more room than we can devote to them. Referring the reader, therefore, to those writers who have discussed the matter,‡ we must be satisfied with giving that opinion which appears to be the best sustained by the labors of these learned men.

2. With regard to the author, the weight of evidence preponderates greatly in favor of Paul. (1) The current of antiquity, though not the authority of every individual father, runs strongly this way. It is cited as his by Clemens Romanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Origen; and Jerome expressly asserts that it was received as Paul's by all the Greek writers.* (2) The writer speaks of himself and 'our brother Timothy' (ch. 13:23), in the usual style of Paul (see 2 Co. 1:1; Col. 1:1; 1 Th. 3:2; Phile. 1), and further solicits the prayers of those to whom he wrote, that he might be 'restored to them' (13:18, 19), which is quite agreeable to the apostle's practice (see Ro. 15:30; Ep. 6:19; Phil. 1:19; Col. 4:3; 2 Th. 3:1), and exactly agreed with his condition, when a prisoner at Rome. (3) Many of the peculiarities of Paul's style are to be found in the Epistle — abrupt transitions, returning frequently to his subject, which he illustrates by forcible arguments, by short expressions, or sometimes by a single word; elliptical expressions, to be supplied either by the preceding or the subsequent clause, with reasonings addressed to the thoughts, and answers to specious objections, which would naturally occur, and therefore required removing. The numerous resemblances and agreements between this Epistle and Paul's acknowledged productions have been collected at great length by Braunius, Carpzov, Lardner, and Macknight, whose united labors have been methodized and abridged with much ability by Mr. Horne, who has arranged them under nine heads; † and although it should be granted that some of the analogies are questionable, yet the inference from the whole in favor of Paul is irresistible. (4) It is acknowledged as Paul's production by Peter (2 Pe. 3:15, 16), 'as our dear brother Paul, according to the wisdom given to him, hath written unto you, as also in all his Epistles,' &c. From this, it is evident that Paul had written to those persons to whom Peter was then writing, i. e. to the believing Jews; and it is further evident that he had written to them a particular letter distinct from all his other Epistles; as appears from these words, 'as also in all his Epistles,' i. e. his other Epistles. Since, then, we have no intimation that this Epistle was ever lost, it must be that of which we are now writing.||

3. With regard to the language in which it was written, we have the strongest internal evidence of Greek being its original. It is destitute of those harsh Hebraisms which occur in the Sept. The quotations from the O. T. are, not from the Heb., but from the Gr. — the numerous paranomasias or concurrences of words of like sound which exist in the Gr. show it to be no translation — and lastly, the Heb. words are interpreted. From these combined circumstances, it is evident that Greek was the original language of the Epistle.||

4. That the persons to whom this Epistle was directed were the believing Jews of Palestine, is the opinion entertained by several of the early fathers, and also by the majority of modern critics and commentators; and it is confirmed by the contents of the Epistle itself. That they were inhabitants of one country appears from two passages (13:19, 23), and that this country was Judea, appears from the circumstance, that there was much danger of the converts addressed abjuring Christianity and relapsing into Judaism, in consequence of the persecutions to which they were exposed. This danger was apparent in no part of the church but in that of Palestine, for in every part of the Roman empire Christianity was tolerated. But in Judea, the converts from Judaism were almost incessantly persecuted by their unbelieving brethren, who tenaciously adhered to the constitution and ceremonies of the Mosaic law, which Christianity superseded. In further corroboration of this opinion, it has been remarked that the two passages of the Epistle (6:6; 10:29), which relate to blasphemy against Christ, as a person justly condemned and crucified, are peculiarly adapted to the communities in Palestine; and it is difficult to read them without inferring that several Christians had really apostatized, and openly blasphemed Christ; for it appears, from Ac. 26:11, that violent measures were taken in Palestine for this very purpose, of which we meet with no traces in any other country at that early age. The circumstance that several who still continued Christians forsook the places of public worship (10:25), does not occur in any other Epistle, and implies a general and continued persecution, which deterred the Christians from an open profession of their faith. Under these sufferings the Hebrews are comforted by the promised coming of Christ, which they are to await with patience, as being not far distant (10:25-33). This can be no other than the promised destruction of Jerusalem (Mat. 24), of which Christ Himself said, 'When these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh' (Lo. 21:28). Now, this coming of Christ was, to the Christians in Palestine, a deliverance from the yoke with which they were oppressed; but it had no such influence on the Christians of other countries. On the contrary, the first persecution, under Nero, happened in the year 65, about 2 years before the commencement of the Jewish war; and the second, under Domitian, about 25 years after the destruction of Jerusalem. Lastly, the exhortation (13:12-14) is very difficult to be explained, on the supposition that the Epistle was written to the Hebrews out of Palestine; for neither in the Acts of the Apostles, nor in the other Epistles, do we meet with an instance of expulsion from the synagogue merely for a belief in Christ; on the contrary, the apostles themselves were allowed to teach publicly in the Jewish synagogues. But if we suppose the Epistle to have been written to Jewish converts in Judea, the passage becomes perfectly clear, especially if it were written only a short time before the commencement of the Jewish war. The Christians, on this supposition, are exhorted to endure their fate with patience, if they should be obliged to retire, or even be ignominiously expelled from Jerusalem, since Christ Himself had been forced out of this very city, and had suffered without its walls: 'Let us then go forth to Him without the camp, bearing his reproach.'

5. If, then, Paul was the author of this Epistle, the time when it was written may easily be fixed. For the salutation from the saints of Italy (4:24), with the apostle's promise to see the Hebrews (v. 23), shows plainly that he had then either obtained his liberty, or was on the eve of so doing. It was therefore written soon after the Epistles to the Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon, and not long before Paul left Italy; that is, in 62 or 63. In the Epistle itself there are passages which show that it was written before the destruction of Jerusalem; particularly 3:4, 9:25, 10:11, 13:10, which speak of the temple as then standing, and of the Levitical sacrifices as still continuing to be offered. To this may be added the remarks offered above, on the persecution the Christians were then enduring, and the promise of a speedy deliverance, by the destruction of the Jewish state.^{*}

6. The object of the Epistle is sufficiently obvious from its contents, viz. to prove to the Jews, from their own Scriptures, the divinity, humanity, atonement, and intercession of Christ, particularly his preminence over Moses and the angels of God—to demonstrate the superiority of the gospel to the law, and the real object and design of the Mosaic institution—to fortify the minds of the Hebrew converts against apostasy under persecution—and to engage them to a deportment becoming their Christian profession. In this view the Epistle to the Hebrews furnishes a key to the O. T., and may be divided into three parts:—I. A demonstration of the superiority of the gospel dispensation (1:10-25). II. An argument derived herefrom to support the Hebrew Christians under their trials (10:26-12:2). III. Practical exhortations to peace and holiness (12:3, to end).

7. The Epistle to the Hebrews is among the most important of the new covenant Scripturæ. It exhibits, in an extraordinary degree, the writer's knowledge in the mystery of Christ, and unfolds some of the sublimest discoveries of infinite wisdom. Whether it be considered in reference to Christian doctrine or to Christian practice,—whether it be applied to for instruction, or comfort, or reproof,—it will be found eminently calculated to enlarge our minds, to strengthen our faith, to encourage our confidence, and to animate our hopes. It carries on the believer from the first elements of the doctrine of Christ to perfection. It exhibits the divine character of the Redeemer in all its glory, establishes his infinite superiority to Moses as an apostle, and to the Aaronic family as a priest. It contrasts the grandeur, the efficacy, and the perpetuity of the new covenant privileges, worship, and promises, with the earthliness, the feebleness, and the temporary nature of the figurative economy; and it enforces the awful responsibility which attaches to the profession of Christianity, by considerations derived from all that is fitted to elevate hope, and to give energy to godly fear. It is the key to the ritual of Moses, which unlocks its most intricate and mysterious, and apparently trivial, arrangements. It brings to view the soul that animated the whole body of its ceremonies, and gave them all their importance; and by the light it affords we are enabled to enter into the darkest places of that extraordinary edifice, and to see the wisdom of its proportions, and their admirable adaptation to the design of all its parts. It was calculated to reconcile the Jew to the destruction of his temple, the loss of his priesthood, the abolition of his sacrifices, the devastation of his country, and the extinction of his name; because it exhibits a nobler temple, a better priesthood, a more perfect sacrifice, a heavenly inheritance, and a more durable memorial. And as the distinguished honors and privileges which it makes known, are equally the portion of the Gentile believer, they are no less fitted to wean his mind from the beggarly elements of this world, and to reconcile him to the lot of a stranger and a sufferer on the earth. But it is necessary to remark that, as this Epistle treats not of first principles, but of the highest and noblest themes of heavenly wisdom, those only who have their senses exercised to discern between good and evil, and who are amply conversant with 'the powers of the world to come,' can relish and understand it. While the apostle conveys his 'thoughts that breathe, in words that burn,' the operation of the Spirit of Christ on the understanding and heart is absolutely necessary to our seeing their beauty, and enjoying their consolation:†

SECTION XVI.

THE SECOND EPISTLE TO TIMOTHY.

1. It has been a subject of some controversy, whether this Epistle were written by Paul during his imprisonment at Rome, mentioned by Luke in Ac. ch. 23, or during some subsequent imprisonment. It appears somewhat strange that there should have been any dispute concerning a fact that is clearly deducible from the writings of the apostle himself. During Paul's imprisonment at Rome, mentioned by Luke, it is evident that he was in comparatively comfortable circumstances, dwelling in his own hired house, preaching the gospel with much success, and accompanied by several of his fellow-laborers (comp. Ac. 28:30,31, Phil. 1:12-20, Col. 1:10-14, Phile. 23,24); whereas his condition at this time was directly the reverse (comp. 1:15,17, 29, 4:10,16). When he wrote his Epistles to the Philippians and Philemon, he was just upon the eve of obtaining his liberty (Phil. 2:24, Phile. 22); but in this Epistle his prospects were very different, and he entertained no hope of deliverance (4:6). From these and other circumstances, which it is not necessary to enumerate, it is evident that this Epistle was written by Paul during a confinement at Rome subsequent to that mentioned in the Acts, at which time he wrote some of the former Epistles.‡

2. It is uncertain at what place Timothy was when he received this Epistle, containing a summons to Rome (4:9,13). Some have supposed that he remained still at Ephesus, though it is not easy to reconcile this with the apostle's charge to bring the books and parchments left at Troas, that city lying so far out of the way from Ephesus to Rome. It is to be remembered, however, that this was precisely the same route as Paul himself took when he left Ephesus for Rome (Ac. 21:1-5, 2 Co. 2:12); and it is therefore difficult to decide whether Timothy were at this time in the city just mentioned, or in Asia Minor.||

3. The apostle seems to have designed in this Epistle to prepare Timothy for those sufferings to which he foresaw he would be exposed; to forewarn him of the fatal apostasy and declension that were beginning to appear in the church; and at the same time to animate him, from his own example and the great motives of Christianity, to the most vigorous and resolute discharge of every part of the ministerial office. The Epistle consists of four chapters, containing the inscription (1:1,2); a commendation of Timothy's faith (2-5); an exhortation to becoming fortitude in the cause of Christianity, urged by motives derived from the excellency of the gospel (6-14); the apostle's forlorn situation, with a commendation of the fidelity and generosity of Onesiphorus (15-18); further arguments to fortify Timothy against the difficulties which he would have to encounter, derived from the apostle's own suffering and the glory which awaits those who suffer for Christ (19-21,23); directions relative to the ministry, and to the avoiding of those things which had led to the apostasy of some (21-26); a prediction of the declension and apostasy which would take place, reminding Timothy at the same time of his duty in the midst of those distresses (31-4:5); Paul's prospect of immediate death, and his rejoicing in anticipation of his reward (6-8); an invitation to Timothy to come to Rome, Paul being left alone (9-12); a declaration of the inconstancy of men and the constancy of God (13-16); various salutations (19-21); and the concluding blessing (22).

4. The Second Epistle to Timothy is particularly valuable in confirmation of the truth of the gospel history. It affords the most indubitable evidence of the sincerity of Paul in what he professed to believe and teach; and from the impossibility of his being deceived in the matters of which he testified, their truth results as a necessary consequence.¶

CHAPTER X.

THE CATHOLIC EPISTLES.

1. The writings known under this appellation are, the Epistle of James, the two Epistles of Peter, the First Epistle of John, and the Epistle of Jude. Commentators are not agreed as to the origin of this designation. Whithby, Michaelis, and some others, have adopted the opinion of Clemens, that they were so denominated because addressed, not to people dwelling in one place, but to the Jews dispersed through all the countries in the Roman empire. The opinion of Hammond, however, which has been adopted by Macknight and others, seems more probable. He conceives that the First Epistle of Peter, and the First of John, having from the beginning been received as authentic, which the others were not, obtained the name of Catholic, or universally acknowledged, and therefore canonical, Epistles, in contradistinction to those which were rejected. But the authenticity of these, also, being at length acknowledged by the majority of churches, they were added to the others, and the title, which was at first a mark of distinction, borne by the two former, became at length the common appellation of the whole.

2. The circumstance of the primitive church having rejected, for some period of time, three out of these five Epistles, furnishes convincing proof of the great deliberation with which writings purporting to be apostolic were received into the canon of Scripture; and also a sufficient answer to those who have charged the early Christians with want of care, and ourselves with credulity, in receiving as authentic and inspired, books of the original character of which nothing is known. The proofs of the genuineness and consequent authenticity of these Epistles will be noticed in treating of them severally.

SECTION I.

THE EPISTLE OF JAMES.

1. That this Epistle cannot have been written by James the Elder,* son of Zebedee and brother of John (Mat. 10:2), is evident from the period at which it was published. This we gather from 5:1-3, where the approaching destruction of Jerusalem is clearly referred to, and the wars and insurrections which led to that calamitous event are forcibly reprobated. This fixes it to the year 61, or the beginning of 62; whereas James the son of Zebedee was put to death by Herod in the year 44 (Ac. 12:1).†

2. The object of the apostle, with reference to the unbelieving Jews, was to convince them of the heinousness of their offences, and to excite them to sincere and immediate repentance. The Epistle consists of five chapters — the inscription (1:1); an exhortation to patience in enduring outward and conquering inward temptations, urged by motives derived from the readiness of God to supply all needful grace, in answer to prayer (v. 12-13); hearing to be joined with practice, as the latter is the only test of true religion (v. 19-27); cautions against undue partiality, occasioned by men's external circumstances, with an exhortation to universal benevolence (2:1-13); the inefficacy of an empty faith pointed out and illustrated (v. 14-26); a caution against officiousness in assuming the character and office of teachers, which tends to inflame the passions, and to set on fire the licentious tongue (3:1-12); a recommendation of the opposite qualities of candor and benevolence, which are the necessary fruits of true religion (v. 13-18); the source of animosities and dissensions pointed out, which can only be removed by seeking the assistance of God by prayer (1:1-10); cautions against evil speaking, and vain confidence in the events of futurity, or in any worldly possessions, which often prove a temptation to luxury, and an occasion of sin (v. 11-16); an exhortation and encouragement to the oppressed Christians to wait patiently for the coming of the Lord (v. 7-11); profane and vain swearing condemned; moderation, fortitude, and prayer recommended; a ready acknowledgment of our faults, and a solicitous concern for the salvation of others commanded (v. 12-20).‡

3. This Epistle is entirely different in its complexion from all others in the sacred canon; the style and manner being more those of a Jewish prophet than of a Christian apostle. It scarcely touches on any subject purely Christian. Our blessed Lord is only mentioned in it twice (1:1, 2:1). It begins without any apostolic salutation, and ends without any benediction. It may be considered as a sort of connecting link between Judaism and Christianity, as the ministry of John the Baptist was between the old covenant and the new. Dr. Harwood pronounces it to be one of the finest and most finished productions of the New Testament. The diction is very pure, chaste, and correct; the periods are pure and perspicuous; the composition is elegantly concise and sententious; and the sentiments are noble and instructive. There are many figurative descriptions and allusions that are truly classical, finely conceived, and pleasingly expressed; particularly 1:10, 11, 23, 24, 3:3-10, 4:13.|| Its divine worth and excellence, he remarks, transcend every eulogy that human imagination can dictate, or human language utter.¶

SECTION II.

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PETER.

1. The author of this and the following Epistle was a native of Bethsaida in Galilee, and by trade a fisherman. It is generally thought that, with his brother Andrew, he was a disciple of John the Baptist, before he was called to the apostleship by our blessed Lord. Peter was a married man, and occasionally followed his occupation of fishing after his call by Christ, till the choice of the twelve to be with him constantly; among which number were Peter and his brother Andrew (Mat. 10:1). On several occasions the zeal and forwardness of this apostle were rendered conspicuous; and, with James and John, he was peculiarly favored in witnessing transactions in the life of our Lord, from which the rest of the twelve were precluded. When the multitude from the chief-priests came out to take Jesus, on the night before his crucifixion, the zeal of Peter impelled him to attack them with his sword; and before his Master could stay his impetuosity, he had severed off the ear of the high-priest's servant. And yet (alas! for the boasted dignity of human nature!) this same Peter, but a few hours afterwards, denied three times, with repeated oaths, that he knew any thing of Jesus of Nazareth! Being stung with deep remorse, he went out and wept bitterly, was pardoned by his risen Savior, and reinstated in his apostolic office (Ja. 21:15-17). From this time Peter never faltered in the faith, but with the utmost zeal and courage labored in his Master's cause,

In the history of the Acts no mention is made of him after the council of Jerusalem; but from Ga. 2:11, it appears that after the council he was with Paul at Antioch. It has been thought that he preached in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia Minor, and Bithynia, from the circumstance of his inscribing his First Epistle to the Jews dispersed throughout those cities; but of this we have no certain information. According to the testimony of ancient writers, Peter, with his wife, at length visited Rome, about the year 63, during the reign of Nero; and after preaching the gospel for some time, they were both put to death, Peter being crucified with his head downwards.

2. Every part of the apostle's writings indicates a mind that felt the power of the doctrines he delivered, and a soul that glowed with a most fervent zeal for the Christian religion. But he is a very irregular and unmethodical writer. Harwood says, "I do not know who it was I once heard make this observation, that there was not a full stop in all his First Epistle. As he writes along, he starts a thought, and then pursues it, till in the pursuit something else presents itself, which in like manner seizes his imagination till it is dismissed for another object." He appears to be too intent upon better things to have studied composition. He was not solicitous about the choice of words, or their harmonious disposition: he paid but little attention to manner and method in writing: what engaged his thoughts and heart were the grand truths and discoveries of the gospel, and the indispensable obligations Christians were under to illustrate them in their daily conduct. The earnest and affectionate injunctions he lays upon ministers and people, old and young, male and female, to adorn their common profession, are pathetic and worthy an apostle. In his Second Epistle he satirizes, with a holy indignation and vehemence, the abandoned principles and practices of the false teachers and false prophets, who in those early times rose up in the Christian church, and disseminated their pernicious tenets with such art and cunning — entering into private houses, and leading captive silly women laden with sins, and making the credulity of the ignorant minister to their lust and avarice. His prophetic description of the general conflagration, and the end of all terrestrial things, is very awful, and was evidently described with that minute and circumstantial solemnity to engage us to prepare for it. Such great and affecting truths as these strike, by their own intrinsic weight and moment, more than all the elaborate periods that the wit and genius of men ever polished. When one is reading such interesting divine discoveries as these, it is the ideas which fill the soul; the mind pays little regard to those invented symbols, that are only the fictitious and external signs of them.††

3. The genuineness and authenticity of this Epistle have never been disputed. It is referred to by several of the apostolical fathers as Peter's undoubted work, and as such it was received by Eusebius and Origen.‡‡

4. There has been some diversity of opinion among commentators as to the persons to whom this Epistle was originally directed. Eusebius, Jerome, and many of the ancients, were of opinion that it was addressed to the Jewish Christians, scattered through the countries mentioned in the inscription. And this opinion has been adopted by Beza, Grotius, Mill, Cave, Dr. Hales, Horne, and others. Wetstein supposes it was written to the Gentiles; Barrington and Benson, to the Proselytes of the Gate; but Whithy, Lardner, Estius, Macknight, Dr. A. Clarke, and Townsend, that it was sent to all Christians in general, Jews and Gentiles, residing in the several countries enumerated in the inscription. In support of the latter opinion, several passages are adduced which can apply only to Gentile converts. See particularly chs. 1:14, 13, 20, 21, 2:10, 4:3. The passages in the Epistle which have been thought inconsistent with this opinion, will easily be reconciled by drawing a distinction between Gentile believers and Gentile unbelievers.

5. From ch. 5:13, where the apostle sends the salutation of the church at Babylon, it has been thought that he wrote the Epistle at that place. But whether it were the Assyrian or the Egyptian Babylon, is not certain. Indeed, many, both of ancient and modern writers, have interpreted Babylon mystically, and referred it to Rome. The late learned editor of *Cahier's is for a third Babylon, situated on the Euphrates; and in favor of this opinion, the order of the provinces saluted by the apostle may be noticed. He places Pontus and Cappadocia first, certainly because they were nearest to him; and Bithynia last, because it was the most distant from him. This, however, is utterly inconsistent with his being at this time resident in Rome, which would have prescribed a contrary order.†

6. There is no mark of time in this Epistle by which to fix its date, but it is pretty generally referred to the year 65 or 66, in conformity with the notion that it was written at Rome. If this were not the case, an earlier date must be the true one.‡

7. The design of the Epistle is evidently to induce the Christian converts to maintain a conversation, not merely inoffensive, but in all respects worthy of the gospel; and to support them under the severe persecutions and fiery trials they already endured, or were likely to endure, by the noblest considerations which their religion could suggest. And Macknight remarks, as the design of this Epistle is excellent, its execution, in the judgment of the best critics, does not fall short of its design. Ostervald says of the First Epistle of Peter, 'It is one of the finest books in the N. T.,' and of the Second, 'It is a most excellent Epistle, and is written with great strength and majesty.' Erasmus's opinion of Peter's First Epistle is, 'It is worthy of the prince of the apostles, and full of apostolical dignity and authority.' He adds, 'It is sparing of words, but full of sense.' Lardner observes, that Peter's two Epistles, with his discourses in the Acts, and the multitudes who were converted by these discourses, are monuments of a divine inspiration, and of the fulfilment of Christ's promise to Peter and Andrew, 'Follow Me, and I will make you fishers of men.'||

8. This Epistle contains five chapters, comprising the inscription (ch. 1:1, 2); the stirring up of those to whom it is addressed, by reminding them of the benefits of God toward them, and their duties toward God (3:25); exhortations to receive the word of God with meekness; to continue in the exercise of faith, and the discharge of every relative and social duty, urged by the same considerations (ch. 2); the relative duties of husbands and wives enjoined (3:1-7); arguments to engage them to the exercise of patience and meekness under their sufferings and persecutions (v. 8-17); the same subject further treated of and urged by notices drawn from the innumerable sufferings of our Savior (v. 18-1:2); particular cautions both to ministers and private Christians, urging on the former, humility, diligence, and watchfulness; and exhorting the latter to a faithful and steadfast discharge of their several duties; animated by this sublime consideration, that they had been delivered from a state of abominable idolatry and wickedness, and were now called to eternal glory, by God; who, after they had suffered a while, would make them perfect, according to the apostle's earnest prayer (v. 3-5:11); the salutation (v. 12-14).

SECTION III.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PETER.

1. Many doubts were entertained by the ancients whether Peter were really the author of this Epistle. Eusebius reckoned it among the books not generally received as canonical, and thinks that the superior influence of that party in the church which advocated the admission of the idolatrous Gentiles prevented its general reception. However this may be, we have the most undoubted evidence of its genuineness, and consequent authority. It expressly claims Peter for its author: 'Simeon Peter,'—which is the Hebrew form of writing,—'a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ.' Luke has distinguished him by the same name (Ac. 15:14), and John calls him Simon Peter seventeen times in his Gospel, to show, perhaps, as Macknight observes, that he was the author of the Epistle beginning 'Simeon Peter, a servant and an apostle?' The writer calls himself an apostle both in the inscription and in ch. 3:2; and in v. 15, he calls Paul his beloved brother, and commends his Epistles as scriptures or inspired writings. He also declares that he was with Jesus at his transfiguration, and alludes to the prediction of our Savior, where he made known to Peter the death by which he should glorify God (In. 21:19). Some commentators have supposed that the First and Second Epistles ascribed to Peter could not have been written by the same person, because the style in which they are composed differs; but this difference is only observable in the second chapter of the Second Epistle, and is easily accounted for, by supposing that many expressions in that chapter were borrowed from the Gnostics, whose doctrines the apostle was opposing and confuting. Thus, in v. 17, the Gnostics are called 'clouds agitated by a tempest'; and we are informed that the Manicheans, who held many similar doctrines with the Gnostics, taught that there were five good and five bad elements, and that one of the latter was called 'tempest.' They speak also of darkness under the name of zophos, which word occurs several times in this chapter. After a diligent comparison of the two Epistles ascribed to Peter, Michaelis remarks, that the agreement between them appears to be such, that if the Second were not written by Peter, as well as the First, the person who forged it not only possessed the power of imitation in a very unusual degree, but understood likewise the design of the First Epistle, with which the ancients do not appear to have been acquainted. It is not credible, however, he further remarks, that a pious imposter of the first or second century should have imitated Peter so successfully as to betray no marks of a forgery; for the spurious productions of those ages, which were sent into the world under the names of apostles, are for the most part very unhappy imitations, and discover very evident marks that they were not written by the persons to whom they were not ascribed. They betray their origin by the poverty of their materials, or by the circumstance that, instead of containing original thoughts, they are nothing more than a rhapsody of sentiments collected from various parts of the Bible, and put together without plan or order. This charge cannot possibly be laid to the Second

Epistle ascribed to Peter, which is so far from containing materials derived from other parts of the Bible, that ch. 3d exhibits the discussion of a totally new subject. Its resemblance to the Epistle of Jude will hardly be urged as an argument against it; for no doubt can be made, that the Second Epistle of Peter was, in respect to the Epistle of Jude, the original, and not the copy.

2. The same writer adds, that the deluge, which is not a common subject in the apostolic Epistles, is mentioned both in 1 Pe. 3:20, and in 2 Pe. 2:5; and in both places the circumstance is noted, that eight persons only were saved, though in neither does the subject require that the number should be particularly specified. Now, it is true that Peter was not the only apostle who knew how many persons were saved in the ark; but he only who by habit had acquired a familiarity with the subject would ascertain the precise number, where his argument did not depend on it. Another thing is, that the author of the First Epistle had read Paul's Epistle to the Romans (comp. 2:13, 14, with Ro. 13:1-5); and the author of the Second Epistle speaks in express terms (3:15, 16) of the Epistles of Paul. Now, no other writer of the New Testament has quoted from the New Testament; consequently we have in this Epistle a criterion, from which we may judge that they were written by the same author.¶

3. Grotius is of opinion that this Epistle was written after the destruction of Jerusalem. This, however, could not be, for in 1:14 the apostle speaks of his death being near at hand:—'Knowing that shortly I must put off my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ showed me,' and Peter was put to death in the year 68, that is, three years before the destruction of Jerusalem. The most probable opinion therefore is, that the Epistle was written about the year 66 or 67, and probably from Rome.

4. From 3d it is evident that this Epistle was addressed to the same persons as the former one; and its general design is to confirm the doctrines and instructions delivered in that; to excite the Christian converts to adorn and steadfastly adhere to their holy religion, as a religion proceeding from God, notwithstanding the artifices and persecution of false teachers and bitter and inveterate enemies. The apostle, with this view, having first congratulated the Christian converts on the happy condition into which they were brought by the gospel, exhorts them, in order to secure the blessings connected with their profession, to endeavor to improve in the most substantial graces and virtues (1:3-11); and, that their attention might be the more effectually engaged, he reminds them, both that he spoke to them in the near view of eternity, and that the subjects on which he discoursed were not comingly-devised fables, but attested by a righteous voice from heaven, and by divinely-inspired prophecies (v. 12-21). And that this exhortation might not fail of producing the most kindly and genuine effects, he cautions them against the false teachers, whose character he describes; reminding them of the judgments executed on the apostate angels, on the old world, and on Sodom; and, at the same time, of the deliverance of Noah and of Lot, as suggesting considerations which, on the one hand, should terrify such ungodly wretches,* and, on the other, comfort and establish the hearts of upright and pious Christians (2:1-9). He then farther describes the character of these seducers; warning all true Christians of the danger of being perverted by them, and then of the dreadful destruction to which they exposed themselves (v. 10-22). And that the persons to whom he was writing might more effectually escape the artifices of those who lay in wait to deceive, they are directed to adhere steadily and closely to the sacred Scriptures, and to consider the absolute certainty and awful manner of the final destruction of this world;" and then the whole is concluded with several weighty and pertinent exhortations.

3. In conclusion, we remark, in the language of Macknight, that "in this, as in the First Epistle, there are discoveries of some important truth and circumstances not mentioned at all, or not mentioned so plainly, by the other inspired writers; such as, (1) That our Lord was transfigured for the purpose of exhibiting, not only a proof of his greatness and power as the Son of God and Judge of the world, but as an example of the glory in which He will come to judgment; an example also of his power to transform our corrupted mortal bodies, at the resurrection, into the likeness of his own glorious body, as it appeared in his transfiguration.—(2) That the destruction of the cities of the plain by fire was intended to be an example of that destruction by fire from the presence of the Lord, which will be inflicted on the wicked after the judgment." Comp. Ju. 7.—(3) That in the last age of the world, scoffers will arise, who, from the stability of the present mundane system, will argue that the world has existed as we see it from eternity, and that it will continue forever.—(4) That after the judgment, this earth, with its atmosphere, shall be set on fire; and, burning furiously, the elements shall be melted, and the earth, with all the works of God and man thereon, shall be utterly destroyed.—(5) That after the present heaven and earth are burnt, a new heaven and a new earth shall appear, into which, according to God's promise, the righteous shall be carried, there to live in unspeakable happiness—an event which Peter himself, in his discourse to the Jews (Ac. 3:21), has termed "the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." From this account of the discoveries made in the Second Epistle of Peter, the attentive reader must be sensible that they are more grand and interesting than even those contained in the First Epistle; and that to the foreknowledge and declaration of them, a degree of inspiration was necessary, superior to that required in the writing of the First Epistle; consequently, that the matters exhibited in the Second Epistle are every way worthy of an apostle of Christ really inspired, such as this writer expressly affirms himself to have been, and of which there can be no doubt."

SECTION IV.

THE EPISTLE OF JUDE.

1. Jude, or Judas, the writer of this Epistle (of an uncertain date, between 65 and 90), was the apostle surnamed Lephesus and Thaddeus (Mat. 10:3. Mk. 3:18). As he expressly declares himself to have been the brother of James, he evidently bore the same relation to our Lord as that apostle; and hence he is called one of the brethren of Jesus in Mat. 13:55, and Mk. 6:3. We know neither the time nor the manner in which he became a disciple of Christ; but his call to the apostleship is recorded in Luk. 6:13. Grotius, indeed, has argued that the words, "and brother of James," are an interpolation; but as he has not produced a single authority in support of his assertion, further notice of it is rendered unnecessary.

2. The canonical authority of this Epistle is proved by the majesty of its style; the truth, importance, and purity of its doctrines; its agreement with the other canonical books, especially 2 Pe., and its early reception into the Christian church. Eusebius affirms that it was reckoned among the seven Catholic Epistles, and was published in most churches. And though he remarks that several of the ancient writers make no mention of it, it is certain that several of them before his time have cited it as the genuine production of Jude. Among these, we may notice Clemens Alexandrinus, Tertullian, and Origene, the passages from whom may be seen in Lardner.[†]

3. The design of the Epistle appears to be similar to that of the Second of Peter, namely, to describe the character and punishment of the false teachers, and to caution the Christian converts against being led astray by their pernicious doctrines.

SECTION V.

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF JOHN.

1. Macknight and others have collected various passages from John's Gospel, and, by comparing them with other passages in this Epistle, have shown that there is such an exact agreement of sentiment and expression in the two writings, that no reader who is capable of discerning what is peculiar in an author's mode of thinking, can entertain the least doubt of their being the productions of the same writer.

2. The date which we have assigned to this Epistle in the chronological table places its publication between that of the book of Revelation and the Gospel by the same writer; that is, in the year 96. Concerning the propriety of this, however, there has been much dispute among critics and commentators, as must ever be the case where conjectural arguments only can be entertained. That the reader may judge for himself, the following summary of the arguments on either side is furnished.[§]

3. When the Holy Spirit inspired the various writers of the Old and New Testaments, it imparted only the instructions and prophecies which were necessary for the benefit of the universal church. It did not so interfere with the natural or acquired talents of the favored persons, whom it elevated above the rest of mankind, that their peculiar or characteristic modes of expression should be necessarily altered. Isaiah was a nobleman and a courtier, and his refined and polished language declares his education, as well as his native genius. Amos was a herdsman; and though there is the same perpendicular internal evidence that the spirit of prophecy rested on him also; though none of the prophets has more magnificently described the Deity; though his sentiments are elevated, and his diction splendid,—he is still distinguished by the use of images which are drawn from rural life, and by phrases which are not characteristic either of the study of the schools of the prophets, or of the courtesy of a king's palace. Every one of the sacred writers is distinguished from his inspired brethren by some internal proofs of his vocation, or habits, or education; and if the external evidence of the truth and authenticity of the various books of Scripture were not taken into consideration, sufficient arguments might be adduced in their defence, from a careful comparison of the contents of the sacred books.

4. This consideration will possibly assist us in the attempt to discover, from internal evidence, whether it is not probable that the Apocalypse was written before the Epistles of John. The former book abounds with Hebraisms, and with images derived from the Jewish traditions and peculiarities. Though neither the Sept. nor the N. T. is written in purely Attic Greek, not one book of either volume is so full of the solecisms in question as the Apocalypse; whereas the Epistles and Gospel of John are written both correctly and elegantly. It is true that the three books are proved to be the work of the same author, by their general agreement, both in style and expression; and Wetstein, Horne, and Dr. Lardner, have collected numerous instances of this coincidence; but the chief barbarisms of the Apocalypse are to be found neither in the Epistles nor in the Gospel of John. In this respect they are remarkably distinguished from each other; and while the common adoption of certain forms of speech demonstrates the whole of the books in question to be the work of one writer, the insertion of so many peculiar idioms and Hebraisms in the one appears to justify our conclusion, that it must have been written at a period when the author was not so well versed in the elegances and purity of the language in which he wrote. He seems as if he thought in one language, and wrote in another; or as if he had attempted for the first time to write in a language in which he made a subsequent improvement. This, in literature, is not an infrequent case. The triple sentence, for instance, and the balanced periods, which so remarkably characterize the style of the Rambler, and the Lives of the Poets, were perceptible in the early works of Dr. Johnson, and afford internal evidence that they were written by him; while the grossness and puerility of his Mariner Norfolicense are such as he would have blushed to have acknowledged in his mature years. In the early poems of Milton we may trace, and that not faintly, "the towering thought" and hear "the living lyre" of the days of his ripened genius; yet he could not have written, at that splendid period, the pretty conceits which adorn or disgrace his juvenile poems on the Passion and the Nativity.

5. But it is not only the internal evidence which induces us to place the Apocalypse before the Epistles of John. The circumstances of the apostle's life sufficiently account for the more frequent adoption of Hebraisms in the former book. He was a native Jew, and probably continued within the precincts of the Holy Land longer than any of the apostles. Neither he, nor any of the twelve, appears to have left Palestine during the Pauline persecutions. When James was made bishop of Jerusalem, in the Herodian persecution, after the apostle James was beheaded, and Peter had been cast into prison, it is probable that all the apostles left Jerusalem, and John among the number. He was present, however, at the council in that city; and there could not have been time, during that short interval, for the establishment of the churches in Asia, which are said to have acknowledged him as their founder. It seems probable that he continued either in Jerusalem, or within the precincts of Palestine, till the destruction of the city, [†] Hammond, Lightfoot, Wetstein, and some others, have denied that this passage refers to the end of the world, and restrict it to the destruction of Jerusalem. But this opinion, as Whithy remarks, is contrary to the judgment of all the ancient writers, who refer to the words.—Preface to 2 Peter. And that it is not true, has been shown by Michellus, from the following considerations:—1. Peter represents the fact for which he argues, as possible, by appealing to the deluge. Now, no man would appeal to the deluge, to show the possibility that a city may be taken and destroyed; but we may very properly argue, that, as the earth has already undergone a material change, so it may undergo another change equally great. And what Peter says is consonant to the Jewish theology, in which was taught the doctrine, that the earth was destined to suffer two grand revolutions; the one effected by water, the other to be effected by fire. See Joseph. Ant. I. iii. 3. 2. No one could doubt that Jerusalem would be destroyed, merely because the destruction was delayed longer than he expected, and still less because all things continued as they were from the beginning of the creation. This ground of doubt manifestly implies that the question related to a revolution of the earth. 3. We know of no heretics who called in question Christ's prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem. And, even, if there were such, it is hardly creditable that Peter should write an Epistle to persons who were born heathens, and lived in the northern parts of Asia Minor, to prove an event with which they had little or no concern. 4. What Peter says (3:8), that "one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day," is not very applicable to an event which was to take place within six or seven years after Peter wrote. In-situ; if we explain what Peter says, as relating to the destruction of Jerusalem, we must take his expressions in a figurative sense; but figurative language, though it is well adapted to prophecy, such as that which is recorded in Mat. ch. 24, is not very suitable to a plain, doctrinal dissertation, especially to one delivered in the form of an epistle. —Introduction, vol. iv. p. 357, note. See also Macknight, and other commentators, on 2 Pe. 3:7.

[§] Works, vol. iii. p. 410, &c.

[¶] For this we are indebted to Mr. Townsend

Throughout that part of the Acts of the Apostles which relates the travels of Paul, John is not once mentioned; and no salutation is sent to him in any of the Epistles which Paul wrote from Rome to the churches of Asia; nor even in his Epistle to the Ephesians, nor in the Epistles which, in the latter part of his life, he wrote to Timothy in Ephesus, while Paul was alive. We agree, therefore, with the opinion of Macknight and others, that John probably remained in Judea till he saw Jerusalem encompassed with armies, and observed the other signs of its approaching ruin, foretold by his divine Master. Lampe (Prolegomena to John's Gospel, lib. i. cap. 3) is of the same opinion, and fixes the time of his departure in the last year of Nero; in which he is confirmed by the Chronicon Paschale. During the whole of this period he would have conversed in his native language, among his own people; neither can we assign any reason for his adopting the Greek language, or for cultivating it with peculiar attention at this period. Baronius and Dr. Lardner would place the retirement of the apostle from Judea after the martyrdom of Paul and Peter; but this would make a difference of a few years only.

6. A more important question is, whether John lived exclusively among the Greek cities of Asia in the interval between the overthrow of Jerusalem and his banishment to Patmos in the last year of Domitian. This cannot be satisfactorily decided. The learned Mill places some dependence upon the tradition, that this apostle travelled into Parthia and India. His First Epistle was called by Augustine the Epistle to the Parthians; and the Jesuit's letters, cited by Baronius, affirm that the people of a town in India believed the gospel to have been preached there by John; and the same is asserted, as we find in a note in Lampe, by the people of a town in Arabia. It is not likely that he would immediately establish himself at Ephesus; as Timothy, who is generally declared by the ecclesiastical historians to have been bishop of that place, was probably still alive. Others, whose opinion is strongly condemned by Lampe, have been of opinion that John did not take up his residence at Ephesus till near the end of the reign of Domitian. This opinion seems to be most supported by the little remaining evidence which can enable us to come to any decision on a point so obscure. The apostles were commanded to preach throughout the world; and they would probably have adopted that plan which they are said to have done, that each should take his peculiar district, and to that direct his attention. As part, at least, of Asia Minor had been placed under the care of Timothy, it is not unlikely that John would have travelled to other parts of the East before he came to Ephesus, to reside there. The course of his travels might have been from the east of Judea to Parthia, and round from thence to India; and returning by Arabia to Asia, he there preached, and founded the churches of Smyrna, Pergamus, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, Laodicea, and others. These he might have established at the conclusion of his route. In Parthia, India, and Arabia, he would not have required the Greek language; and during the short period which elapsed between his arrival in Asia, and his banishment at the latter end of the reign of Domitian, he would have been more likely to have acquired that kind of language which we find in the Apocalypse, than the more polished style of the Epistles and the Gospel. The former shows less acquaintance with the language than the latter; and the fact is fully accounted for, if we suppose that the apostle, when he wrote the Apocalypse, had not had so frequent intercourse with the people as at a subsequent period; and this course of his travels explains the causes of this fact.

7. If we may thus decide respecting the travels of John after the destruction of Jerusalem, we reconcile many of the various traditions of antiquity, and account for the difference between the language of the Apocalypse and the other writings of the apostle. We have taken no notice of the journey which Eusebius tells us he took again to Palestine, after the destruction of Jerusalem. Lampe considers it as very uncertain, and there is no corroborating authority to support it. Neither can we venture to assert the truth of the story, that the apostle went to Rome towards the end of the reign of Domitian, and was there cast into a caldron of boiling oil. That he was sent to the island of Patmos, and there wrote the Apocalypse, cannot be doubted; and the arguments of Lampe confirm the general opinion, that he was banished to that island in the fifteenth year of the reign of Domitian, and not of Claudius, and was recalled soon after, in the reign of Nerva.

8. The uniform tradition of antiquity assures us, that the apostle returned to Ephesus after the termination of his banishment to Patmos, and continued there till his death, in the third year of Trajan, and probably in the hundredth year of his own age. After his return from Patmos, he resided constantly at Ephesus, and spoke, as we may justly conclude, the Greek language only. This practice would have given him a knowledge and fluency in that tongue to a greater degree than when he was at Jerusalem, or associating with the people of various countries; and it will sufficiently explain the reasons why the style of the Epistles should so much resemble that of the Gospel of John, which was undoubtedly the last of the inspired books added to the canon of Scripture. Thus, in his Gospel, John does not content himself with simply affirming or denying a thing, but denies its contrary to strengthen his affirmation; and, in like manner, to strengthen his denial of a thing, he affirms its contrary. See Jn. 1:20. 3:36. 5:24. 6:22. The same manner of expressing things strongly occurs in this Epistle. See ch. 2:4, 17, and 3:2, 3. In his Gospel, also, John frequently uses the pronoun, or ontos, autος, touto, this, in order to express things emphatically. See ch. 1:19. 3:19. 6: 20, 40, 50, and 17:3. In the Epistle the same emphatic mode of expression obtains. Compare ch. 1:5. 2:25. 3:23. 5:3, 4, 6, 11.*

9. It does not therefore appear improbable that this and the other Epistles were written as late as the year 95 or 96, towards the very close of the apostolic age.

10. As this opinion is by no means generally adopted, it will be necessary to take some notice of the arguments by which Dr. Hales, Mr. Horne, and other critics, would assign an earlier date to the Epistle.

(1) The expression in ch. 2:13, 'It is the last hour,' is said to be more applicable to the last hour of time of the duration of the Jewish state than to any later period, especially as the apostle adds, 'And as ye have heard that Antichrist is coming, even so now there have been many Antichrists, whence we know that it is the last hour,' in which passage the apostle evidently alludes to our Lord's prediction concerning the springing up of false Christs, false teachers, and false prophets, before the destruction of Jerusalem. Mat. 24:5-25. The expression, however, 'the last time,' may allude, not to the destruction of that city, but to the close of the apostolic age. Michaelis would support this argument for the early date of the Epistle, by observing that John's Gospel was opposed to heretics, who maintained the same opinions as are opposed in this Epistle, which tenets he has confuted by argument in his Gospel, whereas in the Epistle he expresses only his disapprobation. Michaelis therefore concludes that the Epistle was written before the Gospel, because, if John had already given a complete confutation when he wrote this Epistle, he would have thought it unnecessary to have again declared the falsehood of such opinions. This idea of Michaelis appears to be correct; but the date of the Epistle is not ascertained by its having been written before the Gospel.

(2) Again, the expression used (2:13, 14), 'Ye have known Him from the beginning,' applies, it is said, better to the disciples immediately before Jerusalem was destroyed, than to the few who might have been alive at the late date which some critics assign to the Epistle. In the verses just cited, the fathers or elders are twice distinguished from the 'young men' and the 'children,' by this circumstance, that they had seen Jesus during his ministry or after his resurrection. Thirty-five years after our Lord's resurrection and ascension, when Jerusalem was destroyed, many such persons might have been alive, whereas in 98, or even in 92, there could not have been many persons alive of that description. In reply to this argument we may observe, that some of those who had seen the miracles of our Lord might have taken refuge with John at Ephesus.

(3) To these two arguments for the early date of John's First Epistle, Dr. Hales has added the following, which have not been noticed by any other biblical critic:—As the other apostles, James, Jude, Paul, and Peter, had written catholic Epistles to the Hebrew Christians especially, it is likely that one of the principal 'pillars of the church,' the greatest surety of the mother church, the most highly gifted and illuminated of all the apostles of the circumcision, and the beloved disciple, would not be deficient likewise in this labor of love. This is true; but the labors of these apostles might have been the very cause why John should delay writing.

(1) Nothing could tend so strongly to establish the faith of the early Jewish converts as the remarkable circumstances of our Lord's crucifixion, exhibiting the accomplishment of the ancient types and prophecies of the O. T. respecting Christ's passion or sufferings in the flesh. These John alone could record, as he was the only eye-witness of that last solemn scene among the apostles. To these, therefore, he alludes in the exordium, as well as to the circumstances of our Lord's appearances after the resurrection; and to these he again recalls their attention in that remarkable reference to 'the water' at his baptism, to 'the water and blood' at his passion, and to the dismissal of 'his spirit,' when he commended it to his Father, and expired (5:5-9). This argument really appears to be but of little weight. The early converts had the other Gospels in their hands, and there does not seem to have been any necessity for John's writing ten or twenty years earlier.

(5) The parallel testimony in the Gospel (Jn. 19:35-37) bears witness also to the priority of the Epistle in the expression, 'He that saw hath testified' (μεντορύκε), intimating that he had delivered this testimony to the world already; or if for now the first time, it should rather be expressed by the present tense, μαρτυρεῖ, 'testifieth.' And this is strongly confirmed by the apostle's same expression, after giving his evidence in the Epistle, 'This is the testimony of God which He hath testified' (μεντορύκε) concerning his Son' (v. 9), referring to the past transaction as fulfilling prophecy. It is acknowledged that the Epistle was written first; but this does not settle the date.

11. Though this composition is called an Epistle, nothing is to be found in it, as Dr. Horsley has observed, of the epistolary form. It is not inscribed to any individual, like Paul's to Timothy and Titus, or the second of the two which follow it, 'to the well-beloved Gaius'; nor to any particular church, like Paul's to the churches of Rome, Corinth, Ephesus, and others; nor to the faithful of any particular region, like Peter's

* Macknight's Preface, sect. ii. § 2.

† Arrang. of N. T. vol. ii. p. 689, &c. Eng. ed. The late learned and ingenious editor of Calmet, Mr. Charles Taylor, has proposed an hypothesis to dispose of the difficulties attending both the exclusively early and late dates of this Epistle. He supposes that there were two publications of it; one at a very early period of the church, the other toward the close of the apostolic age, after it had been revised by its author, and adapted to the then state of the church. See Fragments to Calmet, Nos. 619-622, 625-633.

First Epistle to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia; nor to any principal branch of the Christian church, like Paul's to the Hebrews; nor to the Christian church in general, like the Second of Peter's 'to them that had obtained like precious faith with him,' and like Jude's 'to them that are sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ, and called.' It bears no such inscription; it begins without salutation, and ends without benediction. It is true the writer sometimes speaks, but without naming himself, in the first person, and addresses his reader, without naming him, in the second. But this colloquial style is very common in all writings of a plain, familiar cast; instances of it occur in John's Gospel, and it is by no means a distinguishing character of epistolary composition. It should seem that this book has for no other reason acquired the title of an Epistle, but that in the first formation of the canon of the N. T. it was put into the same volume with the didactic writings of the apostles, which, with this single exception, are all in the epistolary form. It is indeed a didactic discourse on the principles of Christianity, both in doctrine and in practice; and whether we consider the sublimity of its opening with the fundamental topics of God's perfections, man's depravity, and Christ's propitiation, the perspicuity with which it proounds the deepest mysteries of our holy faith, and the evidence of the proof which it brings to confirm them; whether we consider the sanctity of its precepts and the energy of argument with which they are enforced, the dignified simplicity of language in which both doctrine and precept are delivered; whether we regard the importance of the matter, the propriety of the style, or the general spirit of ardent piety and warm benevolence, united with a fervid zeal, which breathes throughout the whole composition; — we shall find it in every respect worthy of the holy author to whom the constant tradition of the church ascribes it, — 'the disciple whom Jesus loved.'

12. That the leading design of this Epistle was to combat the doctrines delivered by certain false teachers, appears from ch. 2:13

—26. 3:7. 4:1-3. And that the doctrines taught by these heretics were similar to those of the Cerinthians and the Gnostics,[†] is evident, as Michaelis has ably shown;[‡] from the counter doctrines here delivered by John. In order to guard the Christians to whom he wrote against the pernicious errors of these infatuated men, the apostle has insisted, most strenuously, on the humanity and divinity of Christ — on the purity of the doctrines taught by his apostles, and their conformity to the teachings of their Master — on the insuflated holiness of God and his essential goodness — on the vanity of faith separate from holy tempers and benevolent dispositions — and on the importance and obligations of brotherly love.

13. A variety of synopses of this Epistle have been proposed, with a view to illustrate the apostle's argument. Mr. Horne has undoubtedly adopted the best of these, which is as follows: It comprises six sections, besides the conclusion, which is a recapitulation of the whole.

SECT. I. asserts the true divinity and humanity of Christ, in opposition to the false teachers; and urges the union of faith and holiness of life, as absolutely necessary to enable Christians to enjoy communion with God (1:1-7).

SECT. II. shows that all have sinned, and explains the doctrine of Christ's propitiation (v. 8-10. 2:12); whence the apostle takes occasion to illustrate the marks of true faith, viz. Obeying the commandments of God, and sincere love of the brethren, and shows that the love of the world is inconsistent with the love of God (2:3-17).

SECT. III. asserts Jesus to be the same person with Christ, in opposition to the false teachers, who denied it (v. 18-29).

SECT. IV. On the privileges of true believers, and their consequent happiness and duties, and the marks by which they are known to be the sons of God (ch. 3).

SECT. V. contains criteria by which to distinguish Antichrist and false Christians, with an exhortation to brotherly love (4:).

§ i. A mark to know one sort of Antichrist — the not confessing that Christ came in the flesh (v. 1-3).

§ ii. Criteria for distinguishing false Christians, viz.

- (1) Love of the world (v. 4-6).
- (2) Want of brotherly love (v. 7-12).
- (3) Denying Christ to be the true Son of God (v. 13-15).

§ iii. A recommendation of brotherly love, from the consideration of the love of God in giving his Son for sinners (v. 16-21).

SECT. VI. shows the connection between faith in Christ, regeneration, love to God and his children, obedience to his commands, and victory over the world; and that Jesus Christ is truly the Son of God, able to save us, and to hear the prayers we make for ourselves and others (5:1-16).

The conclusion, which is a summary of the preceding treatise, shows that a sinful life is inconsistent with true Christianity, asserts the divinity of Christ, and cautions believers against idolatry (v. 17-21).

This is an outline of this admirable Epistle, which, being designed to promote right principles of doctrine and practical piety in conduct, abounds, more than any book of the N. T., with criteria by which Christians may soberly examine themselves whether they be in the faith.[§]

SECTION VI.

THE SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLES OF JOHN.

1. These two Epistles may be regarded as an epitome of the first one, and contain very little not to be found in that. The similarity, both in style and in sentiment, between these and the First Epistle, may be seen by comparing 2 Epist. 5 with 1 Epist. 2:8; and v. 6 with 1 Epist. 5:3; and v. 7 with 1 Epist. 5:5; and 3 Epist. 12 with Jn. 19:35. Of John's peculiar manner of expressing things, 2 Epist. 7 and 3 Epist. 11 are examples.[¶]

2. The doubts which were formerly entertained of their genuineness have been satisfactorily accounted for; and their early reception among the canonical books is shown from their citation by Irenaeus, who was a disciple of Polycarp and a hearer of Papias, both of whom were disciples of the evangelists.^{||}

CHAPTER XI.

THE BOOK OF REVELATION.

1. THE writer of this book affirms himself to have been John, a servant of Jesus Christ, then in the island of Patmos, for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus; which will agree with no other John, of whom we have any knowledge, except the evangelist; and accordingly, from this description of the writer, and also the similarity of style which prevails between this and the acknowledged writings of that apostle, it was universally received as his inspired production in the primitive church. It is expressly cited as such by Justin Martyr,^{} Irenaeus,^{††} and Polycarp,^{‡‡} in the second century; and is reasonably thought to have been known to Hermas and Papias still earlier, from some modes of expression in their writings, which appear to be borrowed from it.^{§§} Indeed, as Sir Isaac Newton has remarked,^{|||} there is no book of the New Testament so strongly attested, or commented upon so early, as the Apocalypse. Independent of these testimonies, however, the book itself furnishes the most indubitable evidence of its inspiration, in the numerous clear and circumstantial predictions with which it abounds, many of which have been subsequently fulfilled.

2. Concerning the time when this book was written, critics are not agreed: indeed, they differ so widely, that some make it one of the earliest, while others make it the last published book of the New Testament. Grotius, Sir Isaæc Newton, Michaelis, Bishop Newton, and Dr. Tillock, ascribe it to the reign of Claudius or Nero. Mill, Lardner, Bengelius, Woodhouse, Horne, Townsend, and others, contend that it was written in the reign of Domitian, A. D. 96 or 97. The latter opinion accords with the voice of Christian antiquity, and alone agrees with the contents of the book. Thus the three first chapters describe the Asiatic churches as being in that advanced and flourishing state of society and discipline, and to have undergone those changes in their faith and morals, which could not have taken place until after they had been planted for a considerable time. For instance, the church at Ephesus is reproved for having left her 'first love'; whereas the Epistle addressed to them by Paul, in the year 61, commends their love and faith (ch. 1:15). There are also several expressions in the address to the churches, which indicate their having been exposed to persecution. But there was no persecution of the Christians extending to the provinces, till the reign of Domitian, whose death is related to have happened in September, A. D. 96. The Christian exiles were then liberated, and John was permitted to return to Ephesus. As, however, the emperor's decease, and the permission to return, could not be made known in Asia immediately, some time must intervene before the apostle could be at liberty either to write the Apocalypse at Ephesus, or to send it by messengers from Patmos. The year 96 or 97, therefore, appears to be the most probable time to which this book can be assigned.^{¶¶}

3. Nor are the learned more agreed on the structure and machinery, and the design and object, of this prophetic book. The principal hypotheses which have been advanced are five:

(I) That it is a prophetic and sceptical exhibition of what shall happen to the Christian church till the end of the world. Those who espouse this opinion, lay down as a proposition, which comprises the subject of the whole book, the contest of Christ with his enemies, and his final victory and triumph over them. See 1 Co. 15:25. Mat. 24: Mk.

^{¶¶} See further, p. 110, ante.

13: Lu. 21: But what is but briefly hinted in these scriptures, is detailed at large in the Apocalypse, and represented by various images, and in regular order.

(2) That it contains a prophetic description of the destruction of Jerusalem, of the Jewish war, and of the civil wars of the Romans. This is the theory of Weitstein, who divides the prophecy into two parts:—(1) The first is contained in the closed book, and concerns the earth and the third part, i. e. Judea and the Jewish nation. (2) The second part is contained in the open book, and concerns many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings (10.11), i. e. the Roman empire.

(3) That it contains predictions of the persecutions of the Christians under the heathen emperors of Rome, and of the happy days of the church under the Christian emperors, from Constantine downwards. This was the general opinion of the fathers.

(4) That it contains prophecies concerning the tyrannical and oppressive conduct of the Romish pontiffs, the true Antichrist; and foretells the final destruction of Popery. This opinion is adopted by the generality of Protestant writers.

(5) On the other hand, the Roman Catholic writers maintain that it is a prophetic declaration of the schism and heresies of Martin Luther, those called Reformers, and their successors; and the final destruction of the Protestant religion. This hypothesis has been illustrated and defended at large, by Bishop Walmesley, in a work called the History of the Church, under the feigned name of Signor Pastorini; in which he endeavors to turn every thing against Luther and the Protestants, which they interpreted of the Pope and Popery; and attempts to show, from a computation of the Apocalyptic numbers, that the total destruction of Protestantism in the world will take place in 1828!

(6) Mr. Faber has supposed that much of the imagery of the Revelation is taken from the ancient mysteries; and Eichhorn has represented it as a drama. This opinion, somewhat modified, was espoused and defended by Mr. Irving, who observes, ‘The great object and main action of the book is to show the condition of the church under Daniel’s fourth beast, from the time that John wrote, or rather from the time of the things that are recounted in the Epistles to the seven churches, down to the period at which the saints should obtain the kingdom, with the judgments which came upon her adversaries during that long period, and the judgments by which she was put in possession of the kingdom, and the blessedness of her millennial reign, down till the time of the general judgment and consummation of all things. And if this could have been done by one prophetic narration in regular order, I doubt not but that, being the simplest plan, would have been chosen; but as there were three distinct scenes of distinct actions, the Western empire, and the Eastern empire, and the church, with experiences altogether diverse, the threefold division became necessary until the time when the saints possess the kingdom, after which it is one. The thread of the story is therefore threefold: when the one is followed out to the great crisis, the prophecy goes back to the second to the same point, then to bring up the third to the same point; after which they all proceed together. If, therefore, I were to select an emblem by which to represent the method of this emblematical book, it would be that of a river, which riseth at three heads in one mountain, and flows for a long space in three great streams through diverse countries of the earth, but afterwards reunites at the same place, and continues, in one great channel, to flow onward to the ocean. But if I were called to say what form of composition this book resembled the most, I would say the ancient drama, and that it was subdivided into four acts; the first setting forth, in several scenes, the progress of one subsidiary action; the second bringing forward the progress of a second action to the same point; the third, the progress of a third action to the same point; yet connected and linked with one another, but not appearing together upon the stage till the fourth act, which contains the triumph of the last of the three persons over the other two. And each of these acts hath its prologue, descriptive of its contents and style of representation. And there are distinct notices of the changing of the acts; and, as in the ancient dramas, there are choruses of saints and angels to interpret and apply the matter, with single voices to make it still more clear; which method is intricate (but its intricacy becomes its evidence in the explication of it) only because of the great mass of matter to be briefly spoken. And yet I say not that it is a drama, but that it resembles those ancient dramas, in which high poetry, divine morality, and mystical theology, were wont to be set forth in concert. For it is to be likened to other compositions only for the sake of more clear conceptions, being in itself singular and unrivaled, the sublimest and most comprehensive of God’s revelations.’*

4. Of these several hypotheses we must leave the reader to take his choice, referring him to those writers who have with much learning and ability discussed their respective merits.†

5. This book has justly been considered as designed to supply the place of that succession of prophets, which demonstrated the continued providence of God to the Jewish and the patriarchal churches. The superiority of prophecy over miracles, as an evidence of Christianity, has been asserted by Bishop Warburton, and by many learned writers, as a continually-increasing evidence. The great peculiarity of the prophecies of the O. T. is their gradual development of the system of truth, as the world was able to bear it. The first prophecy of the seed of the woman, that is, of some one family of the descendants of Eve, was less definite than those which predicted in their order that He should descend from Abraham; from Isaac, rather than from Esau; from Judah, rather than from the other patriarchs; from David, and so on, till the annunciation of Malachi, that the Lord whom they sought should come while the second temple was standing. Another peculiarity was, that the ancient prophets announced, in very general terms, in the boldest and most figurative language, various events which have never yet taken place, relative to some more glorious state of the church, the punishment and overthrow of its enemies, the final restoration of the Jews, and the universal establishment of happiness and innocence among mankind. If we are justified in expecting a book of prophecy, in the place of a succession of prophets, in the Christian church, we may anticipate also the clearer prediction of the same events, and their gradual development.

6. The majority of commentators on the Apocalypse generally act on these principles of interpretation. They discover in this book certain predictions of events which were fulfilled soon after they were announced; they trace in the history of later years various coincidences, which so fully agree with various parts of the Apocalypse, that they are justly entitled to consider them as the fulfillment of its prophecies; and by thus tracing the one God of revelation, through the clouds of the dark ages, through the storms of revolutions and wars, through the mighty convulsions which at various periods have agitated the world, their interpretations, even when they are most contradictory, when they venture to speculate concerning the future, are founded on so much undoubted truth, that they have materially confirmed the wavering faith of thousands. Clouds and darkness must cover the brightness of the throne of God, till it shall please Him to enable us to bear the brighter beams of his glory. In the mean time, we trace his footsteps in the sea of the Gentile world, his path in the mighty waters of the ambition and clashing passions of man. We rejoice to anticipate the day when the bondage of Rome, which would perpetuate the intellectual and spiritual slavery of man, shall be overthrown, and the day-spring of united knowledge and holiness bless the world.‡

7. We conclude these remarks with the following very excellent canons of interpretation, proposed by Dr. Woodhouse, who has himself applied them with great success to the exposition of this sacred book.

(1) Compare the language, and symbols, and predictions, of the Apocalypse with those of former revelations; and admit only such interpretation as shall appear to have the sanction of this divine authority.

(2) Unless the language and symbols of the Apocalypse should in particular passages direct, or evidently require another mode of application, the predictions are to be applied to the progressive church of Christ.

(3) The kingdom, which is the subject of this prophetic book, is not a temporal, but a spiritual kingdom; not a kingdom of this world; not established by the means and apparatus of worldly pomp, not bearing the external ensigns of royalty, but governing the inward man, by possession of the ruling principles: ‘The kingdom of God,’ says our Lord, ‘is within you.’ Luke 17.21. The predictions relative to this kingdom, therefore, are to be spiritually interpreted. Wars, conquests, and revolutions, and vast extent, and great political import, are not the object of the apocalyptic prophecies — unless they appear to have promoted or retarded in a considerable degree the real progress of the religion of Jesus Christ, whose proper reign is in the hearts and consciences of his subjects. His reign is advanced when Christian principles — when faith, and righteousness, and charity — abound; it is retarded when ignorance, impurity, idolatrous superstition, and wickedness, prevail.

(4) We are not to attempt the particular explanation of those prophecies which remain to be fulfilled.§

PART III.

BIBLICAL THEOLOGY.

1. THE TERM THEOLOGY, which strictly imports 'a discourse or treatise concerning God,' embraces, according to its enlarged and ordinary acceptation, every thing pertaining to the principles, institutions, and practices of religion. Theology is therefore a branch of biblical science of pre-eminent importance; it is that, in fact, which gives to criticism and interpretation all their value, inasmuch as they are directed solely and exclusively to ascertain the precise character, import, obligations, and purposes of this, as it is revealed and illustrated in the sacred writings. The Bible, as a mere literary work — comprising history, philosophy, jurisprudence, morals, poetry, and prophecy — is, indeed, a volume of incomparable value to the philosopher, and of inexhaustible interest to the inquisitive mind. It comprises 'all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge' — the simple eloquence of its narratives, the sublime imagery of its poetry, the grandeur of its descriptive painting, the profundities of its social and political economy, and the persuasive power of its moral lessons, with many other high qualities that are familiar to every attentive reader, combine to render it a book which will repay, a thousand-fold, any amount of thought and labor that may be expended upon its study and interpretation. But all else dwindles into insignificance and comparative worthlessness, when the divinity of its origin, and the nature and object of its revelations, are taken into the account. It is to the thorough understanding of these, therefore, that every thing should be made subservient. This should be the object and aim of all our studies — the prompting motive to all our inquiries.

2. A work purporting to be introductory to the study of the Scriptures, would be manifestly defective did it not at least indicate the primary features and progressive character of the divine revelation — point out the evidences which attest its genuineness and authenticity — trace the errors and corruptions that have been grafted upon it, so far as they are indicated in Scripture — and describe the principal rites and ceremonies which it has prescribed and enjoined. These topics will furnish the subjects of inquiry and exposition in the following chapters.

[Consult, in this connection, the general Intros. to the Commentary, vols. i. and iv.]

CHAPTER I.

OF THE MEDIA OF DIVINE REVELATION.

Divine Revelation originally communicated to Individuals Creation of Personal Revelations — The Only Medium of Revelation — Inspiration of the Scriptures — Various Theories of Inspiration — The Author's Theory of Inspiration in Relation to the Scriptures — Discrepancies in the Gospels are Proofs against their Plenary Inspiration, but Attestations of their Genuineness and General Authenticity — Character and Claims of the Bible.

1. TIME was when the revelations of God were communicated to mankind through the medium of certain individual persons, chosen for this special purpose, and furnished with the necessary credentials to attest the divine character of their mission, and to command the attention and obedience of those to whom they addressed themselves. A succession of divine teachers, from Adam to Christ, was raised up by the Almighty, and under his inspiration taught mankind those doctrines, pertaining both to life and godliness, which their unaided reason could never have discovered. 'God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in times past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son, whom He hath appointed heir of all things, and by whom also He made the world.' He. 1:1. 'There was a time when each revelation of the word of God had an introduction into this earth, which neither permitted men to doubt whence it came, nor wherefore it was sent. If, at the giving of each several truth, a star was not lighted up in heaven, as at the birth of the Prince of Truth, there was done upon the earth a wonder, to make her children listen to the message of their Maker. The Almighty made bare his arm, and, through mighty acts shown by his holy servants, gave demonstration to his truth, and I found for it a sure place among the other matters of human knowledge and belief. But now the natures of God have ceased, and nature, secure and unmolested, is no longer called on for testimonies to her Creator's voice. No burning bush draws the footsteps to his presence-chamber; no invisible voice holds the ear awake; no hand cometh forth from the obscure to write his purpose in letters of flame. The vision is shut up, and the testimony is sealed, and the word of the Lord is ended; and this solitary volume, with its chapters and verses, is the sum total of all for which the chariot of heaven made so many visits to the earth, and the Son of God Himself tabernacled and dwelt among us. The truth which it contains once dwelt undivulged in the bosom of God; and, on coming forth to take its place among things revealed, the heavens, and the earth, and nature through all her chambers, gave it reverend welcome. Beyond what it reveals, the mysteries of the future are unknown. To gain it acceptance and currency, the noble army of martyrs testified unto the death. The general assembly of the first-born in heaven made it the day-star of their hopes, and the pavilion of their peace. Its every sentence is charmed with the power of God, and is powerful to the everlasting salvation of souls.*

II. It is obvious that to claim so much as this on behalf of the Scriptures, is to claim for them a degree of inspiration of which no other writings partake. For it is not to be overlooked, that the biblical writers are not always those who were numbered amongst the prophets, apostles, or evangelists; and that even where this is the case, the writers often describe events which they did not themselves witness, record discourses and profound doctrines which they did not themselves originally deliver or bring to light. It is evident, therefore, that the validity and authority of the original communication might be greatly compromised or wholly invalidated by the subsequent narrator, if he were not protected against error by a divine interposition.

1. And what is thus seen to be necessary in theory, is accorded in fact to the sacred Scriptures. The memorable words of Paul and Peter are most explicit. The Theopneustos of the former asserts unequivocally the important fact; and the hupo Pneumatos hagioi pheromenoi of the latter presents the Sacred Agent direct as breathing, and 'beating' the writers beyond the possibility of error: 'All Scripture given by inspiration of God' (Theopneustos). 2 Ti. 3:26. 'Knowing this first, that no prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation. For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost' (hupo Pneumatos hagioi pheromenoi). 2 Pe. 1:21. With such language, of so determinate a meaning, the solemn declaration of John, Re. 22:18,29, need scarcely be appealed to.

2. We confess, however, that we are far from being satisfied with the current doctrine of inspiration as claimed on behalf of the Scriptures. It is vague, unsatisfactory, incapable of proof, and leaves insuperable objections against some passages in the historical parts of the N. T. Scriptures.

3. The term inspiration, in its application to the sacred writings, was formerly employed to denote the divine communication of knowledge to the human mind, extending not only to the doctrines and facts which the writers had to detail, but also to the identical words in which those doctrines and facts were to be communicated. This doctrine of organic or literal inspiration, however, is now very generally abandoned for a modified and more flexible theory. Instead of maintaining a uniform, unremitting, indiscriminate operation of the Holy Spirit upon the minds of the sacred penmen, the divine agency is now generally represented as accommodating itself to circumstances, and assuming, as occasion required, the several forms of superintendence, suggestion, and revelation. This theory, though scarcely accurate, as its definition falls short of the ideas intended by the persons adopting it, is sufficiently so for our present purpose. That there are many things in the historical parts of the Old and New Testaments of which the writers must have obtained a knowledge by the ordinary modes of communication, is too obvious to need a single remark; and that, as men possessed of memory and judgment, they were able, without supernatural influence, to relate them to others, and to accompany them with occasional remarks, must be equally evident. Matthew could relate, without divine aid, that Christ called him from the receipt of custom, to become his disciple, and that upon this occasion he made his Master a feast in his own house; and John, without supernatural assistance, could give an account of the miraculous conversion of water into wine, at the marriage in Cana.

* Irving's Orations for the Oracles of God.

But, notwithstanding that this is conceded by the claimants of plenary inspiration, it is argued, that even in these cases there was an inspiration of superintendence, to preserve from error; and of suggestion, to record particular events, and note particular observations.

4. The term revelation is used with reference to those communications of knowledge on subjects relative to God and divine things, which are placed beyond the sphere of human attainments. Had man possessed the abilities of an angel, he could never have explored the thoughts and purposes of the Divine Being; and therefore, where these are brought within the cognizance of the human mind, it must be by a revelation from above. Dr. Doddridge and others have noticed a degree of inspiration, which they term elevation, and confine to such parts of Scripture as are lofty and sublime. But as this notion is generally exploded, further reference may be deemed unnecessary. The celebrated Michagis struck out a path, in which we are not aware that he has been followed by any writer, in this country at least. His theory is, that the inspiration of the several parts of the N. T. is made to depend upon the fact of their having been written by the apostles of Christ. The inspiration of Mark and Luke is therefore abandoned, and the inspiration of the writings ascribed to Matthew and John is made contingent upon the genuineness of these Gospels. This theory appears any thing but satisfactory, and the arguments any thing but convincing.

5. The last theory to which we shall refer is what may be termed partial inspiration, and is advocated by Mr. Horne, in his Introd. to the Study of the Scriptures. 'It is not to be supposed,' he remarks, 'that the writers were thus inspired [i. e. in the lowest degree] in every fact which they related, or in every precept which they delivered. They were left to the common use of their faculties, and did not, upon every occasion, stand in need of supernatural communication; but whenever, and as far as divine assistance was necessary, it was always afforded.' He again observes, 'Whatever distinctions are made with respect to the sorts, degrees, or modes of inspiration, we may rest assured that one property belongs to every inspired writing, namely, that it is free from error, i. e. any material error. This property must be considered as extending to the whole of each of those writings of which a part only is inspired; for it is not to be supposed that God would suffer any such errors as would tend to mislead our faith or pervert our practice. In this restricted sense it may be asserted, that the sacred writers always wrote under the influence, or guidance, or care, of the Holy Spirit, which sufficiently establishes the truth and divine authority of all Scripture.'

6. Such are the theories of inspiration that are now generally maintained. The one class extends some kind of active divine interposition to every part of Scripture; but the others, though in words they do so, in fact confine it to a part of the text. Of the two kinds, we think the theory supported by Mr. Horne to be the most exceptionable, inasmuch as it leaves us ignorant of the limits of the inspiration argued for. Those who maintain this theory, do not pretend to possess any peculiar information respecting the situation of the sacred writers, or of the opportunities and means of knowledge they possessed, so as to be able to ascertain where their ordinary sources of knowledge failed them, and where the need of a divine interposition arose: still less do they profess to recognize, by any marks, the operation of the Spirit, and so to distinguish passages inspired from those derived through personal experience, or testimony. The existence, therefore, of any writing of the former description is a merely arbitrary conjecture, which rests entirely on a dogmatical ground.

7. These discrepancies and anomalies, as to the theory of inspiration, originate in want of attention to the real nature of the case, and also, and perhaps above all, in an imperfect knowledge of the doctrine of Scripture itself relative to this important question. Men have been, so to speak, more anxious than the Divine Author of the Scriptures Himself has been, to multiply the claims of its authority, by exaggerating the divinity of its character. The advocates of plenary inspiration have confounded questions that are essentially distinct and independent of each other; namely, authenticity and infallibility — the possibility of error with error itself. As historical records, the sacred writings are sustained by evidence demonstrative of their truth, and this wholly apart from the consideration of their inspiration; and it is upon this evidence, and not upon the ground of their supposed inspiration, that they immediately challenge the belief of mankind, and denounce the punishment of man's negligence and infidelity.

8. But do we therefore deny all inspiration in reference to the Scriptures, and restrict their claims to the mere fact of their truth or falsehood? We have already asserted the contrary, and will now proceed to point out the limitations under which, we think, all theories of inspiration should be received, as indicated by the Scriptures themselves, and as rendered necessary by the exigencies of the case.

9. The sacred writings are of a multifarious character. There is one great object proposed by the Divine Being throughout all the dispensations of his providence and revelations of his will, as recorded in these documents, namely, the enlightenment and salvation of mankind. But the documents themselves assume a variety of forms, embracing history, cosmography, theology, psalmody, prophecy, preaching, and various other things neither immediately connected with, nor essentially dependent upon, each other. Now, the question is, Were all these several subjects, and every part of these several subjects, reduced to writing under the direct and immediate superintendence of the Holy Spirit? or, if they were not thus uniformly and universally inspired, do we possess the means of discriminating between the two classes of writing — that which is of divine superintendence or revelation, and that which is the mere product of unaided intellect? We think that the following theory will get rid of the difficulties attendant upon both the hypotheses we have noticed, and dispose, at the same time, of some otherwise innumerable discrepancies and anomalies in the sacred text itself. We assume, then, that all that portion of the sacred writings which partakes of the prophetic or of the didactic character — whether it assume the form of theological teaching or of historical narrative, was written under the immediate direction and superintendence of the Holy Spirit. For this portion of the sacred writings we are disposed to contend for the fullest amount of inspiration, and that for the following reasons: —

(1) The nature of the subjects requires such a divine illumination and superintendence. They relate either to the Divine Being; to the spiritual relations, exigencies, and duties of man, and a future life; to the nature and reasonableness of moral obligations; or to future occurrences, contingent upon the actions of mutable beings. Without a divine revelation, each of these things must have remained amongst those which 'eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, and which it hath not entered into the heart of man to conceive' of.

(2) For this inspiration we have the express declarations of the sacred writers themselves, as well as (in relation to the N. T.) the unconditional promises of our Savior Jesus Christ Himself.

(3) As to the prophetic parts of the sacred volume, whether comprised in the O. or N. T., there can be no doubt. The foretelling of future events is by the Almighty Himself made the criterion for distinguishing those who were inspired by his Spirit. 'I will . . . that they may see, and know, and consider, and understand together, that the hand of the Lord hath done this, and the Holy One of Israel hath created it. Produce your cause, saith the Lord; bring forth your strong reasons, saith the King of Jacob. Let them bring them forth, and show us what shall happen: let them show the former things, what they be, that we may consider them, and know the latter end of them; or declare us things for to come. Show the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know ye are gods; yea, do good, or do evil, that we may be dismayed, and behold it together. Behold, ye are of nothing, and your work of nought: an abomination is he that chooseth you. I have raised up one from the north, and he shall come: from the rising of the sun shall he call upon my name: and he shall come upon princes as upon mortar, and as the potter treadeth clay. Who hath declared from the beginning, that we may know; and before time, that we may say, He is righteous? Yea, there is none that sheweth; yea, there is none that declareth; yea, there is none that heareth your words. . . . Behold, they are all vanity; their works are nothing: their molten images are wind and confusion!' Is. 41:19-29. 'Assemble yourselves and come; draw near together, ye that are escaped of the nations; they have no knowledge that set up the wood of their graven image, and pray unto a god that cannot save. Tell ye, and bring them near; yea, let them take counsel together; who hath declared this from ancient time? who hath told it from that time? Have not I, the Lord? and there is no God else beside Me; a just God and a Savior: there is none beside Me.' 45:20-21. 'Remember the former things of old: for I am God; and there is none else: I am God, and there is none like Me, declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, Thy counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure.' 46:9,10. 'I have declared the former things from the beginning; and they went forth out of my mouth, and I showed them: I did them suddenly, and they came to pass. Because I knew that thou art obstinate, and thy neck is an iron sinew, and thy brow brass; I have even from the beginning declared it to thee; before it came to pass I showed it thee, lest thou shouldst say, Mine idol hath done them, and my molten image hath commanded them. . . . Mine hand also hath laid the foundation of the earth, and my right hand hath spanned the heavens; when I call unto them, they stand up together. All ye, assemble yourselves, and hear; which among them hath declared these things? The Lord hath loved him: he will do his pleasure on Babylon, and his arm shall be on the Chaldeans.' 48:3-11. In accordance with these declarations, which might be multiplied to an almost unlimited extent, is the uniform testimony of the apostles and evangelists. 'God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets.' He. 1:1. 'Knowing this first, that no prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation.' For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.' 2 Pe. 1:20,21. Hence, too, the common formula, 'Thus saith the Lord;' 'Wherefore, as the Holy Ghost saith;' 'As He saith in another place,' &c. (see Hebrews, passim); always having reference to the prophetic Scriptures of the O. T., and affirming, in the most direct terms, their inspiration. It is upon this ground of their inspiration, in fact, that the doctrinal value and authority of the O. T. Scriptures are placed by the inspired apostle, who, in addressing Timothy, says, 'All Scripture given by inspiration of God, is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.' 2 Th. 3:16,17.* What is true of the prophecies, in this respect, is also true of the legislative and didactic portions of the O. T. Scriptures. Whatever was intended to communicate the knowledge of any spiritual or moral truth, or to discover and enforce any obligation, whether resulting from the established harmony and order of the divine economy in human affairs, or resting, apparently, upon the mere fiat and inscrutable will of God, comes within the category of inspired writing, and possesses divine authority.

(4) With reference to the N. T. Scriptures, the question is, if possible, still clearer and more satisfactory. For all the purposes of divine teaching, whether orally or by writing, our Lord promised to his disciples the suggesting and superintending influence of the Holy Spirit: 'When the Spirit of truth is come, He will guide you into all truth' (Jn. 16: 13); 'He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you.' 11:26. The latter passage explains the former, and, with its context, clearly refers it to the discourses and teachings of Christ. Hence we find, that however the authors of the Gospels may differ in their relation of historical circumstances, they agree in recording the discourses of our Savior, and in exhibiting the same moral and spiritual truths. Then, with regard to those parts of the N. T. which are professedly doctrinal, we have also the unequivocal avowal of the writers themselves, as to the fact of a divine inspiration having been granted. Paul, writing to the Galatian church, claims, in the most unqualified manner, a plenitude of inspiration: 'I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which is preached of me is not after man; for I neither received it of man, neither was I taught but by the revelation of Jesus Christ.' 1: 11,12. And in reply to the Corinthians, who reproached him with his desuetude of the graces of oratory, the apostle says, 'We speak not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth; comparing spiritual things with spiritual.' 1 Co. 2:13. In like manner, he appeals, not only to this church in general, but to those who were prophets or spiritual in particular, to acknowledge that the things which he commanded were those of the Lord (14:37,38); and in ch. 7 of the same Epistle, he carefully draws a line of distinction between that which proceeded from himself, and that which was from the Lord; inducing the natural inference, that where no such caution is taken, the apostle spoke and wrote under a divine afflatus. So far, and satisfactory, Paul; and with him agrees Peter, who not only asserts of the apostles generally, that they 'preached the gospel with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven', but refers particularly to the Epistles of Paul, and ranks them with the tas LOIPAS graphas, 'the other Scriptures', whose inspiration had been attested by Christ.

10. Here, then, we may rest the question relative to the inspiration of the didactic parts of the N. T. That inspiration was necessary, in order to a perception of the truths made known by the writers — was promised by Christ — was claimed by the respective authors — and was conceded by the persons to whom they wrote. Beyond this point, however, we find no indication of divine superintendence or suggestion having been afforded to the writers of the N. T. So far, indeed, are the evangelists from referring the origin of their narratives to any such inspired source, that in the only case in which we can derive direct information relative to the sources of their knowledge, we are necessarily led to deny the assumption. In the preface to Luke's Gospel, that evangelist sets forth the pretensions upon which he demands the credence of those to whom he addresses himself. In alleging the motives from which he undertook the task of writing his narrative, he claims for it no higher origin than was conceded to the 'many' to which he refers (v. 1), and no higher authority for the facts set forth than was derivable from the diligence of the author, and the superior nature and credibility of his resources (v. 1).

11. But we shall not dwell upon this circumstance, important as it is in relation to the theory of inspiration, so far as the evangelical narratives are concerned, but at once advert to certain portions of these narratives, for the purpose of showing that to claim a constant superintending control of the Holy Spirit on behalf of them, must necessarily lead to insuperable and very serious difficulties.

(1) In the accounts which the evangelists have given of the cure of a blind man, in the vicinity of Jericho, there exists a difficulty utterly incompatible with the notion of divine inspiration. Luke states that the transaction occurred as our Savior was approaching towards Jericho; while Matthew and Mark represent it as having taken place after his departure from it.

(2) Let the reader next turn to the accounts furnished of the embalming of Christ at the tomb, by Matthew, Mark, and Luke; and compare those accounts with the narrative which John gives of the transaction, and the discrepancies will be seen to defy human ingenuity to remove them. John, who often appears anxious to rectify the trivial errors of the preceding evangelists, informs us, in this case, that previous to the entombing of the Savior's body, it was embalmed by Nicodemus and Joseph; i.e. on the Friday evening; and that this was done with the full knowledge of Mary and the other women, who were present at the crucifixion. Matthew, Mark, and Luke, however, state that the spices for embalming the body were purchased by the women after the entombing, it being intended to perform the process of embalming on the Sunday morning.

(3) The numerous variations existing in the several narratives of the resurrection are obvious enough to every reader of the Gospels; the numerous and fruitless efforts that have been made to remove them sufficiently demonstrate them to be more than apparent.

(4) To mention one case more: In the accounts which three of the evangelists have given of a dispute that took place amongst the disciples, for pre-eminence in the kingdom of the Messiah, and of the conversation which subsequently took place between them and our Savior, there is a very marked and striking difference; but between two of the narratives this difference is so great as to render them utterly irreconcileable with each other. According to Matthew, the disciples came to Jesus to ask who should be the greatest in the kingdom of heaven. According to Mark, however, the dispute amongst the disciples arose on the way from Galilee to Capernaum; and on their arrival in the town, our Savior excited their surprise by discovering to them his knowledge of the controversy in which they had been engaged. He was the first to notice the occurrence. He asked them of what they had been disputing on the way; and so far do they appear to have been from soliciting his opinion, that they hesitated to answer his question as to the fact, being by that time convinced of the error and sin into which they had been betrayed.

12. These discrepancies might be greatly multiplied, but it is unnecessary to add to their number. One such discrepancy, if its existence be assumed, is as conclusive against the plenary inspiration of the narrative in which it is found, as a thousand of them would be; for it is to be observed, that the cases we have produced are not cases in which there is a mere variation in the mode of relating a transaction, one writer supplying what another omitted; they involve direct and palpable contradictions; and, notwithstanding all the labor and ingenuity which have been expended upon them, they are utterly incapable of being removed.

13. Now, however unimportant such variations in the text of the sacred narratives may be, viewed in themselves, and however little they affect the general credit of the writers, as faithful and trust-worthy historians, they are, as we have said, wholly irreconcileable with the notion of a constant divine inspiration; for where this exists, there must be an absence of all error. To suppose, as some have done, that these contradictions have been allowed for the purpose of inducing a reliance upon the divine communications, even where they are contradictory to human reason, appears to be, not only a palpable begging of the question, but to savor of so much absurdity, as to preclude a serious answer. The inspiration of any writing is only to be gathered from internal evidence; and where this evidence makes against the assumption, the ease is clearly and finally settled.

14. We may ask, too, What is gained by contending for the inspiration of those parts of Scripture which are the subjects of this inquiry? By its abandonment, no evidence of the divine origin of Christianity is given up — no doctrine of the Christian faith is rendered questionable or nugatory. These are not founded upon the fidelity with which the minutiae of events are detailed; but upon the fact of certain great occurrences, and upon the truth of certain annunciations, whose inspiration is placed beyond question. Of the truth of this remark, all persons appear to be fully sensible when engaged in defending the outworks of Christianity against the assaults of the deist. In controversy with such a one, no advocate of Christianity attempts to argue the inspiration of the sacred records; all his efforts are directed to exhibit the proofs and confirmatory evidences of their genuineness, authenticity, and general credibility; and it is only when these points have been settled, that the question of inspiration is adverted to.

15. In conclusion, it may be remarked, that the absence of plenary inspiration, and the existence of such discrepancies in the narratives of Scripture as those now pointed out, not only do not tend to weaken the evidences of the Christian revelation, but, on the contrary, contribute most effectually to strengthen and confirm them. A universally-inspired writing can contain no real contradiction, because this implies a departure, more or less, from the precise truth — the prevention of which enters into all our notions of inspiration. This has ever been felt by the advocates of plenary inspiration; and hence the laborious but fruitless attempts to gloss over difficulties that could not be removed, and to disguise and mystify contradictions that could not be reconciled. To the conscientious deist these considerations must ever present an insuperable difficulty in the way of embracing Christianity, while they become to the timid Christian a fruitful source of disquietude and perplexity. Let the evangelical histories, however, be regarded in the character in which they present themselves to the world. Let them be considered as mere historical compositions where they assume no other character; let their credibility be tried by the same tests as any other literary work of the same species; let their general agreement among themselves, and with other historical documents, be urged as incontestable proofs of their authenticity, while their unimportant discrepancies are exhibited as proofs of the absence of all concert among the writers, and of their independent modes of proceeding; and nothing will be lost, but much will be gained, by abandoning the notion of a universal inspiration in the writings composing the Holy Bible.

16. We have thus established the proposition originally laid down; namely, that the

* This tr. of the apostle's words is supported by the best authorities, almost all the versions, and by many of the fathers, and certainly does Dr. A. Clarke, who thus tr., says, 'The particle kai, and, is omitted by not agree well with the text.' — Comment, in loco

Scriptures are the media through which the divine revelation is made to mankind, and also succeeded, we hope, in relieving the subject from some of the difficulties with which it is generally encumbered. If such be the character and claims of the sacred writings, then—if they be the only source of divine knowledge, the only authenticated medium through which the will of God and the knowledge of and preparation for a future state of life and immortality are to be obtained—how gratefully and devoutly should we avail ourselves of their light, and submit to their teachings! ‘Coming to the word of God, we are like children brought into the conversation of experienced men, and we should humbly listen and reverently inquire; or we are like raw recruits introduced into high and polished life, and we should unlearn our coarseness, and copy the habits of the station: nay, we are like offenders caught, and for amendment committed to the bosom of honorable society, with the power of regaining our lost condition, and inheriting honor and trust. Therefore we should walk softly and tenderly, covering our former reproach with modesty and humbleness, hastening to redeem our reputation by distinguished performances, against offence doubly guarded, doubly watchful for opportunities to demonstrate our recovered goodness’*—[doubly careful in forming that character which goes into eternity!]

CHAPTER II.

THE OBJECT OF DIVINE REVELATION.

The Necessity for a Divine Revelation—The great Objects of Revelation—The Harm my subtiring amongst the various Portions of Revelation—The Law introductory and preparatory of the Gospel—Divine Revelation gradually developed—Its Congeniality with the Nature and Dignities of Man.

In discussing the media of Divine Revelation we have been compelled to speak incidentally of its object; but we must now advert to this topic more particularly, and at large.

1. Had time been nought but stagnant duration, and man been exempt from the ravages of death, no excursive conjecture would have wandered to the future, nor life been darkened by the shadow of its expected end. We should have comprehended our destiny, and experience would have supplied all the knowledge our necessities required. But our days are numbered, and our experience limited. That natural life would terminate, mankind have always been conscious: yet, to follow the victim of death beyond the tomb, and ascertain whether existence was continued or became extinct; to determine whether this was the only world in which man lived, or but an incipient stage of being indissolubly connected with the future,—human powers were wholly inadequate. But of all uncertainties, that which relates to existence or annihilation is the most gloomy and terrible. Its tendency is to induce a stubborn apathy which prevents enjoyment, while it suspends apprehension, and renders man insensible to happiness as well as to danger. Of the anxiety of mankind to ascertain the realities and certainty of a future life, we have abundant proofs. It was the great object of solicitude with the most enlightened of the heathen philosophers; but their unaided reason never carried them beyond the probability of immortality. Man’s reason was compelled to abase itself, after every attempt to penetrate into the future, and to confess its impotence whenever it affected to scan the unseen mysteries of the eternal world.

2. To illuminate that which was obscure; to turn doubt into certainty; to convert inference into proof, and to relieve the wretchedness of incessant and anxious conjecture; to extend the vision of faith where the eye of reason failed, and declare that happiness which hope had sought for in vain; to supply virtue with renovated motives, and appall wickedness by the misery which its commission entails; to change the aspect of humanity, and irradiate the prospects of man;—these were the great objects for which revelation was made, and for which it is preserved and handed down to mankind.

3. But though revelation refers principally to the future state of man, its assurances and requisitions include the greatest possible degree of present happiness. To know that when the present life shall terminate, our existence will commence in a higher sphere; that intellect shall be eternally expanded by fresh accessions of knowledge; that the sympathies shall increase with enlightened ardor, and be exercised upon elevated and multiplied objects; that the virtuous associations of earth shall be purified and recommended; that we are the objects of the divine solicitude and protection, and are regenerated and exalted by his love;—are sufficient to create present delight, as well as to allay all apprehension and anxiety as to the future. The prospective objects of revelation thus unite with its more immediate operations; and, what is not to be overlooked, there is, between the end and the means, the happiness and its materia, a visible connection, a mutual concordance as of natural cause and effect.

4. What we have said of revelation generally comprehends all its parts. The spirit, import, and objects of the law, were in exact accordance with those of the gospel.† There is an opposition, but the strictest harmony, between them. If the evangelical and apostolic writings were penmed that we might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that, believing, we might have life through his name? (In 2031), it is not less true, that eternal life through a divine mediator is the great doctrine inculcated and illustrated throughout the law and the prophets. The revelation, it is true, was gradually unfolded [according to the spiritual state and capacities of those who received it]. Its full light did not burst upon mankind at once; they would have been unable to bear it. Hence it seems to be most wisely established in the divine decrees, that a ceremonial worship and a sacrificial service should everywhere precede the worship ‘in spirit and in truth.’ We find, therefore, among all the pagan nations, imposing ceremonies, and among the Jews, also, a splendid external worship; but—and here is the striking difference—monothelism, and a symbolic and typical meaning, stamp upon the Israelitish worship a peculiar character.‡ The religious laws of the Jews had plainly two grand objects in view:—to inscribe monothelism upon the very tablet of the heart, and to awaken a lively sense of sin. The priesthood and the law were ordained for this purpose. Hence we find such frequent and striking allusions to humility in the Old Testament. ‘The Lord is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart, and saith such as be of a contrite spirit.’ Ps. 34:13. ‘He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?’ Mi. 6:8. ‘For thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity; I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones.’ Is. 58:15. ‘For all these things hath mine hand made, and all those things have been, saith the Lord: but to this man will I look, even to him that is poor, and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word.’ Is. 66:2. ‘He resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble.’ Sin, sin, then, is the word which is heard again and again in the O. T.; and had it not there for centuries rung in the ear, and fastened on the conscience, the joyful sound of grace for grace could not have been heard, at the time of Christ, as the watchword of the N. T. What need of grace have those heathen who will hear nothing of sin, while, alas! they feel too much of its destructive consequences? To this end was the whole system of sacrifices; to this end, the priesthood—that all flesh might know that it is grass. It was obviously essential that thereby the law should prepare the way for Christianity. In every view, the sacrificial worship must be regarded as one of the most unaccountable institutions of the ancient world. Strange, indeed, that uncorrupted nature even, without the aid of grace, should feel, in so lively a manner, its dependence upon God, and its deep pollution! The belief also is one only God, what a tone of genuine piety it produced! This, as Professor Tholuck remarks,§ has not been hitherto sufficiently appreciated. The gods of the Greeks were exalted men, who, being unequal in might, were embroiled in continual contentions. As he who knows no better protection and no surer defence than the favor of a powerful party, never can attain to quietude and tranquillity, but is at one time full of anxiety lest his party should be forced to succumb, at another disputed with soleitude, lest he should lose his favor, must cherish in his bosom an everlasting conflict and dread; so also was it impossible that an unclouded spiritual life should dawn in the bosom of a serious-minded Greek. He could not say, with the Psalmist, ‘Truly my soul waiteth upon God.’ An unceasing ebb and flow must have disquieted the fainting heart, when one deity was known to hurl defiance in the face of another.|| Such was far from being the case with the He-

* Irving, Oracle of God, pp. 21, 22.

† The following remark of Josephus is most important, and quite relevant to our purpose: ‘To account for our steadfast faith in God and his commandments, it is necessary to recur to the fact, that our system of laws was far more useful than that of any other nation. For Moses regarded all the virtues as subordinate parts of piety to God, and not piety as a mere subdivision of virtue. In his legislation, he recognizes all the actions as having anaphorai pros Therum, ar-lution to God.’ Contr. Ap. ii. 16.

‡ The entire religious system of the Jews is, in the most appropriate sense, a prophecy; and the individual passages of their sacred books are merely the strongest expressions of that spirit which enlivens the whole mass. To the same purpose are the passages, Col. 2:17, and He. 10:1, where the skia, or shadow, is the obscure and imperfect resemblance, which falls so far short of the glorious splendor of the reality, that it can excite but very faint ideas of it. Lehmann, Letter to Harris, p. 48, and Rau, Ueber die Typologie, p. 71, quoted in Tholuck’s Hints on the Importance of the Study of the O. T. p. 259. [The Jews were the nation best fitted for the Mosaic dispensation, as being peculiarly superstitious and external; which is proved by their excessive and astonishing multiplication of ceremonies and external observances beyond even what the Mosaic law required; as shown in Baator’s Rabbinica. Noble, on Rev., also contends that it is ‘perfectly evident, that had that book been written by John as an express commentary upon the O. T., it could not have taught us more clearly than it does, that every thing relating to the Jews, to their worship, and to the countries and cities inhabited by them, and by the nations with whom they had intercourse, as recorded by the pen of inspiration, had symbolic and spiritual meaning.’ But Christians in general confine the typical sense of the history to a few points expressly authorized by our Lord and the writers of the N. T., as, for example, Jn. 3:11, 15, &c. &c. Ed.

|| Aeschylus, Prometheus, verse 1045, ed. Glasgow.

brew. He knew that his God was the God of heaven and earth, who gave to all nations their habitations, to whom 'every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall swear.' Is. 45:23. The effects of this constant flowing forth of the heart towards the only living and the true God, are known to those who lead a spiritual life. That it means, to look away from man, and to look solely to God, was well understood by all the holy men of the Jewish and the Christian church, by all the martyrs, and by Luther also, when he replied to the prime elector, ' You cannot protect me by your might, but I can protect you by my prayers.'

5. Such were the effects of the faith in the only true God. Still more benevolent was the faith in the only living God, as the Holy One who reigns above the powers of nature. Of course, there was nothing in the heathen system by which the soul of man might range beyond the limits of time. Nay, terrestrial things were even consecrated in the eye of the Greek. It seemed, therefore, in him temerity to lift himself above them, and see them beneath his feet.

6. If we direct our attention to the political portion of the Law, we shall find that in this respect the institutions of Moses will cope with those of any other nation. The natural sentiment of humanity and equity was laid at the foundation, and from this principle proceeded most of the commands.

Witness the humanity and gentleness towards strangers, widows, orphans, and even beasts. How tender [especially when we consider the intolerant nationality of olden time] is the prohibition (Ex. 22:21, 23:9), 'Thou shalt neither vex a stranger nor oppress him; for ye know the heart of a stranger, seeing ye were strangers in the land of Egypt.' And again (Le. 19:31), 'But the stranger that dwelleth with you shall be unto you as one born among you; and thou shalt love him as thyself.' Witness also the numerous commands concerning widows and orphans; * and, before all other commands, those which enjoin as follows: 'Thou shalt love God supremely, and thy neighbor as thyself.'

7. This law and this religious service were, it is true, a mere raith. They became about the time of our Savior more and more spiritless and nerveless. Then it was that the winged Psyche burst from its chrysalis state, and extended its wings toward heaven. Until this happened, holy men were sent continually, down to a very late period, who breathed forth the spirit of the Almighty, and enlivened the age; but when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son;† the law was communicated, the prophecies were fulfilled, and the revelations of the Almighty were divested of all their obscurity.

8. Such, briefly stated, are the great object and gradual development of divine revelation. Had it only amused the fancy with rhapsodies of future exaltation; had it prescribed no conditions and required no obedience; had it effected nothing but the expansion of eager hope and impious desire,—there would have been no visible and rational connection between the cause and the effect. It would have been a matter of investigation, and not of reason. But now its first principles rest on individual consciousness and experience. It proclaims that which has been attested by the collective generations of mankind, that the human heart is evil, that evil incurs punishment, and induces misery, so long as it exists. It proposes to emancipate man from darkness and sin, to renovate his nature, and recover him from spiritual and moral degradation. Its influence does not terminate on the external man. It is not a code of mere outward morality—a species of man to conceal inherent defects: it penetrates the latent source of action; it demands an entire conversion from [selfishness], and a restoration of the image of God in the human heart. It implies, indeed, a spiritual resurrection—an utter extinction of the corruptions of the natural man. [Notes, 1 Jn. 5:3. Ju. v. 10.] Is not this an object worthy of the Almighty, and identified with the highest and most enduring interests of his creatures?

CHAPTER III.

THE EVIDENCES OF DIVINE REVELATION.

The accumulated and concurrent Evidence of Revelation — the Genuineness of the Scriptures — the Authenticity of the Scriptures — Integrity of the Text — Proofs that the Scriptures constitute a Divine Revelation: Miracles; Prophecy; the Doctrines of Christianity; the Spread and Revival of the Gospel — Recapitulation.

The only difficulty connected with the subject to which this chapter relates, arises from the vast accumulation of materials before us, and the necessity of making such a selection as shall indicate the nature and value of the several parts, without weakening or destroying the effect of the whole.

SECTION I

THE ACCUMULATED EVIDENCES OF REVELATION.

1. 'Whenever the truth of Christianity is examined,' says an able writer, 'there is a certain body of evidence which, taken together, constitutes the proper and adequate answer to that inquiry; which evidence, therefore, ought not to be divided so long as the inquiry is supposed to be still open. If it be asked, what are the constituent parts of this body of evidence, they include, among other topics, the following, most commonly insisted on:—The miracles of our Savior and his apostles—the series of prophecy—the extraordinary perfection and sanctity of Christ's moral doctrine—his own character as expressed in his life upon earth—the rapid and triumphant propagation of his religion under the special circumstances of that event—the singular adaptation of the religion itself to the nature and condition of man, both in its form and in its essential provisions. These topics, prominent as they are when separately taken, compose only one subject of connected and harmonizing proof. However deficient the ground and principle of reason in each of them may be, the effect of them is to be united; and it bears upon one and the same point in combining to make up that moral evidence by which it has pleased the Almighty to ascertain his last revelation to us. And as each of these arguments, supposing the matter of them to be truly alleged, possesses some force in concluding upon the question at issue, so it may be observed of them—which indeed is only a modification of the same remark—that they are all of a kind which it comes within the power of our common reason to apprehend; and they are satisfactory, because they are so intelligible, and answer entirely to the natural sense and judgment of our minds, independently of the accidents of previous study, or of any peculiar modes of thinking. Agreeably to the design of the religion itself, they carry with them a universality of application. Prophecy, verified in the accomplishment of its predictions, attests the authentic inspiration by which it was given: miracles—public, unequivocal miracles—exhibited, bring home to the very senses of men the intervention of a divine power. Competently witnessed and recorded, they transmit the conviction from age to age. Unexampled and perfect moral purity of doctrine seems to be, in fact, what it pretends to be—an emanation from the source of all rectitude and holiness. The life and character of the Founder of Christianity have no prototype in the examples of human virtue. The fitness of his religion, in every part of it, to the exigencies of the being to whom it is tendered, gives to it a compensatory practical authority which almost suspends the labor of deduction, by an intimacy of use and relation, identifying the very nature of man, in his greatest needs, his best hopes, and his most rational desires, with the resources of the dispensation tendered to his acceptance. Such are the force and tenor of the evidences of Christianity, if, as we have said, the matter of them be duly alleged; i. e. if we have well-attested miracles and prophecies, and the other arguments have a ground in fact. The defenders of revelation have vindicated these several arguments; and the obvious state of the case, after it has been examined, compels us, on the lowest assumption, to allow a considerable weight to each. But we speak now of the arguments in their kind, as distinguished from their degree. Their great simplicity and reasonableness are such,

if any person of a candid mind were to lay down, beforehand, what would be the most prevailing inducements to his belief of a revelation, he could not, we think, easily mention any other in kind than such as we find we possess. The actual various attestations of Christianity, external and internal—it's august apparatus of prophecies and miracles—the excellency of its constitution, in its laws, doctrines, and sanctions—it's power in subduing the labored opposition of the world—with the glory of its Founder illuminating his religion by the signs of a divine presence in his own person;—these furnish to us whatever our most deliberate judgment could have suggested, had it been permitted to us to choose the grounds of our belief. It now appeals to that judgment with an integrity of claim which we shall seek in vain to resist, without invalidating the most certain principles of all our knowledge.*

2. The value and importance of the accumulated and concurring evidence of revelation, as here stated, are too frequently lost sight of by Christians as well as by unbelievers. The separation of the essential branches of the combined subject is too apt as this writer intimates, to limit our conception of the whole nature of it, for the time, at least, to the train of thought which it presents before us. The separation made seems to have the effect of staking the fortune and issue of the whole cause upon the selected ground of argument, narrowing the subject down to the reduced compass within which we are busied in viewing it, and transferring the imperfection of our details of thought to the substance of more enlarged truth. It may be that the amount of the proof deducible from any one branch of the evidences of divine revelation, does not in itself exceed such a probability as any man may choose to admit; yet, when the several indecessions to one and the same conclusion of belief, arising out of the several branches of evidence, are drawn into each other, the joint amount of them, derived as they are from such different sources, is a collection of moral proof which we cannot properly describe as being less than that of a cogent and conclusive demonstration.

3. It is obviously impossible, within the limits of a single ch. of such a work as this, to discuss these topics in detail: to do them the merest justice would require an ample volume. Referring our readers, therefore, to those works in which the evidences of revelation are professedly and formally treated of, we must be content simply to indicate the outlines of the accumulated argument, without attempting to fill it up, or to supply the necessary proofs and illustrations.

SECTION II.

THE GENUINENESS OF THE BIBLICAL BOOKS.

1. The first thing that suggests itself to the mind of an inquirer, relative to the evidences of revelation, concerns the genuineness of the books in which it purports to be made. If these books were not written by the persons who assume to have been their authors, or if they were not written at the times, and published at the places, at which they purport to have been written and published; — in other words, if they be spurious or supposititious productions, instead of genuine and, in every respect, veritable ones; — it is clear that no reliance can be placed upon their contents, as no confidence can be reposed in their authors. On such a supposition, they must have originated in unworthy motives, or their authors must have had some object in speaking untruth: in either case, they forfeit the character of honest and trustworthy men, and we are under no moral obligation to give credit to their declarations. It is, therefore, of the utmost importance to ascertain how the question pertaining to the genuineness of the biblical books stands, and to know upon what grounds we call upon persons to receive them as the genuine and accredited productions of the prophets, evangelists, and apostles.*

2. The questions, by what person, at what time, and in what circumstances any document has been written, are questions of fact which, like all similar questions, must be determined according to the nature and sufficiency of the evidence through which the knowledge of all facts of the same kind is originally acquired. It is not necessary to discuss here the question of historical testimony, or its admissibility in inquiries of this nature. No person will seriously dispute that it is the exclusive ground of our belief in numerous and momentous cases. Our knowledge of the various phenomena placed within the sphere of our perception is acquired either by consciousness or sensation; and for the existence of these things, we have evidence beyond which it is impossible to ascend — the evidence of an ultimate law of thought, when, if the objects of it are mental, we can refer them to the testimony of consciousness; or, if material, to the testimony of that sense by which they are naturally perceived. But how is such belief to be produced, when this direct evidence cannot be had? when, from distance, or length of time, we can have no consciousness of mental, and no perception of material phenomena? Are the boundaries of rational belief fixed by the limits within which these perceptions take place? To what a little portion of facts would our knowledge then have extended! But, no; it is at this line, beyond which our own direct perceptions cannot reach, that human testimony comes in, as a rational ground of belief, to extend the range of human knowledge. What we cannot know from our own perceptions, we may learn through the testimony of others, by whom it has been perceived; and here, again, we have reached another ultimate principle, beyond which, in the circumstances supposed, it is impossible to go for evidence; namely, when we refer any thing asserted to have been thought or done, to the unexceptionable testimony of the person or persons who had the original, direct, and appropriate perception of the fact.[†]

3. Now, this reasoning is immediately applicable to the genuineness of the books composing the Holy Scriptures, which, like any other fact, has its appropriate mode of perception, that must, at some time or other, have been directly exercised, and to which primary original evidence it must be referred before it can be rationally believed. But it is evident, that it will not be enough for the satisfaction of those who could not have this primary evidence, to refer the facts to testimony, of the source of which no account can be given. The testimony must not only have originally emanated from its proper source, namely, the authors or writers themselves, but the intervening links in the chain of testimony by which this is brought down to us must, in some way or other, be traced back, and hung to the consciousness of the minds whose thoughts the writings contain; and then the whole and each separate part must be subjected to the ordinary tests of valid evidence. If this be fairly done, and the result be satisfactory, no man can refuse his assent to the genuineness of such writings, and at the same time maintain his character as a rational being.

4. What, then, are these tests, and how are they to be applied, in examining the evidence for the genuineness of the Scriptures? The criteria by which human evidence must, in every important case, be tried, turn upon the invariable connection which subsists between the intellectual and moral powers of man, joined with the circumstances in which he is placed, on the one hand; and, on the other, the conduct which he will follow when possessed of these powers, and placed in these circumstances. We cannot absolutely, and previously to all inquiry, trust to his depositions in any important matter of fact. Why? Because his knowledge and integrity are not free from defect. He may be wrong in his testimony, from not distinctly knowing the fact; or he may render his testimony false, by wilfully misrepresenting it. Here there is nothing so fixed, as to render all his depositions in themselves the proper object of implicit trust. But between accurate knowledge, strict integrity, and strong inducements to learn and state the truth, on the one hand, and, on the other, evidence correctly and fairly given, there is a fixed and invariable connection. The one cannot be without the other, for it would amount to a contradiction. We can inquire, then, into the knowledge, character, and circumstances of the witness; for if these be found unexceptionable, we may with certainty infer the truth of his deposition; and, by parity of reasoning, we may see that, if these qualities entitle the deposition of one man to our belief, we are not at liberty to withhold that belief from the deposition of another, possessed of the same qualifications. But besides this, we may examine the deposition itself; for there may be in it such decided marks of consistency and truth as will entitle us to infer, with equal certainty, the knowledge and integrity with which it has been made. In the one case, we reason from cause to effect; in the other, from effect to cause. Were there no such fixed connection as is here supposed, or none which could be trusted, then there would be no test whatever for trying human testimony; and wherever we ourselves had no experience, we should be left, according as the original propensity to trust in it prevailed or decayed, to receive whatever is said with blind credulity, or to reject it with absolute disbelief.

5. Now, this view of the question suggests the propriety of dividing the evidence for the genuineness of a book into two branches; namely, that derived from the testimony of unexceptionable witnesses, and that derived from the internal character of the book itself. This is amply sufficient to prove the genuine character of any writing whatever, and is applicable to the books of Scripture.

6. The limits necessarily assigned to this inquiry will only permit us, as we have said, to glance at the outlines of the argument; the details must be supplied by the researches and reflections of our readers. From the same necessity, we must also confine ourselves to a consideration of the books of the N. T. If the divine character of these can be satisfactorily shown, that of the O. T. will inevitably follow. In the latter Scriptures, the former are uniformly spoken of as ‘the oracles of God’ — ‘the sure word of prophecy’ — ‘the God-inspired writings,’ proceeding from holy men who were moved by the Holy Spirit, and, as such, entitled to implicit belief. Although, therefore, an investigation into the direct and immediate evidence for the genuineness, authenticity, and supreme authority of the O. T. cannot fail to be attended with much gratification and advantage, and to strengthen very materially the conviction produced by a more limited inquiry, it is by no means essential or indispensable, in order to justify our reception of all and every part of the sacred volume.

7. Let us now advert to the nature of that external evidence of which we are possessed, attesting the genuineness of the books composing this sacred volume.

SECTION III.

EXTERNAL EVIDENCE OF THE GENUINENESS OF THE BIBLICAL BOOKS.

1. The New Testament contains 27 books, purporting to have been written by certain persons, under specified circumstances, and at a particular period of time. These books are as follow: — (1) Five HISTORICAL BOOKS; namely, four Gospels, and the Acts of the Apostles, assigned respectively to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John; the Acts being written by the author of the third Gospel. (2) Fourteen EPISTLES by PAUL, addressed to the following Christian societies and persons: one to that of Rome, two to that at Corinth, one to those in Galatia, one to that at Ephesus, one to that at Philippi, one to that at Colosse, two to that at Thessalonica, one to the Hebrews, two to Timothy, one to Titus, and one to Philemon. (3) Seven EPISTLES by OTHER APOSTLES; namely, one by James, two by Peter, three by John, and one by Jude. (4) The APOCALYPSE, which forms a class of itself, of a prophetic character, and assuming to be written by John.

2. Now, the mode of applying those tests of which mention has been made, to the genuineness of these books, is determined by the nature of the fact, and our vicinity to or distance from the time of the persons who could be the primary witnesses in the case. Those who lived in the days and had access to the presence of the apostles, could, upon the publication of their reputed works, apply directly to them, and obtain at its source all the information necessary to satisfy them that these persons had really composed the works, and announced them as their own. The circumstances in which these persons had lived, their opportunities of gaining the information which they recorded, the tried integrity of their moral character, — all of which particulars could then be easily and thoroughly ascertained, — would place it beyond the possibility of doubt, that they must in truth have composed the writings which were circulated in their names. To us, who cannot thus immediately approach the witnesses who are represented to have given the original testimony, it is left gradually to ascend to them, by applying the proper tests of evidence to the whole intervening succession of subordinate witnesses; with regard to all of whom, if it appeared by the application of the tests that they must have had the knowledge and in-

* The author has borrowed much of what follows from a small work published some time since, for purposes similar to those in which the Books of N. T. present work originated.

[†] These positions are amplified and illustrated in Cook's Inq. into tegrity essential to their credit, a case would be made out in which it must have been as impossible that the New Testament, if a forgery, could ever have been received in the character of apostolical writings, as that the apostles could have allowed the writings to circulate in their name.

3. In many of these books, the declaration of their authorship comes prima facie from the writers themselves. So it is with the Epistles to the Romans, Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Thessalonians, Timothy, Titus, and Philemon; with the Epistles of Peter, James, Jude; with the Apocalypse, and even, perhaps, with the Second and Third Epistles of John; in all of which the proper name of the ostensible writer, or an epithet by which he might easily be discriminated, is so incorporated with the work, that it must have come from the pen of the real author. Whether the authors of the Gospels of John, and of Luke, and of the book of Acts, be considered as indicated, the one as the beloved disciple of Jesus, the other as the correspondent of Theophilus, the declaration which we are considering, although not explicitly made in the works themselves, might have been made by the writers in the circles where their writings were first read; nor is there any other way of satisfactorily accounting for their early reception into a class of writings whose genuineness was so publicly proclaimed. At all events, the evidence for the genuineness of each book must, in so far, be estimated separately by itself, that no seeming defect in the evidence for one can take from the evidence of another.

4. Now, the only point here to be determined is this—Were the persons who made these declarations well-informed and honest men? for then alone can we determine whether their assertions are to be trusted. The best ground on which we can believe the assertion of any witness is, our own personal acquaintance with his information and character; next to that, the same acquaintance with him on the part of one with whom we are acquainted; and so on, in a line, to any extent, each immediately successive part vouching for the integrity of the preceding. But such a concatenation of testimony is not to be found in support of any ancient fact, and we supply the defect by considering the circumstances in which witnesses give their evidence, and inferring from their character, as previously suggested, the veracity of any particular assertion.

5. But with reference to the N. T. writings, we are not left entirely to this general inference, satisfactory as are the grounds upon which it rests; for after having ascended on it to a certain point in the evidence, we come to written testimony, still extant, by the very men, who not only lived in the days, but were themselves companions of the apostles. Such were Barnabas, the companion of Paul (Ac. 4:36); Clement, a fellow-laborer with that apostle (Phil. 1:3); Hermas, one of the faithful brethren, whom he greets in his Epistle to the Romans (16: 11); Ignatius, the friend and associate of the apostles; and Polycarp, the disciple of John. Now, the testimony of these writers, as they have given it, is next, in point of authority and value, to that of the original writers themselves, and it goes full to confirm their depositions.

6. It is impossible, within the space assigned to this inquiry, that we should follow the entire chain of this evidence, in a regular series. There is not a single work, out of all the scientific writings of the Greeks and Romans, the age and origin of which might be established by so many witnesses and writers, who lived near to the time, as the N. T. For the purpose of establishing this position, the writings of the oldest fathers of the church have been examined with indefatigable research, and the passages collected which have reference to the N. T., by Lardner, and others who followed in his laudable career.* The result of this investigation has been to show that the books of the N. T. are quoted, or alluded to, as the genuine works of those persons whose names they bear, by a series of Christian writers, beginning with those already referred to, who were contemporary with the apostles, and proceeding in close and regular succession from their time to the present. This medium of proof, as Paley remarks, is, of all others, the most unquestionable, the least liable to any practices of fraud, and is not diminished by the lapse of ages. Bp. Burnet, he adds, in the History of his Own Times, inserts various extracts from Lord Clarendon's History. One such insertion is a proof that Lord Clarendon's History was extant at the time when Bp. Burnet wrote; that it had been read by Burnet; that it was received by him as the work of Lord Clarendon, and also regarded by him as an authentic account of the transactions which it relates; and it will be a proof of these points a thousand years hence, or as long as the books exist.]

7. Let so much of this argument as is applicable to the writings composing the N. T.—which have been quoted and referred to as above stated—be carefully attended to by the reader, and it can leave nothing to be desired in the establishment of their age and authorship. Their authenticity or truth is another matter, and is to be sustained by independent proofs.

8. But it should not be left unnoticed, that the species of proof at which we have been glancing, arises not only out of the direct and incidental testimony of persons friendly to the cause of Christianity, but from that also of its secret and avowed enemies, or such as seceded from the orthodox church, and were on no terms of good understanding with it. The first ages of Christianity produced a multitude of sects, which were anxious to unite their philosophical and theological speculations with the doctrines of the gospel, and frequently lost themselves in strange admixtures of opinion—in beautiful, but much oftener in ridiculous, dreams. Yet even these sought to establish their assertions on the authority of the biblical books, and thus prove them against those indulging different sentiments, especially against the dominant church. Their writings, indeed, are, for the most part, lost, and were destroyed on purpose, for which we have but little reason to thank piety. But the zeal of refuting them has occasionally preserved some fragments of their treatises, and their opponents have retained proofs which they adduced in support of their positions.[†] Of these sects we may refer to the Cerinthians, the Ebionites, the Nicolaitans, the Valentinians, the Marcionites, and the Basilidians, all of whom existed in the 2d century, and some of them at the close of the 1st; and also to the Sabellians, the Novatians, the Donatists, the Manicheans, the Priscillianists, the Photinians, and the Arians, who flourished in the 3d and 4th centuries. Among the individuals of the classes we are referring to, and deserving especial notice, may be mentioned Tatian, Julius Cassian, Theodosius, Heraclion, and Isidorus, who all lived in the 2d century, and seceded from the orthodox communities by whom they were opposed and refuted. Nor should we omit to refer to Celsus, the Epicurean philosopher, who attacked Christianity with great skill and vehemence towards the close of the 2d century; to Porphyry, one of the most severe and sensible adversaries of the Christian religion antiquity can produce, who flourished about the middle of the 3d century; or to the emperor and apostate Julian, whose mode of opposing the Christian system was as artful as it was determined and persevering, who flourished about a century later.[‡] These parties and persons knew too well the evidence by which the genuineness of the N. T. writings was supported, to think of denying or calling it in question; and their positive or implied testimony is of immense importance. They may, as Michællis remarks, have denied an apostle to be an infallible teacher, and therefore have banished his writings from the sacred canon; but they no where contend or insinuate that the apostle is not the author of the book or books which bear his name.

9. Another and equally satisfactory source of testimony to the genuineness of the Christian writings, are those very early translations which were made of them into other languages, the authors of which have ascribed the anonymous books of Scripture to the same writers as they are now attributed to, and have, of course, recognized the claims of the penmen of the acknowledged books. The earliest of these is the Peshito or literal Syriac version, which is ascertained, upon undoubted evidence, to have been made, at the latest, towards the close of the 2d century, and is attributed, upon grounds of very high probability, to the close of the 1st or to the earlier part of the 2d century. All the Christian sects in Syria and the East make use of this version, exclusively, and hold it in the highest estimation. Then there is the old Italic or ancient Latin version, which was certainly made before the end of the 2d century, as it was then quoted by Tertullian; there is good reason to think that it was made even much earlier than this. Now, these versions furnish a most important external or historical evidence for the antiquity and genuineness of the N. T., since it must necessarily have existed previously to the making of them; and a book which was so early and so universally read throughout the East in the Syriac, and throughout Europe and Africa in the Latin, must be able to lay a well-founded and indisputable claim to a high antiquity; while the correspondence of these versions with the existing copies of the original attests the genuineness, if not the authenticity, of the latter.

SECTION IV.

INTERNAL EVIDENCE OF THE GENUINENESS OF THE BIBLICAL BOOKS.

1. Prof. Hug has introduced the discussion of the internal evidence for the genuineness of the historical books of the N. T. in the following manner: 'Should any one, without knowing any thing further of them, anywhere unexpectedly find the writings, and being thus furnished, open them with the necessary scrutiny, what opinion would such a man form of their origin, age, and composers, solely from their internal state?' From the answer which the learned and acute professor has given to this inquiry, the following particulars are abridged:

(1) Such a person would say that they were written in Greek; yet in none of the popular dialects of that language, but with a variation of expression and construction, which is so frequently approximated to the Heb. in the use of words and in grammatical connection, that he would account the authors to have been, as Christians assert, Jews who spoke Greek.

(2) These books also contain so little of science and the historic art, that they manifestly are the essays of uneducated men, who, with the exception of a certain acquaintance with the Jewish writings, lay no pretensions to information and literature. The narration itself is so constituted, that it represents them, notwithstanding its brevity, as having the demeanor of persons engaged in traffic; it depicts their situation and motion from place to place, the parts which the spectators bore, their expressions, their actions, and their appearance. This also is precisely what the Christians say of these books, namely, that they were written by native Jews of plebeian origin and rank, without any literary education, who were, either as eye-witnesses, or by means of eye-witnesses, informed of the events they have described.

(3) The perfect description of the age and country — of the municipal regulations and manners — of the history and geography — and of the circumstances under which the events narrated in the N. T. occurred, is such as could have been given by none but contemporary writers.

(4) The incidental agreement subsisting between these writings and the ascertained events and circumstances of the times is, of all others, perhaps, the most convincing evidence that they were penned at the time, and in the places to which they are ascribed. Thus were the Jews circumstanced, as the N. T. implies, with reference to foreign nations and regulations which crept into their system, and gave to their national condition a bias which it first had under Herod the Great, but never afterwards.

(a) The invidious question of the census contains in it all the re-awakened prejudices of the Jews, and exhibits their disposition towards the Romans as it really was (Josephus, Wars, b. ii. c. 12). The precept of reconciliation in Mat. 5:25, was enjoined in every item with a view to the Roman law de injuriis, according to which the complainant, with his own hand, dragged the accused before the judge, without magisterial summons, in ius rapid, yet, according to which, on the road, an agreement, transactio, remains open to him; but should not this be accomplished, the mulet assuredly awaits him, which if he does not discharge, he continues in prison until its liquidation.

(b) When our Lord is in conversation or company with publicans, the Roman system of farming [the revenue] and its oppressions are every where displayed. When he drives with scourges the money-brokers from the temple, we perceive the consequence of the Roman dominion, and the influence of foreign manners, which allowed the money-changers to place their usurious tables by the statues of the gods, even in the most holy places.³ We also observe, in the conduct of our Savior upon the occasion referred to, the extent of the Roman toleration. This permitted no encroachments in the temples and religions of other nations; and therefore a private Jew, unmolested, maintained the honor of his temple, from which, in Rome, no laws could have screened Him.

(c) The parable in Mat. 12:32 represents a king, i. e., a tetrarch, who, as far as himself and his own affairs were concerned, was not under the Roman law. He consequently proceeds according to the ancient Jewish law. But the sequel, which relates to a common man, contains an appeal to the Roman laws against the obligatos, in consequence of which the debtor who does not pay is called upon by his creditor, who instantly arrests him, and detains him in his house as a prisoner, as one delivered up to his will. The harshness of this law was indeed mitigated by a subsequent one; yet afterwards, and at this time, it had returned to its former severity, as it here appears in the parable.

(d) This admixture of manners and consitions forcibly proceeded through numberless circumstances of life. Take, for example, the circulation of coin. At one time it is Greek coin; at another, Roman; at another, ancient Jewish. But how carefully was even this managed, according to the history and the arrangement of things! The ancient imposts, which were introduced before the Roman dominion, were valued according to the Greek coinage; e. g. the taxes of the temple, the didrachma. Mat. 17:24, margin. The offerings were paid in these. Mk. 12:42. Lu. 21:2. A payment which proceeded from the temple treasury was made, according to the ancient national payment, by weight. Mat. 26:15. But in common business, trade, wages, sale, &c., the assarius and denarius, and Roman coin, were usual. Mat. 10:29. Lu. 12:6. Mat. 20:2. Mk. 14:5. Jn. 12:5. 6:7. The more modern state taxes are likewise paid in the coin of the nation which exercises at the time the greatest authority. Mat. 22:19. Mk. 12:15. Lu. 20:24.

Writers who, in each little circumstance, which otherwise would pass by unnoticed, so accurately describe the period of time, must certainly have had a personal knowledge of it.

(d) The epistolary writings, also, have internal marks, or, as they are called, the impression of a particular age, as well with respect to the materials as to the form.

(a) As far as relates to the materials, these writings are not general treatises, without a country and a distinct object; they were called forth by occasions and circumstances compulsory on the writers, and were therefore adapted to particular situations and readers, and their individual necessities. Since these are confirmed in other documents; since the picture of the times which the authors preserve in them, as they write these memoirs, has historical truth, — we easily perceive that the writers did not labor on arbitrary circumstances, or those invented by themselves. The more circumstantial this picture was, and the more accurately it was present to their mind, so much the more is it demonstrated that they saw these very times.

(b) But in addition to this, in the Acts we meet with a considerable number of undesigned data, negligently scattered here and there, which now and then relate to the persons, or are connected with other incidents, mentioned in the Epistles, or promise even further instructions for their accidental elucidation. Where, then, we observe such an historical and obvious directory belonging to them, and connect these memoirs with them, we cannot but remark between them a harmony which is particularly requisite to the Epistles, which, according to their own pretensions, claim a connection with these events.⁴

(e) If we afterwards pay attention to the local weaknesses, imperfections, and errors, which are censured in Paul's Epistles, for the correction of which they were designed; namely, in Crete, Corinth, Ephesus; if we pay attention to these, in the Greek and Roman authors, where some such traits are incidentally reprobated, — we may often make the agreeable discovery, that our Epistles have accurately treated of the errors of the age, or the local imperfections noticed in each Epistle, and have sometimes delineated them strongly in satire and seriousness.

(d) The system of morality, too, which is developed in the writings of Paul, Peter, and John, is unique in its character. It is not the peculiar and mechanical virtue of the Jews; it is not the virtue of the Greeks; it is not the political and warlike virtue of the Romans; not the virtue of the porch or of the academy; not even a sophisticated and declamatory wisdom of this life. It is the virtue of Jesus Christ, as He had proposed it in the Gospels. No person, scarcely, can read the morality of the Epistles without concluding that those who propounded it were, as they have represented themselves, the hearers and disciples of Jesus.

(e) Upon the form of these writings, — i. e. the arrangement and mode of treating things, — the method of adducing proofs to support assertions, and the style and diction, many and interesting remarks might be offered, by way of confirming the argument. But this belongs to a higher branch of the inquiry than that to which our readers are supposed to have attained, and it must therefore be left for their future consideration.

2. From what has been said, we arrive at the conclusion, that the books of the N. T. were written in the age to which they refer, and by the persons whose names they bear; i. e. that they are genuine, and not spurious or supposititious writings.⁵

SECTION V.

THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE BIBLICAL BOOKS.

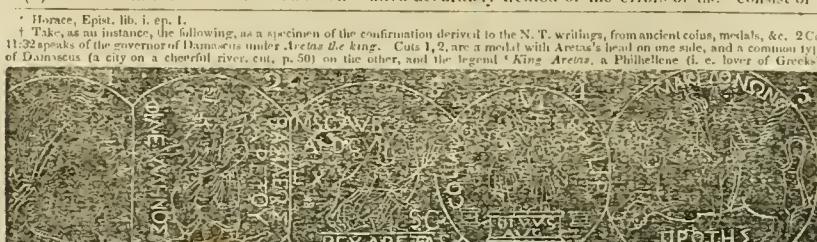

We have now ascertained two things; the first, that the books of the N. T. were written by the persons to whom they are now attributed; the second, that they were published at or about the times to which they are now referred. These constitute the genuineness of the sacred books, which we may now, therefore, consider to have been established. But another, and an equally important, question remains for determination; namely, Are these books authentic, or true? Do they give a faithful delineation of the history and character of Jesus Christ, and of that religious system which he promulgated and founded? This question, it will be seen, is not involved in the one we have hitherto been considering; it requires a separate and independent species of proof; and to this we now invite attention. In the prosecution of such an inquiry, the following considerations naturally present themselves to the mind: —

1. Is it possible to conceive that the books composing the N. T. should ever have been received as authentic, by any number of persons, at any period of time, if they had not possessed all the necessary evidences and proofs of their having been true?

2. It is necessary, in the determination of this question, to advert to the character of those transactions which form the subject of the N. T. books; for upon this, chiefly, depends the impossibility of their imposition on the world as authentic writings, if they had been but fabricated and spurious stories. The books of the New Testament, then, consist of three distinct classes. The first

⁴ Take, as instances, the following, as a specimen of the confirmation derived to the N. T. writings, from ancient coins, medals, &c. 2 Co. 11:32 speaks of the governor of Damascus under Aretas the king. Cius 1, 2, are a medal with Aretas' head on one side, and a common type of Damascus (a city on a cheerful river, cut, p. 50) on the other, and the legend King Aretas, a Philhellene (i. e. lover of Greeks).

⁶ See the 18 years' work of Prof. Norton, On the Genuineness of the Gospels, in which he aims to prove, against Eichhorn, and the neologists, &c., that the 'Gospels remain essentially the same as they were originally composed,' and that 'they have been ascribed to their true authors.' In 3 vols. 8vo. Vol. i. was published in Boston, in 1837. See a notice of it by Prof. Stuart, in the Bib. Repos. April, 1838. Eo.

Further, we have two medals with the head of Pompey the Great, and a chariot, &c., respectively, on one side, and on the reverse! ⁴ rex (king) Aretas; ⁵ cut 3, — submitting to Roman power. The accurate Luke (Ac. 16:12) speaks of Philippi as 'a colony and city,' ⁶ Makedon protos, i. e. of the first part of Macedonia, as it should be; and precisely these facts we observe on its medals: 4. 'Colonia Augusta Julia Philippi'; and 5. 'Makedon protos.' See Taylor's Cabinet (in which are a hundred similar instances), Frag. 272-3, and notes in Comp. Comm. Ed.

class consists of narratives, embracing an account of the miraculous birth—the public recognition—the active ministry—the violent death—the extraordinary resurrection—the subsequent transactions—and the ascension to heaven, of Jesus Christ; with distinct notices of the calling and commission of the apostles—their conduct during the personal ministry of Christ, and also subsequent to his departure from the world—and their indefatigable and successful labors in planting Christian churches, and furthering the designs of the gospel, in different parts of Judea, Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, and Rome; the whole being interspersed with relations of various discourses and miracles, developing the nature and attesting the divine origin of that religious system which was thus introduced and established by Jesus Christ. The second class of books are didactic and epistolary, consisting of letters which were addressed by Paul, Peter, James, and John (all of them apostles), to the various churches which were planted either by themselves or their fellow-laborers, and to certain individuals who were personally acquainted with the writers, and were engaged in the same cause. But the Epistles are not exclusively didactic or preceptive; they contain a large portion of historical matter, and, in connection with the Acts of the Apostles, furnish a specimen, though in many respects a particular and detailed, account of the early progress of the gospel, and of the first Christian communities. The third class comprises only the book of Revelation, which is of a mixed character, being partly didactic and hortatory, and partly historical and prophetic. It comprises, in its latter character, a history of the Christian church, and so much of the world as is inseparably connected with it, from the time of Domitian, at the close of the first century, to the end of the world. Such is, briefly, the character of the N. T. writings, and the subject matter which they contain. They develop the origin, progress, and final establishment of that system of religion which superseded the Levitical economy, annihilated the idolatry of paganism, and triumphed over the most fierce and cruel persecutions.

2. It should be borne in mind, that every part of these writings represents the occurrences connected with the introduction and establishment of Christianity to have been of a decisively miraculous character. The Savior's conception—his public designation to the ministry—his works of charity and mercy—his resurrection from the tomb—and his ascent to heaven, were all events and occurrences of an unparalleled character, and placed very far beyond the reach of merely human agency. They were, in fact, what they purported to be (that is, if they really took place), so many demonstrations of the divine character of their subject and author, and, as a necessary consequence, of that system of religion which He founded in the world.

3. Now, it has been already shown, that the books containing these narratives and Epistles were published at or about the times in which the events spoken of occurred, and also in the same part of the world. They were appealed to as genuine and authentic documents, in common by all parties—orthodox and heretical, Christian and pagan—so early as the second century; that is, within a few years after the events which they narrate transpired. Several of them were addressed to the very persons said to have witnessed the miraculous occurrences, and to have listened to the divine discourses; who are also appealed to for the truth of the representations put forth, although they are not unfrequently reproved for their want of consistency, or their non-conformity to the requisitions of the gospel; and the avowed object of the whole of them is to demonstrate that the principal person to whom they refer, and whose religion was attested by so many and incontrovertible miracles, was the Son of God, and the Savior of all who believe. Jn. 20:31.

4. After this recapitulation of the character and design of the N. T. writings, brief and imperfect as it is, it may be safely left for the reader to determine, whether their reception as genuine and authentic books can be rationally accounted for upon the supposition that they were forged and false. The events which they narrate and presuppose are assumed, upon the grounds previously stated, to have been fresh in the recollection of the world, and to have been transacted so publicly that none could have been ignorant of their occurrence. Under such circumstances, we are fairly entitled to say, that the books of the N. T. could never have obtained even the slightest degree of attention. Their falsehood would have been so obvious, and their attempted imposition so impudent, that they could not have failed to excite the contempt and derision of every person under whose notice they fell.

5. But it is not necessary to the argument, that these books should have been published so near to the times in which the events occurred; it will be equally conclusive, to whatever period of time their publication may be assigned. Let it be assumed, by an objector, in spite of the evidence adduced to the contrary, that the books of the N. T. did not make their appearance till 50, 100, or even 500 years after the occurrences they narrate and refer to are stated to have happened; the difficulty in the way of supposing them, in their main and most important particulars (those upon which all the rest depend), to be untrue, will be equally great.

6. Let us put a case. Suppose that a book were now, for the first time, to make its appearance, purporting to be a narrative of extraordinary events which had occurred in this country 50, 100, or even 500 years since;—that it set forth, among other remarkable occurrences, that, at the period referred to, a man of unusual appearance and of singular manners presented himself to the notice of the public, professing to be invested with the prophetic character, and commissioned to prepare the world for another divine messenger, more eminent than himself, whom God was about to send forth upon some special mission;—that he required all who were willing to become his disciples, not only to repent of their vicious conduct, and henceforth to live in an exemplary manner, but also to be publicly initiated into their new profession by the rite of baptism;—that not only a few persons complied with his injunctions, but that such multitudes from the metropolis and its vicinity submitted to his ritual ordinance, that it might be said, without impropriety, all London, Westminster, and Southwark, went out and were baptized of him;—that while he was thus employed, the prophet whom he had announced made his appearance, and, after having been publicly baptized, was proclaimed, by an audible voice from heaven, and the descent upon him of a visible symbol of the Holy Spirit, to be divinely appointed to teach the will of God, and to unfold the nature of his kingdom;—that He now entered upon his public ministry—taught doctrines the most pure and benevolent, and of the first importance to mankind—laid down a system of morals superior to any that the world had before seen, and, in order to demonstrate the divinity of his mission, wrought openly, and in the presence of multitudes—even of those who were bitterly incensed against Him—the most stupendous miracles; such as, at one time feeding a multitude of 5000 persons with 5 loaves and 2 fishes, at another time satisfying the hunger of more than 4000 with seven loaves and a few small fishes; upon several occasions raising the dead—curing the lame—unstopping the ears of the deaf—loosing the tongues of the dumb—opening the eyes of the blind—cleansing lepers—casting out devils—in a word, healing all manner of the most inveterate diseases, with a word or a touch; and this in the most public though unostentatious manner;—that the effect of his teaching and miracles was to convert many of his countrymen, among all ranks of society, who, in their turn, and under his direction, became zealous advocates of his system, and were competent witnesses of his actions and works;—that He at length delivered Himself up to his enemies, was condemned as an impostor, and publicly put to death;—that when He expired, darkness overspread the land for the space of three hours—the rocks rent—the graves opened—and many who had been previously buried came forth from their places of sepulture, and were seen alive in the city;—that his body, after hanging for some hours upon the cross, was taken down, and laid in a new sepulchre, which was carefully sealed, and surrounded by a guard of soldiers, placed there by the persons most terminately opposed to his pretensions, and who, in fact, had put Him to death;—that on the third morning, however, He left the sepulchre, unknown to the guard, rejoined his disciples, associated with them for the space of forty days, and then, in their presence, ascended into heaven;—that shortly after this occurrence, his disciples, who were assembled in a large room, agreeably to his instructions, were suddenly endowed with the power of speaking various languages with ease and fluency, to the great astonishment of a multitude of strangers who listened to their discourses;—that from this time their characters underwent a most remarkable change, their timidity and fear giving place to invisible courage and fortitude;—that they boldly, and in face of the most imminent danger, proclaimed the extraordinary occurrences of their Master's life, and labored indefatigably to induce their countrymen and others, who had witnessed his actions and listened to his discourses, to receive Him as the Messiah, and rely upon Him as the Savior;—that their labors were so successful, that in one day, and in the very place where their divine Master had frequently taught and wrought miracles, 3000 persons were convinced of the truth of their testimony, and embraced the new religion; and that within the space of a few years many of the neighboring states became proselytes to the faith, and submitted themselves to its requirements;—and that these men, after having undergone the most fiery trials, and submitted to the most cruel and protracted sufferings, yielded themselves up to violent deaths, to attest, not—be it observed—the sincerity of their statements, but the truth of their statements, in regard to matters of fact.

7. Now, we ask, if a work containing a narrative so unusual and so extraordinary as this, stating the events recorded to have happened in the places where it was published and read, and pointing to certain existing observances,* as having been originally prescribed to commemorate some of these very events, while the whole was a gross fabrication, having had no existence but in the mind of its author or authors, can it be conceived possible, that it should, by any device, be imposed upon the world, and obtain the credit of an authentic history? Would not the common sense of mankind lead them to argue, that if the narrative was true, the events recorded must have been notorious before the appearance of this work; and that, although the lapse of several hundred years, and the variation to which traditionary testimony is liable, might induce some discrepancies between the written document and the floating tradition, there would yet be a sufficient conformity to yield proof of their identity? There is, in fact, no conceivable way in which the supposed production could obtain credit with any number of persons, as an authentic record of facts. And this was our postulatum!

8. In this view of the case, the question at

* As the religious observance of the first day of the week, and the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's supper.

† For the authenticity of the books of the N. T., a much stronger case, even upon this ground, might be made out, could we enter into detail. The issue between the Christian and the unbeliever is brought into a very limited compass. The fact of the bare existence of the N. T. books, and of the religious system which they develop, is obviously certain and indisputable; the sole question, therefore, is, how these books started into existence, and what are their pretensions to be received as divine. The Christian assigns to them an origin not only perfectly reasonable and consistent in themselves, but which is also supported—as we have already seen, and as we shall presently see more fully—by the concurrent testimony of antiquity, in a regular and unbroken series, from the time at which they were introduced down to the present day. The unbeliever rejects these evidences, which in every other case are held to be sufficient and conclusive, and calls upon us to assign to them some unknown and inconceivable origin, which cannot be done without involving a monstrous tissue of absurdities, and unhinging all historical evidence. Whose conduct is the more reasonable, or worthy of a rational creature? Let the reader determine for himself.*

H. Is it possible to assign to the writers of the N. T. any adequate motive for their undertaking, on the supposition that it does not contain an authentic statement of facts?

1. It may be conceived that this inquiry is superfluous, after it has been shown, that, whatever the motives of the N. T. penmen might have been, it would have been impossible to have procured any credit for their writings, had they not been supported by adequate proofs of their authenticity. And so, in truth, it is, except in as far as it furnishes an additional argument for demonstrating the unreasonableness and irrationality of infidelity. A suggestion or two, however, is all that can be here submitted: the intelligent reader will find it worth his while to pursue the inquiry into all its details.

2. There are but two conceivable motives that could induce the writers of the N. T.—supposing them to have been impostors—to make the attempt of imposing their books upon the world. Either they must have done so to promote their personal gain, pecuniary or otherwise; or they must have done it from a sincere and disinterested desire to benefit their fellow-creatures. But neither of these suppositions will hold good.

3. The authors of the N. T. could not have proposed in their undertaking either power, pleasure, or any other species of gain; because they could not but know that the religion which they were laboring to establish was, in its very principles, equally opposed to Judaism and paganism, and, instead of necessity, bring down upon its advocates the vengeance of these two great classes of society. That both Christ and his apostles were fully aware of the consequences which would result to them from their exertions and labors, is evident from every part of the writings under consideration;† and that the event answered to the anticipation, is known to every reader of these and other early Christian writings. Now, is it reasonable to suppose that any persons of common sense would voluntarily have engaged in an imposture from which they could not hope to derive any thing but the most dreadful sufferings, and even death itself? If these men were mere cheats, they were such without any motive or advantage, and even contrary to every motive and idea of advantage by which men are usually influenced. With regard to pecuniary gain, or money-getting, every thing conveys to show that this was no part of the design proposed by the persons whose conduct we are referring to. They had no fixed places of abode themselves, and they never interfered in the pecuniary concerns of their converts, except so far as to induce them to minister to the necessities of those who were unable to support themselves. For some short time, they took upon themselves, for very obvious reasons, the distribution of the provision thus made for the poor; but as soon as it became no thing considerable, they committed it to other hands, and devoted themselves exclusively to their apostolic and ministerial labors.‡

4. They could not have engaged in the imposture from a desire to benefit their fellow-creatures. This must presuppose their belief, at least, in the doctrines which they taught, and their conviction that they were adapted to promote the well-being and happiness of men. These, however, cannot be separated from the facts of the evangelical histories, which the objection assumes to be false; and therefore no such belief or conviction could have been cherished by the persons in question. But to this must be added, that the doctrines taught by these persons condemn, most unequivocally, the conduct which they are supposed to have pursued, and denounce it under the penalty of eternal misery. Are we to suppose, then, that they were ardently attached to a religion which forbids every kind and degree of fraud and falsehood, while their whole lives were one continued scene of perjury; and that, whilst guilty of the basest and most useless knavery themselves, they were taking infinite pains, and enduring unexampled suffering, in order to teach mankind the value of truth and honesty? The idea is monstrously absurd.

H. Is there any thing contained in the books of the N. T. which is contradicted by other and independent writers, possessing an actual knowledge of the facts and circumstances narrated in them?

1. The only discrepancy between the sacred and profane history, of which we have any recollection, is found in Lu. 21:2, which presents a chronological difficulty. The passage is as follows:—‘And it came to pass in those days, that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the world should be taxed. (And this taxing was first made when Cyrenius was governor of Syria.)’

2. As to the extent of this census. It being now agreed, on all hands, that the Greek words here translated ‘all the world’ are to be taken in a restricted sense, it is unnecessary to notice the tomfooleries of which some sagacious deistical writers have been guilty, in their remarks upon the phrase. The words are restricted, by common consent, to the sense in which they are employed by some of the best Greek writers, to signify the extent of the Roman dominions. But as there is no general census mentioned in any historian as having taken place at this time, the meaning of oikoumenē must be further restrained to the land of Judea. This signification it certainly has in this same evangelist (21:26)—‘Men’s hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth’—tē oikoumenē, this land. The whole discourse relates to the calamities that were coming, not upon the whole world, nor the whole of the Roman empire, but on the land of Judea; see v. 21; ‘Then let them that are in Judea flee to the mountains.’ Out of Judea, therefore, there would be safety; and only those who should be with child, or giving suck, in those days, are considered as peculiarly unhappy, because they could not flee away from that land, on which the scourge was to fall; for the wrath, or punishment, shall be, says our Lord, on THIS VERY POPLE, namely, the Jews, v. 23. It appears that Luke used this word in conformity to the Septuagint, who have applied it in precisely the same way, Is. 13:11, 19:26, 24:1. And from this we may learn that the word oikoumenē had been long used as a term by which the land of Judea was commonly expressed. See Lu. 4:25, Jcs. 23. It is probable that the reason why this enrolment, or census, is said to have been throughout the whole Jewish nation, was to distinguish it from that partial one made ten years after, mentioned Ac. 5:37, which does not appear to have extended beyond the estates of Archelats, and which gave birth to the insurrection excited by Judas of Galilee.§

3. As to the act itself. It has been thought that the testimony of Josephus, that no tax or tribute was levied from Judea till many years after this, is at variance with the evangelist. Such, however, is not the fact, for the word apographethai properly signifies registering—taking an account of the population; probably with a view to the levying of a tax.

4. As to the governorship of Syria. It is granted on all hands that Cyrenius was not governor of Syria till 10 or 12 years after the birth of our Lord. The question, therefore, is, How is the evangelist to be reconciled with the historical fact?

(1) Dr. Hales conceives that Cyrenius, whom Tacitus calls ‘an active soldier and a rigid commissioner,’ and who was therefore well qualified for an employment so odious to Herod and his subjects as the making of this enrolment must have been, was probably sent into Syria to execute the decree of Augustus with an armed force. At this juncture, however, the census proceeded no farther than the first act of the enrolment of persons in the Roman registers; Herod having succeeded in effecting a reconciliation with the emperor. But upon the deposition and banishment of Archelats, it was carried into effect, for the purpose of which Cyrenius was sent again, as president of Syria, with an armed force. Now, it is of this establishment of the assessment or tax, which was necessary to complete the Roman census, that Dr. Hales understands the evangelist to speak in the parenthetical remark, which he renders thus—‘The taxing itself was first made while Cyrenius was president of Syria;’ and he subjoins some cogent reasons in justification of its correctness.

(2) Dr. Lardner, whose solution has been adopted by many subsequent critics, conceives that Cyrenius, having been employed in the way Dr. Hales supposes, during the presidency of Quintilius Varus, or Saturinus, whichever of them was then president, made a second census when he himself came into the office of president, ten or twelve years afterwards. Now, to both these acts he supposes the evangelist to allude, when he says, ‘This was the first assessment of Cyrenius, governor of Syria.’ The passage thus translated does not say that this assessment was made when Cyrenius was governor of Syria, which would not have been true; but that this was the first assessment which Cyrenius, who was (that is, afterwards) governor of Syria, made; for after he became governor, he made a second.

(3) The late editor of Calmet, Mr. Charles Taylor, has offered a new conjecture, which was suggested to him by the inscription on a medal of Antioch; namely, that Cyrenius was associated with Saturinus in the government of Syria. The following is the substance of his observations in support of this opinion:—On this medal appear the imposture of their forgery, however, has been sufficiently shown, though the argument is capable of confirmation by many additional considerations.

* Upon this topic, Faber’s Difficulties of Infidelity may be read with advantage.

† See Mat. 24:9, Mk. 4:17, 10:30, Lu. 11:49, 21:12–16, Jn. 15:20, 16:4, Ro. 5:3, 4, 8:25, 37, 2 Co. 4:8, 9, 10, 14, 16, 17, 2 Th. 1:4, 5, 11e, 10:32–36, 1 Pe. 4:12–19, 1a, 5:10, 11.

‡ Paley remarks that the most tempting opportunity which occurred to the apostles of making a gain of their converts, was by the custody and management of the public funds, when some of the richer members of the church, intending to contribute their fortunes to the common support of their society, sold their possessions, and laid down the price at the apostles’ feet, Ac. 4:31–37. Yet advantage which that confidence afforded, that we find they very soon disposed of the trust, by putting it into the hands, not of nominees of their own, but of stewards formally elected, for the purpose, by the society at large, Ac. 6:1–6. He adds that this excess of generosity, which cast private property into the public stock, was so far from being required by the apostles, or imposed as a law of Christianity, that Peter reminds Ananias that he had been guilty, in his behavior, of an officious and voluntary prevarication. Ac. 5:4.

letters ΟΤΟΔΟ, which are presumed to be the first letters of ΟΥΟΔΑΡΙΟΝ, Volumnius, the colleague of Saturninus; and indeed Josephus (Ant. lib. xvi. cap. 9, 10), speaking of these persons, styles them presidents or governors, in the plural; though Saturninus was properly president, and Volumnius procurator, i. e. chief of the emperor's revenue, in this province.

There are, then, two things extremely remarkable in this medal: 1st, that only on medals of Antioch are any names inscribed of those consular Romans who were sent by the early emperors to govern the province of Syria; 2dly, that the name of Volumnius, an inferior officer, should appear on the same coin with that of Saturninus, the principal governor. There must have been some reason for this; and this is conceived to be the following:—Antioch, the capital of Syria, where, no doubt, Saturninus kept his court, was the metropolis of a very extensive province; but was ill situated for being the seat of government, being very far north. It may be presumed, too, that Damascus, a city of no slight pretensions, was sometimes in this province; and thus it might be proper, that although one was the primary president, yet that, for the purposes of government, there should be two presidents of Syria, both appointed by the emperor. The reader perceives that we suppose Saturninus to have been stationary at Antioch, while his associate was engaged in other districts of the province, as circumstances required; and what we suppose of Volumnius we also suppose of Cyrenius, who after him held the same office. Nor is it impossible that this second governor might reside at some other city in the province. However that might be, we have instances that the province of Syria could, on occasion, spare one of its rulers for a time to an adjacent district, as it might still have one remaining; nevertheless, any transaction said to be done under one (who was in activity), might be said, not improperly, to be done under the other also; especially if he were the superior in dignity, although he staid at home at the seat of government. It remains now, that we examine the date on our medal, EA, 35, which, we presume, is from the Julian era of Rome 705, and marks the year 740 for the time when the coin was struck. If Herod died in the year 750, or 751, and Quintilius Varus had succeeded Saturninus only about a year at that time, then Saturninus must have held this station eight or nine years, supposing this medal to have been struck immediately on his appointment to the government. We are, however, more interested respecting Volumnius, who possibly might die, or might quit his appointment in or before the year 716 or 717, and be succeeded by Cyrenius. This nobleman was consul of Rome, 712; was sent against the Homonadenses, perhaps about 745, being then either the ordinary proconsul of Cilicia, the adjoining province to Syria, or an extra officer in that province. Having terminated this commission, he was appointed to Syria, suppose on the death of Volumnius, and in this character he superintended the execution of that enrolment which was appointed by the decree of Augustus Caesar.* Thus, by means of our medal, we have vindicated Josephus, who describes Saturninus and Volumnius as governors [provincialis] of Syria; we have justified both Luke and Tertullian, though in a seeming contradiction; one affirming Cyrenius, the other affirming Saturninus, to have executed the enrolment; and we have justified the words of the evangelist, which may be thus understood. ‘This enrolment was the first effected by Cyrenius; meaning, while he was the first time governor of Syria, of the same rank as Volumnius; of which province he was afterwards governor, of the same rank as Saturninus; in which capacity he enforced another enrolment, from which this should be carefully distinguished.’ Or, ‘This was the enrolment of Cyrenius, he being then governor of Syria associated with Saturninus; and should be distinguished from that made by him 11 years afterwards, when he was the chief, the precedential governor of the same province.’

(1) That these solutions of the difficulty will be perfectly satisfactory to every reader, would be rather too much to affirm; but to every candid inquirer they cannot fail to suggest that the discrepancy may result from the paucity or imperfection of our own historical knowledge. And is it too much to say that a passage of this kind—occurring in a work which is, in every other respect, not only perfectly accordant with contemporary history in its direct statements and more prominent features, but which also exhibits so many incidental and undesigned coincidences in the most minute and trifling matters—should not be too closely pressed, or too harshly interpreted; much less should it be thought to make against its general accuracy. Let it receive the same treatment, in this respect, as if it were found in the pages of Xenophon, or of Livy.

IV. Do the books of the N. T. contain any thing incredible in itself, or contradictory to the nature of things?

1. This question may be safely answered in the negative. The entire history of the introduction of Christianity into the world is miraculous, but it is not absurd; the extraordinary works performed by our Savior and his apostles were above the laws of nature, and beyond human agency; but there was nothing in them repugnant to the nature of things, or to the power and moral excellence of the Supreme Being.†

2. That there are any miracles recorded in the N. T. which are in themselves absurd or contradictory to the moral excellence which belongs to God, few, if any, persons will have the arrogance to maintain. But, it is said, they are incredible or improbable;

* This statement allows for the opinion of those who think that Christ was born in 747, and that Herod died about the Passover, 750.

† Calvert's Dictionary, art. ‘Axiom’, vol. i. fifth edition.

2. There is a class of German critics [called Rationists] who reject the belief of any thing properly miraculous in the history of Christ. But the difficulty of reconciling this disbelief of the miracles with the admission of the truth of the facts concerning Him not miraculous, is greatly increased, if the gospel be acknowledged as the uncorrupted works of those who were witnesses of what they relate, or who derived their information immediately from such witnesses. On the other hand, in proportion as suspicion is cast upon the genuineness and authenticity of those writings, the history of Christ becomes doubtful and obscure. An opening is made for theories concerning his life, character, and works, and the origin of his religion. Any account of our Savior, upon the supposition that he was not a teacher from God, endued with miraculous powers, must be almost wholly conjectural. But such a conjectural account will appear to less advantage, if placed in competition with narratives of uncertain origin, than if brought into direct opposition to the authority of original witnesses? Norton, pp. 94, 95. ‘To this statement,’ says Prof. Stuart (Bib. Repos. April, 1838), ‘I desire to express my most unqualified assent, and to record my warmest approbation.’

This necessary proof of uncorruption Mr. Norton had already given (comp. also sect. iv. and vi.) and the Ed. anticipates a little, to lay before the reader the following summing up of a part of that proof: ‘We have seen,’ says Mr. Norton, ‘that there is no reason to doubt that the Christians of the first two centuries had the highest reverence for their sacred books, and that, with this sentiment, they could neither have had nor have suffered alterations in the Gospels;—that the manner in which the Christians of the very acts that were intended to ratify the pretensions put forth by their authors, are taken as a ground of objection to their claims. The argument of Mr. Hume, to which all subsequent objectors have taken themselves, is well known. Personal experience he maintains to be our only guide with reference to matters of fact; and since miracles are contrary to what we constantly observe in nature, and indeed to its laws, no testimony can be sufficient to warrant our believing them to be true or credible, even in the lowest degree.’ It is evidently impossible, here, to enter into a full examination of this fanciful hypothesis. It has been ably exposed by Professor Campbell, and some other writers, to whose works the reader is referred. A remark or two, however, may be offered.

(1) It is not true that personal experience is our only guide or authority for believing matters of fact. The merest clown or peasant derives incomparably more knowledge from testimony, and the communicated experience of others, than, in the longest life, he could have amassed out of the treasure of his own memory. If that, therefore, must be the rule, the only rule, by which every testimony is ultimately to be judged, our belief in matters of fact must have very narrow bounds. No testimony, it is said, ought to have any weight with us, that does not relate to an event, similar, at least, to some one observation which we ourselves have had the opportunity of making. For instance, that there exist such people as negroes, could not, on this hypothesis, be rendered credible to a person who had never seen a negro, not even by the most numerous and the most unexceptionable attestations. The absurdities that would flow from the adoption of such a principle must be immediately obvious.

(2) To object to the credibility of miracles, on the ground that they are contrary to the laws of nature, discovers a mistaken notion of those laws. Nature has not imposed these laws upon itself; they have been imposed upon it by its divine Author. But it is dangerous to employ metaphorical language in philosophical or metaphysical disquisition; and had it been avoided by those who have urged the objection, its unreasonableness might have stood naked before them. The laws of nature are nothing more than a certain course of events which the Creator has determined that matter shall exhibit; in other words, they are the will and pleasure of God, acting continually upon matter, according to certain rules of uniformity, still bearing a relation to contingencies. This being the case, it is as easy, as Dr. Gregory remarks, for the Supreme Being to alter what men think the course of nature, as to preserve it. ‘Those effects which are produced in the world regularly and indescribably, and which are usually termed the works of nature, prove the constant providence of the Deity; those, on the contrary, which, upon any extraordinary occasion, are produced in such a manner as to offend the sense of the observer, that they knew of no similar corruptions in their own copies of the Gospels;—that from the notice which Origen takes of the various readings found by him in his MSS. of the Gospels, we may conclude, that no considerable diversity among the MSS. had ever existed;—that we may infer the same from all the other notices respecting the text of the Gospels in the writings of the fathers; and from the absence of any thing in their works which might show, that their copies differed more from each other than those now extant;—that the peculiar style of the Gospels generally, and the uniform style of each Gospel, afford proof that each is, essentially, the work of one author, which has been preserved uncorrupted;—that this argument becomes more striking, when we consider, that for the greater number of the copies of the Gospels [and Mr. N. shows their number to have been at the last calculation 60,000], during the first two centuries, were made by Greek transcribers, who, if they had interpolated, would have interpolated in common Greek;—that it is from copies made by them that our own are derived; but that the Gospels, as we possess them, are written, throughout, in that dialect of the Greek which was used only by Jews;—that spurious works, or spurious additions to genuine works, may commonly be discovered by some incongruity with the character or circumstances of the pretended author, or the age to which they are assigned; but that, with the exception, perhaps, of a few passages, the genuineness of which is doubtful [see, however, Stuart, Bib. Repos. April, 1838, p. 284, &c.], no such incongruity appears in the Gospels;—and lastly, in all that relates to the actions, discourses, and most extraordinary character of Christ, each is a work which remains the same essentially as it was originally written, uncorrupted by subsequent alterations and additions.’ Genuineness, &c. pp. 88–90. Ed.

it is manifest could not have been either by human power, or by what is called chance, prove undeniably the immediate interposition of the Deity on that special occasion. God, it must be recollect, is the governor of the moral, as well as of the physical world; and since the moral well-being of the universe is of more consequence than its physical order and regularity, it follows, obviously, that the laws conformably with which the material world seems generally to be regulated, are subservient, and may occasionally yield, to the laws by which the moral world is governed. Although, therefore, a miracle is contrary to the usual course of nature—and would, indeed, lose its beneficial effect if it were not so—it cannot thence be inferred that it is a violation of the laws of nature, allowing the term to include a regard to moral tendencies. The laws by which a wise and holy God governs the world cannot, unless he is pleased to reveal them, be learnt in any other way than from testimony; since, on this supposition, nothing but testimony can bring us acquainted with the whole series of his dispensations, and this kind of knowledge is absolutely necessary previously to our correctly enforcing those laws. Testimony, therefore, must be admitted as constituting the principal means of discovering the real laws by which the universe has been regulated. That testimony assures us that the apparent course of nature has often been interrupted to produce important moral effects; and we must not at random disregard such testimony, because, in estimating its credibility, we ought to look almost infinitely more at the moral than at the physical circumstances connected with any particular event.*

V. Do the writings composing the N. T. exhibit any internal evidences of the fidelity of their authors, and of the truth of these facts and circumstances which they narrate?

1. The books of the N. T. do exhibit various and powerful evidences of the fidelity of their respective authors; internal marks of sincerity and truth that are not to be found, and could not possibly exist, in any forged writings. A few particulars may be noticed.

2. Their style and manner exhibit the most convincing evidences of truth and sincerity. We are aware that this argument would be of no value if it applied to merely didactic or doctrinal writings. The utmost that would be provable from the style of an author, in such a case, would be his own belief in the doctrines he propounded, and his conviction of their beneficial purpose or tendency. But when, in a narrative of facts, which purport to have fallen under the personal notice of the writer, and therefore to be within his individual knowledge—facts of such a nature that he could not possibly be deceived as to their existence or non-existence—when we find a narrative of such facts characterized by evident marks of simplicity and candor, it affords a very strong presumption of its fidelity and truth. Now, such is the case in the historical books of the N. T. There is nothing like design or artifice apparent in any part of them. The style is removed at the utmost conceivable distance from high coloring or exaggeration. The writers narrate the most extraordinary events and circumstances with the most artless simplicity, and without the slightest apparent inclination to give them undue prominence or artificial importance. There are no harangues, no apologies, no encomiums; every fact, whether honorable or discreditable to themselves, is left to speak for itself; and the reader is left to form his own conclusion. The same may be said of the epistolary writings. They exhibit proofs, not only of the most devout and generous disposition on the part of their authors—a thing totally irreconcileable with the notion of fraud—but also of the utmost confidence in the simplicity of truth, and the most scrupulous adherence to calm and dispassionate statement. Affecting no ‘excellency of speech,’ they determined to know only Jesus Christ the crucified; and, notwithstanding that their themes would have supplied them with an abundant variety of the most pathetic declamation, they preferred a plain statement of facts, and an appeal to the proofs of their veracity and authority; thus ‘commending themselves to every man’s conscience in the sight of God.’

3. The particularity with which the writers of the N. T. have noted minute circumstances of time, person, place, &c., affords a very strong evidence of the truth of their writings. No forged or false accounts of things thus superabounding with peculiarities, and no forger or relater of falsehoods would give so great a number of particulars, since this would put into his reader’s hands so many criteria by which to detect him; nor, in fact, could be produce such a minute detail of circumstances. It is easy to conceive how faithful records, kept from time to time by persons concerned in the transactions, should contain such a minute account of things; but it would be a work of the highest invention, and the greatest stretch of genius, to raise from nothing such numberless particulars as are almost every where to be met with in the New Testament; particulars, the falsehood of which would most assuredly have been detected by the persons most interested, if they had been forged or false. These accounts, it has been already shown, were published among the people who are said to have witnessed the events related by the historians, and who could, with the greatest ease, have exposed the fraud or falsehood, if there had been any, in the details of such transactions. But they did not attempt to question either the reality of the facts, or the fidelity of the narratives; and their acquiescence in them, as well as their obedience to the injunctions contained in these books, are conclusive evidence in favor of their authenticity.

4. Another and a very cogent argument for the authenticity of the N. T. arises out of the harmony which subsists among the sacred writers on the various subjects of which they treat. Should a number of contemporaries of the same country, education, habits, profession, natural disposition, and rank in life, concur in writing a book on religious subjects, as large as the Bible, each furnishing his proportion, without any comparing of notes, the attentive reader of it would be able to discover—would not fail to discover—some diversity of opinion among them. But the penmen of the Scriptures were not upon an equality in these respects; and if we take into account the whole of the sacred writings, they were separated from each other by an interval of many hundred years. Some of them were princes and priests; others, shepherds and fishermen: their natural abilities, education, habits, and employments, were exceedingly dissimilar. They wrote laws, history, prophecy, odes, devotional exercises, proverbs, doctrines, parables, and controversy; and each one had his distinct department; yet they all exactly coincide in their statements of facts, and in the exhibition which they give us of the perfections, works, truths, and will of God; of the nature, situation, and obligations of man; of sin and salvation; of this world and the next. Apparent inconsistencies will, indeed, perplex the superficial reader; but they will disappear upon a more accurate investigation. The writers have related the same facts with different circumstances; and they have given instructions suited to the persons whom they severally addressed, without systematically showing the harmony of them with other parts of divine truth. But this can afford no ground of objection to their fidelity: quite the reverse. They wrote not by concert, nor did they bestow any pains to avoid the appearance of inconsistency;

yet the exact coincidence which is perceived among them by the diligent student, is most astonishing, and cannot be accounted for on any rational principles, without admitting that they wrote under the invariable dictates of truth, and, in many respects, as ‘they were moved by the Holy Spirit.’

5. But to advert more particularly to the N. T. No person can attentively peruse the four Gospels without perceiving that they were designed by their respective authors to promote some particular purpose, suggested by the character or circumstances of the people to whom they were more immediately addressed; which purpose was somewhat diverse or different; Still, however, the most perfect agreement will be found to subsist among the whole, except in a very few minute particulars, which is quite consistent with their general truth and accuracy.

6. But between the Epistles of Paul and his history in the Acts of the Apostles there exist many notes of undesigned coincidence or correspondence; while the simple perusal of the writings is sufficient to prove that neither the history was taken from the letters, nor the letters from the history. And the undesignedness of the agreements (which undesignedness is gathered from their lateness, their minuteness, their obliquity, and the suitableness of the circumstances in which they consist to the places in which those circumstances occur, and the circuitous references by which they are traced out) demonstrates that they have not been produced by meditation, or by any fraudulent contrivance. But coincidences from which these causes are excluded, and which are too close and numerous to be accounted for by accidental occurrences or fiction, must necessarily have truth for their foundation.

7. This argument appeared to the mind of Paley to be of so much value (especially for its assuming nothing beyond the bare existence of the books) that he has pursued it through the thirteen Epistles of Paul, in his able and original work entitled ‘Horae Paulinae,’ which should be read with close attention by every person who desires to see the authenticity of this important section of the Scriptures completely demonstrated. The argument depending upon a large induction of particulars, renders it impossible to give such an abstract of it as shall convey an adequate idea of its force and conclusiveness; but the following summary of the author’s recapitulation and conclusion will not be without its use:—

‘When we take into our hands the letters (of Paul), which the consent and suffrage of antiquity have thus transmitted to us, the first thing that strikes our attention is the air of reality and business, as well as of seriousness and conviction, which pervades the whole. Let the skeptic read them. If he be not sensible of these qualities, the argument can have no weight with him. If he be,—if he perceive in almost every page the language of a mind actuated by real occasions, and operating upon real circumstances,—I would wish it to be observed that the proof which arises from this perception is not to be deemed occult or imaginary, because it is incapable of being drawn out in words, or of being conveyed to the apprehension of the reader in any other way, than by sending him to the books themselves.’ After having shown that the genuineness and originality of the Epistles, ascertained by the series of inductions which had been instituted, lead to the conclusion that there was such a person as Paul; that he went about preaching the religion of which Jesus Christ was the founder; and that the letters which we now read were actually written by him on the subject, and in the course of that ministry; Dr. Paley proceeds to remark, that—beside the proof they afford of the general reality of Paul’s history, of the knowledge which the author of the Acts of the Apostles had obtained of that history, and the consequent probability that he was what he professes himself to have been, a companion of the apostles — they meet specifically some of the principal objections upon which the adversaries of Christianity have thought proper to rely. In particular they show, (1) That Christianity had fixed and established itself before the destruction of Jerusalem, and that confusion which attended and immediately preceded it, and by which inquiry was rendered impractical. (2) That the Epistles themselves could not have been compiled from reports and stories current at the time; for a man could not write the history of his own life from reports; nor, which is the same thing, could he be led by reports to refer to passages and transactions in which he states himself to have been immediately present and active. (3) That the converts to Christianity were not composed of a barbarous, mean, or ignorant set of men: to such persons the Epistles would have been altogether unintelligible. (4) These writings also prove the truth of the Christian history generally; and particularly the existence and labors of the other apostles, and the existence of various Christian churches in different countries, especially of a considerable one at Jerusalem, where Christianity was published by those who had attended the miraculous ministry of its founder. (5) They also furnish evidence, of the best description, of the soundness and sobriety of Paul's judgment. His caution and discrimination are every where apparent; and his morality is throughout calm, pure, and rational. (6) They are decisive, too, as to the sufferings of the author, the distressed state of the Christian church, and the dangers which attended the preaching of the gospel. (7) Equally important are the evidences which they furnish of the miraculous powers with which the apostle was invested, and also of his publicly exerting them upon numerous occasions.*

3. Now, let the circumstances which have been thus briefly enumerated — and they might be augmented at least ten-fold — be thrown together, and their combined force and value be fairly and dispassionately estimated, and we have no fear of incurring a charge of rash assertion or offensive dogmatism, in saying that no man can refuse his assent to the truth of the N. T. on the mere ground of its own evidences, without being driven to the reception of difficulties infinitely more numerous and weighty than are to be found in any part of the Christian history.

VI. Do the books of the N. T. receive any confirmation from external and independent sources of information?

1. We have already seen that the narrative comprised in the N. T. accords in several and important particulars with general history. Not only is its historical complexion exactly that of the times to which it belongs; it also receives direct and ample confirmation from such writings of that period as have come down to us. Lardner, and after him Paley, have shown the numerous agreements between the histories of Josephus and the Scripture narratives, not only in articles of public history, but sometimes in minute, recondite, and very peculiar circumstances, in which, of all others, a forger is most likely to have been found tripping; but we are precluded, by our narrow space, from prosecuting this interesting inquiry, and must refer the reader for the proofs to the works of these able and indefatigable writers. From the details which they have furnished, it will be found that the main facts of the gospel narrative, and of the early history of the church, as it is recorded in the Acts of the Apostles and in the Epistles of Paul, are corroborated by the testimony of Jewish and pagan writers, who lived so near to the times that it was impossible for them to have been deceived. Josephus, a contemporary writer, speaks unequivocally of the person and extraordinary works of Christ, of the success of his labors, and of the sufferings of some of his disciples; and Pliny (A. D. 107), Tacitus (A. D. 110), Suetonius (A. D. 116), Celsus (same century), Porphyry (A. D. cir. 250), Julian (cir. A. D. 350), and several other early pagan writers, either distinctly speak of the life and death of Christ, and of the origin and manners of his disciples; or, by the references which they make to the sacred books, they admit them to have been genuine and authentic documents.

2. It is deserving of notice, that the three last-mentioned writers wrote expressly against the Christian religion, although they did not venture to say or insinuate anything against the facts of the Scripture history. Now, if the truth of those facts had been in the least degree questionable, can there be a doubt that these its enemies would have assailed them with the same zeal and virulence which they directed against the religion with which these facts were identified? This would have been so obvious and short a method of proceeding, in the prosecution of their object, that they could not fail to have resorted to it; and the omission, therefore, warrants the inference, that the facts which attest the Christian system were admitted to be placed beyond cavil or dispute.

SECTION VI.

THE INTEGRITY OF THE BIBLICAL TEXT.

1. It is almost unnecessary, after what has been said in discussing the subject of probably the words of the author. The Greek MSS., then, of any one of the Gospels, the versions of it, and the quotations from it by the fathers, are all, professedly, copies of that Gospel, or of parts of it; and these parts correspond with each other.

But as these professed copies thus correspond with each other, it follows that they were derived more or less remotely from one archetype. Their agreement admits of no explanation, except of their being conformed to a common exemplar. In respect to each of the Gospels, the copies which we possess must all be referred for their source to one original Gospel, one original text, one original manuscript. As far back as our knowledge extends, Christians, throughout all past ages, in Syria, at Alexandria, at Rome, at Carthage, at Constantinople, and at Moscow, in the East and in the West, have all used copies of each of the Gospels, which were evidently derived from one original manuscript, and necessarily imply that such a manuscript, existing as their archetype, has been faithfully copied.¹ Genuineness of the Gospels, vol. i. p. 29. ²

If it is notorious, too, that no book was permitted to be read in the primitive church but what was deemed canonical — a proof, not only of the divine authority of the sacred writings, but of their integrity also. They were ever before the eye, and sounding in the ear. [In estimating the weight of evidence, which has thus far been adduced, for the genuineness of the Gospels, says Mr. Norton, 'it is important to keep in mind what has not always been sufficiently attended to — that it is not the testimony of certain individual writers alone, on which we rely, important as their testimony might be. These writers speak for a whole community, every member of which had the strongest reasons for ascertaining the correctness of his faith respecting the authenticity, and consequently the genuineness, of the Gospels.' We quote the Christian fathers, not chiefly to prove their individual belief, but in evidence of the belief of the community to which they belonged. It is not, therefore, the simple testimony of Irenaeus, and Theophilus, and Tertullian, and Clement, and Origen, which we bring forward; it is the testimony of thousands and tens of thousands of believers, many of whom were as well informed as they were on this particular subject, and as capable of making a right judgment. All these

* Horace Paulinus, chap. vii.

¹ There is a very remarkable passage in Josephus against Apion, b. 1, § 8, where he asserts that such was the veneration among the Jews for the sacred books, that in the very long series of ages, no one, down to his time, had ever dared to add to or take away any thing from them, or even to make in them the least alteration.

² See pt. i. ch. 2, sect. 5.

As to the Gospels, Mr. Norton remarks, 'There have been examined, in a greater or less degree, about 670 MSS. of the whole, or of portions, of the Greek text of the Gospels. These were written in different countries, and at different periods, probably from the 5th century, downwards. They have been found in places widely remote from each other, in Asia, in Africa, and from one extremity of Europe to the other. Besides these MSS. of the Greek text, there are many MSS. of ancient versions of the Gospels, in at least 11 different languages of the three great divisions of the world just mentioned. There are, likewise, many MSS. of the works of the Christian fathers, abounding in quotations from the Gospels; and, especially, of ancient commentaries on the Gospels, such as those of Origen, who lived in the 3d century, and of Chrysostom, who lived in the 4th; in which we find their text quoted, as the different portions of it are successively the objects of remark. Now, all these different copies of the Gospels, or parts of the Gospels, so numerous, so various in their character, so unconnected, offering themselves to notice in parts of the world so remote from each other, concur in giving us essentially the same text. . . .

'The agreement among the extant copies of any one of the Gospels, or of portions of it, is essential; the disagreements are accidental and trifling, originating in causes, which, from the nature of things, we know must have been in operation. Every copy of any one of the Gospels presents us with essentially the same work, the same general history, the same particular facts, the same doctrines, the same precepts, the same characteristics of the writer, the same form of narration, the same style, and the same use of language; and, by comparing together different copies, we are able to ascertain the original text to a great degree of exactness; or, in other words, where various readings occur, to determine what were doctrines and rites;—all these things rendered any material alteration in the sacred books utterly impossible, while the silence of their ancient enemies, who would most assuredly have charged them with the attempt if it had been made, and the agreement of all the MSS. and Versions extant, are positive proofs of the integrity and incorruptness of the N. T., which are further attested by the agreement with it of all the quotations which occur in the writings of the Christians, from the earliest age to the present time.* In fact, so far from there having been any gross adulteration in the sacred volumes, the best and most able writers have proved that, even in lesser matters, the Holy Scriptures have suffered less from the injury of time and the errors of transcribers than any other writings whatever; and that the very worst MS. extant would not misrepresent one article of faith, or destroy one moral precept†

SECTION VII.

THE DIVINE AUTHORITY OF THE BIBLICAL BOOKS.

Having now ascertained that the books composing the Old and New Testaments are in every particular true, as we now possess them, it follows that they comprise the subject-matter of a divine revelation. They assert this, and claim it as their distinguishing character. They rest the obligation to receive their testimony upon this ground: ‘For if the word spoken by angels was steadfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompence of reward, how shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation; which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard him, God also bearing them witness, both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to his own will?’ He. 2:2-4. This passage of the apostolic writings indicates not only the divine character of the substance of the biblical books, but also the specific proofs by which that divine character is attested and sustained. At these proofs it is now our business to glance. They are, miracles and prophecy—the qualities of the doctrines propounded—and their miraculous propagation through the world. A few words upon each of these topics shall close this ch.

I. We have already said, when treating of the accumulated evidence of divine revelation, that MIRACLES—public, unequivocal miracles—exhibited, bring home to the very senses of men the intervention of a divine power; and that, competently witnessed and recorded, they transmit the conviction from age to age. Now, such miracles—that is, unequivocal and publicly-exhibited miracles—are the very credentials which are exhibited of the divine mission and authoritative teaching of the prophets, the Messiah, the apostles, and the evangelists, whose combined sayings and discourses form the subject-matter of the divine revelation. The plagues of Egypt, as they are usually denominated, consisted of a series of publicly-exhibited and unequivocal miracles, wrought to attest the divine mission of Moses, and admitted, even by the interested opponents of the Hebrew prophet and legislator, to have been performed by ‘the finger of God.’ Ex. 3:19. Throughout the prophetic writings we meet with numerous similar occurrences, all performed with equal publicity, accompanied by the same unequivocal evidence, and extorting from the enemies of God’s people similar self-condemnatory confessions. The life of our Savior was a series of such miraculous works; and upon this ground he appealed to the Jewish people to admit his Messiahship, and embrace his doctrines: ‘If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had not had sin; but now have they both seen and hated both me and my Father.’ Jn. 15:24. ‘And many of the people believed on Him, and said, When Christ cometh, will He do more miracles than these which this man hath done?’ ch. 7:31. See also ch. 10:37,38, 44-41. To the miracles of the apostles and evangelists, including all the primitive preachers of the gospel, the same writings also bear the most unequivocal testimony, showing that, in preaching the word, ‘God bare them witness, both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to his own will.’ He. 2:4. The inference is irresistible. A miracle, being an event or occurrence out of the ordinary course of nature, is placed beyond the reach of any human agency, and therefore, when brought to pass according to previous notice, it cannot but be regarded as the testimony of God, borne to the character and mission of the person or persons by whom it is performed. This conclusion necessarily results from the perfect veracity of the Supreme Being, who never can give his testimony to any thing but truth.

2. The various proofs that we have shown to exist in favor of the authenticity of the sacred writings are, of course, conclusive on behalf of the miracles which those writings deserve to have been wrought in attestation of their truth. But we have not exhausted the indications of their divinity when we have shown the publicity with which they were performed, the scrutiny they underwent, the godlike end to which they stood in the relation of means, as also their unspeakable greatness as actions or events. These miracles were not isolated events; they are legitimately taken in combination with other data. Visible interventions on the part of the Eternal, they appear in close relationship to that prescience which announced what Omnipotence was afterwards to perform. This is more emphatically true of the miracles of our Lord and Savior, although the argument is not exclusively applicable to them.

3. The miracles of our Lord are, then, not only magnificent in their structure, but they correspond to predictions laid down hundreds of years before he had manifested forth his glory, in turning the water into wine at Cana in Galilee. An impostor had here a double difficulty; he was required, not merely to perform miraculous actions, but to preserve certain striking points of agreement between these and specific predictions, which were not only universally circulated believers were equally ready with the writers who have been quoted to affirm the authority and genuineness of the Gospels. The most distinguished Christians of the age, men held in high esteem by their contemporaries and successors, assert that the Gospels were received as genuine throughout the community of which they were members, and for which they were writing. That the assertion was made by such men, under such circumstances, is sufficient evidence of its truth. But the proof of the general reception of the Gospels does not rest upon their assertions only, though these cannot be doubted. It is necessarily implied in their statements and reasonings respecting their religion. It is impossible that they should have so abundantly quoted the Gospels, as conclusive authority for their own faith, and that of their fellow-Christians, if these books had not been regarded by Christians as conclusive authority. We cannot infer more confidently from the sermons of Tillotson and Clarke, the estimation in which the Gospels were held in their day, than we may infer from the writers before mentioned, that they were held in similar estimation during the period when they lived.* Norton’s ‘Genuineness of the Gospels,’ vol. i. p. 133. ‘He then goes on to show how different this testimony is from that which is exhibited respecting any other ancient books, where individuals spoke only their own personal conviction, and not the sentiments of a whole community; also that early Christians had abundant means of determining the question about the genuineness of the Gospels; that their among the people he desired to convince, but were also jealously guarded by them as their peculiar inheritance—the last of all their glories. And when the nature of the miracles which he was required officially to perform is taken into account, the difficulty becomes so insurmountable, that the most egregious impostor would have shrunk from encountering it. It was predicted of the Messiah, that he should declare the acceptable year of the Lord; and that declaration, in its proper sense, could only have been made by the true Messiah; such would have been a profligacy, nay, a dangerous, announcement to an impostor. Put it may be said that it admitted of a forced interpretation; that he who could not legally use the prophecy, might illegally have accommodated it to his own sinister views; that the Antichrist might have declared the time of his own imposture to have been the season predicted; that he might have announced himself as the person sent from heaven to realize those oracles which ascribed to the Messiah the redemption of Israel. But suppose such an individual to be besieged by the lame, the blind, and the paralytic, asking his official assistance, and imploring the exertions of his curative powers; could he have acted as the Savior of the world did in the case of the disciples of John, who were sent to interrogate Him regarding his Messiahship, when in the same hour He fulfilled what ancient prophets had predicted of the Messiah, and sent his examiners to John to bear witness to the validity of his pretensions? Such an individual, like Mahomet, would have craftily evaded the exhibition of miraculous powers. He would, in accordance with the spirit of the times, have merged the worker of miracles in the turbulent demagogue—the teacher of righteousness in the fierce leader of banditti and the prime agent of sedition!†

I. Taking all the circumstances into consideration, then, and giving to each of them its due weight in the argument, it may be safely averred, that the miracles by which the divine revelation comprised in the Holy Scriptures is authenticated, stand upon more irrefragable ground than do any other historical facts.

II. Amongst the evidences of divine revelation, THE FULFILMENT OF PROPHECY takes a foremost place. This is a standing miracle, exhibited to the senses of men, in every age of the world, and, in different degrees, commanding their attention and regard. If, long antecedent to its occurrence, a specific event, not resulting from the operation of ordinary causes, and altogether independent of human control, be clearly and circumstantially foretold, there is ground for a strong presumption that the source of that foreknowledge in which the prediction took its rise, is referable to omniscience. If the number of such predictions become multiplied, and the particularity of their character increased, the presumption of a divine interposition is, of course, proportionably augmented. To anticipate a general effect from the operation of known causes, is all that the power of man can attain to; and even in this, his calculations are not unfrequently marked by error. Even in relation to the moral and even literary character was much elevated above that of the mass of the heathen around them, and therefore they were more capable than was ordinary of judging in the premises; while at the same time we have abundant evidence of their honesty and integrity. I would recommend the whole of this excellent passage to the attentive perusal and consideration of every candid reader.’ Prof. Stuart, in Bib. Repos., April, 1838. To.

† Pareau has some brief remarks on the integrity of the books of the O. T. in his ‘Principles of Interpr.’ pt. i. s. 1, ch. v. § 3.

† The chief difficulty of infidelity (and we have a right to press it) must be to account for the consecutive dispensations of religion, and the successively formed portions of Scripture, which are such striking phenomena in the history of our religion. The notion of an imposture—a conspiracy for a thousand years—is too wild for even madness itself. But were we for a moment to give countenance to a supposition so unnatural—to try by probability what outrages common sense, experience, and analogy—we would ask if it be likely that those who preferred the predictions regarding the Messiah would have shaped out for the coming impostor of their system a task in which he was sure to have been covered over with the disgrace of complete and merited failure?—Sticke’s ‘Philosophy of the Evidences of Christianity,’ chap. iii. seq.

commonest events, there is often a material discrepancy between the anticipation and the actual occurrence. There is no recorded instance in which unaided human reason was able to scan the future with certainty. In all human calculations, too, the conclusion results from some known data; but even with this advantage, nothing more than a general effect is attempted to be foretold; the precise mode of occurrence — excepting where the whole event depends upon well-known and immutable laws — is rarely foreseen. The Bible, on the contrary, as we have seen in a former section, contains innumerable predictions relating to very distant events, in no wise under the control of man, and resulting from no conceivable or known law of nature. To pass by those general predictions of the coming of the Messiah that are to be found 'scattered throughout the O. T. from Genesis to Malachi,' there are numerous other prophecies, belonging to this class, of so circumstantial and minute a description, that they cannot fail to impress an ingenuous mind with a conviction of their having proceeded from God.

1. Thus it was foretold that the Messiah should be born of a virgin (Is. 7:14), in the city of Bethlehem (Mic. 5:2), of the seed of Jesse (Is. 11:1-10); that He should lead a life of poverty and suffering (Ps. 22), inflicted upon Him, not for Himself (Da. 9:26), but for the sins of others (Is. 53); that after a short confinement in the grave He should rise again (Ps. 16:10); that He should sit upon the throne of David forever, and be called the 'Mighty God' (Is. 9:6,7) — 'the Lord our Righteousness' (Jer. 33:16) — 'Immanuel' (Is. 7:14. Mat. 1:23) — and, by David himself, whose son He was, 'Lord' (Ps. 110:1. Mat. 22:41. Ac. 23:4). The time of his advent was to be before the sceptre should depart from Judah (Ge. 49:10), during the continuance of the second temple (Hag. 3:7-9), and within seventy weeks, or four hundred and ninety years, from its erection (Da. 9:24). From these and many other prophecies, the coming of the Messiah was at all times the general expectation of the Jews; and that this expectation had ripened into full maturity at the time of his advent, may be inferred from the number of false Messiahs who about that period made their appearance. That He was also the expectation of the Gentiles (see Ge. 29:10. Hag. 2:7), is evinced by the coming of the wise men from the East to pay their adoration to Him (Mat. 2). All over the East, indeed, there was a general tradition, that about that time a king would appear in Judea, who should govern the whole world. This expectation was so strongly excited at Rome, a few months before the birth of Augustus, that the senate made a decree to expatriate all the children who should be born during that year. Its execution, however, was eluded by a trick of some of the senators, who were induced to hope that they might become the fathers of the promised prince. The currency of the tradition is recorded with a remarkable identity of phrase, by Suetonius^{*} and Tacitus,[†] two Roman historians of great eminence. Now, that in this there was no collusion between the Chaldeans, Romans, and Jews, is sufficiently proved by the desperate methods suggested, or carried into effect, for its discomfiture. Nor, in fact, is it practicable for whole nations of contemporaries, and still less, if possible, for those of successive, generations, to concert a story perfectly harmonious in all its minute accompaniments of time, place, manner, and other circumstances.

2. But there are several prophecies relative to the Messiah, of a still more minute and circumstantial nature. These foretell particular incidents in the gospel narrative, unparalleled in the whole range of history, and which could have been foreseen by God alone. They were certainly not foreseen by the agents in their accomplishment, or they would never have contributed to the fulfilment of prophecies referred even by themselves to the Messiah, and verifying the divine mission of Him whom they crucified as an impostor.[‡]

3. Then, there are the thousand predictions, circumstantial and remote, of other and divers strange events, the fulfilment of which has been seen by the whole world. According to some of these, the descendants of Shem and Japheth are 'ruling' and 'enlarged,' while the wretched descendants of Ham are still 'the servants of servants' (Ge. 9:25-27); the posterity of Ishmael have 'multiplied exceedingly,' and become 'a great nation,' in the Arabians; yet living like 'wild men,' and shifting from place to place in the wilderness, 'their hand against every man, and every man's hand against them,' and still 'dwelling,' an independent and free people, 'in the presence of all their brethren,' and in the presence of all their enemies (Ge. 16:10-12. 17:20); the family of Esau has become extinct, 'cut off' forever, so that there is 'none' remaining of the house of Esau (Jer. 49:17. Ez. 25:12. Jo. 3:19. Am. 1:11. Ob. 10:13); 'the sceptre has departed from Judah' (Ge. 49:10), though the Jews still 'dwell alone, and are not reckoned among the nations,' while 'the remembrance of Amalek is utterly put out from under heaven' (Nu. 23:29. 24:10); Nineveh is so completely destroyed, that the place thereof cannot be known (Na. 1:3). Babylon has been swept with the besom of destruction, and is made 'a desolation forever, a possession for the bitter and pools of water,' 'a dwelling-place for dragons, an astonishment and hissing, without an inhabitant' (Is. 13: 14); Tyre has become 'like the top of a rock, a place for fishers to spread their nets upon' (Ez. 26:4, 5); Egypt, 'a base kingdom, the basest of the kingdoms,' still tributary and subject to strangers, so that it has never been able to 'exalt itself above the nations' (Ez. 29:14, 15); the fourth and last of the four great empires, which was greater and more powerful than any of the former, has been divided into ten lesser kingdoms; and among them has arisen a power 'with a triple crown, diverse from the first,' with 'a mouth speaking very great things,' and with 'a look more stately than his fellows, speaking great things against the Most High, wearing out the saints of the Most High, and changing times and laws,' which did 'cast down the truth to the ground, and prosper, and practise, and destroy the holy people, not regarding the God of his fathers, nor the desire of women, nor the regard of any god,' but 'honoring the god of forces,' or Mauzzim, gods protectors, and causing the priests of Mauzzim 'to rule over many, and to divide the land for gain' (Da. 11:37-39); for their disobedience and infidelity to their 'great prophet, like unto Moses,' the Hebrews have been 'plucked from off their own land, and removed into all the kingdoms of the earth, and scattered among the heathen, among the nations, among all people, from one end of the earth even to the other, sifted among all nations, like as corn is sifted in a sieve,' have been 'left few in number among the heathen,' have 'pined away in their iniquity in their enemies' lands,' have 'become an astonishment, a proverb, and a by-word among all nations,' 'a reproach, a taunt, and a curse,' have 'found among these nations no ease, and the sole of their foot has had no rest; but the Lord has given them a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind, and sent a faintness into their hearts in the lands of their enemies, so that the sound of a shaken leaf has chased them, and they have been many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without a teraphim' (Le. 26:33,39. De. 29:62-67. Ez. 6:10-15. Ho. 3:4); and yet, while their mighty conquerors are everywhere destroyed, they are miraculously preserved a distinct people.

4. In like manner, the predictions interwoven in the writings of the N. T. are conclusive of their divine character. The destruction of Jerusalem, with all its attendant and unusual circumstances; the series of ages during which the holy city has been trodden down by the Gentiles; the long-continued dispersion of the Jews, and the conversion of the Gentiles to the true religion; the apostasy of the Western church; the division of the Roman empire into ten kingdoms; their concurrence to support the assumptions of the church of Rome, and several other events predicted by our Savior or his apostles, afford the most convincing evidence that the books containing them, as well as the persons who uttered them, were possessed by a divine inspiration.

5. Amongst these predictions, those which relate to the overthrow of the holy city, and the termination of the Jewish polity, are the most remarkable and distinguished. At the time when our Lord uttered these prophecies, there was nothing to have suggested such a state of things as they include, to a mind not illuminated by the omniscience of God. The Jews, indeed, cherished a deep and bitter hostility towards their foreign oppressors; but the idea of a weak, and abject, and conquered people, proceeding to such a pitch of resistance as to require the legions of Rome and the generalship of Titus to subdue them; the notion that the degraded city of Jerusalem, then garrisoned by Roman soldiers, would put itself into a defensive posture against the military prowess of the master of the world, — might have appeared wild and unreasonable to ordinary judgments; every thing rather omened a universal degeneracy among all ranks; that the loss of freedom would be succeeded by that of virtue, and that again by the dereliction of all public spirit; that rampant crimes would be found linked to a mean and cringing pusillanimity; and that the people whose forefathers had formed the victorious hosts of Israel, would be degraded to the miserable and uncomplaining slaves of an irresistible despotism. Prophecy never appears so godlike as when it looks not merely through the vista of the natural but of the moral futurity; when it surveys the mechanism of minds which exist only in the presence of God, and takes cognizance of events beheld alone on the illuminated field of the divine foreknowledge. Were we to allow that our blessed Lord's predictions regarding the overthrow of Jerusalem, as a political event, might have been emitted by hasty statesmen, and the ruin of the Jews described by a farsighted sagacity; to what shall we ascribe that wisdom in Him which explores the human spirit, and grasps the whole complex futurity of men's contrivance? His predictions regarding the destruction of the Jewish polity extend themselves to minute contingencies, and embrace actions which apparently depended rather on caprice and wantonness, than on any general principles of conduct. These oracles of Jesus had, therefore, a peculiarly divine character; they indicate that they originated in the sublime wisdom of God, 'who in times past spake to the fathers by the prophets,' and to the world, 'in these latter days, by his Son,' the great agent of his government in the church, under every dispensation of his 'glorious gospel.' The shortening of the days, for the elect's sake — the destruction of the temple, against the inclinations and command of Titus — the obstinacy of the Jews, within the precincts of that sacred edifice — the removal of the foundation-stones of the temple — and the passing a plough-share over the ground in which they were imbedded by the lieutenant of Titus, were events improbable indeed, but which enter in some way into the predictions uttered by our Savior, to whom the apostle Peter justly ascribed a universal knowledge: "Lord, thou knowest all things!"*

III. The unexampled and perfect MORAL PURITY OF THE DOCTRINES propounded in the Scriptures, and their universal fitness to the exigencies of mankind, furnish another and unanswerable proof that they are the revelations of the Almighty. The scheme of doctrine and morality contained in the Bible is so exalted, pure, and benevolent, that God only could either devise or appoint it; [for the highest efforts of the best men have yet but imperfectly realized the system; and no nation has arrived even near that civilization it can effect.] In the Scriptures alone, and in such books as make them their basis, the infinite God is introduced as speaking in a manner worthy of Himself, with simplicity, majesty, and authority. His character, as there delineated, comprises all possible excellence, without any intermixture; his laws and ordinances therein accord with his perfections [and the constitution of man]; his works and dispensations exhibit them; and all his dealings with his creatures bear the stamp of infinite wisdom, power, justice, purity, truth, goodness, and mercy, harmoniously displayed. While the Supreme Being is thus described as possessed of every perfection, unbounded and incomprehensible in his essence and nature, and as the creator, governor, and benefactor of his creatures, the Scriptures represent man in a lapsed state, a rebellious and fallen being, alienated from God and goodness, averse by nature to all that is good and amiable, and prone to every thing that is sinful and hateful, and consequently exposed to the eternal wrath of God. The Scriptures, however, do not leave us in this wretched state; they propose an adequate remedy for all our diseases, and an ample supply for all our wants. Laws of universal purity and benevolence are prescribed with an authority proper only to God, and extended to such a compass and degree as God alone can demand; and those sins are forbidden which God alone could either observe or prohibit. The most powerful motives to duty, and dissuasives from vice, are wisely proposed and powerfully urged—motives drawn from the nature and perfections, the promises and threatenings, the mercies and judgments of God; particularly from his overflowing benevolence and mercy in the work of our redemption, and from advantages and disadvantages, temporal, spiritual, and eternal. Now, these things were written at a time when all the rest of the world—even the wisest, and most learned, and most celebrated nations of the earth—were sunk in the grossest ignorance of God and religion; were worshipping idols and brute beasts, indulging themselves in the most abominable vices; living in envy, hatred, and strife; hateful, and hating one another. It is a most singular circumstance that a people in a remote, obscure corner of the world, far inferior to several heathen nations in learning, in philosophy, in genius, in science, and in all the polite arts, should yet be so infinitely their superiors in their ideas of a Supreme Being, and of every thing relative to morality and religion. This cannot be accounted for on any other supposition, than that of their having been instructed in these things by God Himself, or by persons commissioned or inspired by Him.

IV. The rapid and extensive PROPAGATION OF CHRISTIANITY affords another evidence of its divine character.

1. The success that immediately attended the personal ministry of Christ was extremely limited, if we merely regard the number of persons who attached themselves to Him. His object seemed to be—after exhibiting sufficient proofs of his divine mission and character—to prepare the minds of men for the preaching of his apostles, when the dispensation of his kingdom should have been fully opened by the effusion of the Holy Spirit, rather than to surround Himself with a large number of disciples during his personal ministry. Accordingly we find, from the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles, that almost immediately after our Savior's ascension, that is, as soon as the apostles were endowed with power from on high, the number of converts began rapidly to increase, and continued to do so in every place where the story of the Savior's resurrection was declared. The first assembly of the disciples consisted of only 120 persons (Act. 1:15). About a week after this, they added 3000 to their number in the course of one day (2:1); and the number publicly baptized, and publicly associating together, was very soon augmented to 5000 (4:4). Thus, it will be recollect, was in the very place where our Lord had made his appearance, discharged his public ministry, and suffered death. Within very years from this time the converts so astonishingly increased, that multitudes, both of men and women, to the extent of myriads, tens of thousands (21:20), were members of the infant church. In the century following, Pliny informs us that he found the heathen temples in Achaea almost deserted;† and Tertullian subsequently declares, that if the Christians were to withdraw, whole cities and provinces would be dispeopled;‡ that the Parthians, Medes, Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, Armenia, Phrygia, Cappadocia; the inhabitants of Pontus, Asia, and Pamphylia; they that dwell in Egypt and in Africa, beyond Cyrene; Romans and strangers; Jews and other people in Judea; the various sorts of people in Getulia, the countries of the Moors, all the borders of Spain, the different nations of Gaul, and those parts of Britain which the Romans could not reach; the Sarmatians, also, with the Dacii, the Germans, the Scythians, and others, were all subject to Christ.¶

2. "It has been observed, with truth as well as propriety," says a writer who will not be suspected of much affection for Christianity, though his acquaintance with the laws of evidence forbade his contradicting the general veracity of the evangelical history, "that the conquests of Rome prepared and facilitated those of Christianity. The authentic histories of the actions of Christ were composed in the Greek language, after the Gentile converts were grown extremely numerous. As soon as those histories were translated into the Latin tongue, they were perfectly intelligible to all the subjects of Rome, excepting only to the peasants of Syria and Egypt, for whose benefit particular versions were afterwards made. The public highways, which had been constructed for the use of the legions, opened an easy passage for the Christian missionaries from Damascus to Corinth, and from Italy to the extremity of Spain or Britain. There is the strongest reason to believe, that before the reigns of Diocletian and Constantine, the faith of Christ had been preached in every province, and in all the great cities of the empire."|| The rich provinces that extended from the Euphrates to the Ionian seas, were the principal theatre on which the apostle of the Gentiles displayed his zeal and piety. The seeds of the gospel which he had scattered in a fertile soil, were diligently cultivated by his disciples; and it should seem that, during the two first centuries, the most considerable body of Christians was contained within those limits. Among the societies instituted in Syria, none were more ancient or more illustrious than those of Damascus, Berea or Aleppo, and Antioch. The prophetic introduction of the Apocalypse has described and immortalized the seven churches of Asia.—Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamos, Thyatira, Sardis, Laodicea, and Philadelphia; and their colonies were soon diffused over that populous country. In a very early period, the islands of Cyprus and Crete, the provinces of Thrace and Macedonia, gave a favorable reception to the new religion; and Christian republics were soon founded in the cities of Corinth, of Sparta, and of Athens. To these domestic testimonies we may add the confession, the complaints, and the apprehensions, of the Gentiles themselves. From the writings of Lucian, a philosopher who had studied mankind, and who describes their manners in the most lively colors, we may learn, that, under the reign of Commodus, his native country of Pontus was filled with the Epicureans and Christians. Within four score years after the death of Christ, the humane Pliny laments the magnitude of the evil which he vainly attempted to eradicate. In his very curious epistle to the emperor Trajan, he affirms, that the temples were almost deserted, that the sacred victims scarcely found any purchasers, and that the "superstition" had not only infected the cities, but had even spread itself into the villages and the open country of Pontus and Bithynia.¶

3. Thus we see, in the course of a few years, a new religion spread over all the principal parts of Asia and Europe, by the ministry of a few humble missionaries, and that at a time when paganism was in its highest repute, believed by the vulgar and supported by the great, the wisest men of the wisest nations assisting at its sacrifices, and consulting its oracles.

4. If Christianity had flattered the corrupt passions of mankind, and held out to them the prospects of power, wealth, rank, or pleasure; if it had soothed their vices, honored their prejudices, and encouraged their ancient superstitions; if its preachers had been men of brilliant talents or commanding eloquence; if they had first proposed it in times of darkness and ignorance, and among savage and barbarous nations; if they had been seconded by all the influence and authority of the great potentates of the earth, or propagated their doctrines at the head of a victorious army;—some reason might be assigned for its extraordinary success.

5. But the very reverse of all this was the case. It is notorious that the first preachers of the gospel declared open war against all the follies, vices, selfishness, interests, inveterate prejudices, and favorite superstitions of the world; that they were (with one or two exceptions) men of no great abilities or learning, or powers of persuasion; that their doctrines were promulgated in an enlightened age, and to the most polished nations, and had all the wit and learning, and eloquence and philosophy of the world to contend with; and that, instead of being aided by the authority and influence of the civil powers, they were opposed, and harassed, and persecuted by them, even to death, with the most unrelenting cruelty, and all who embraced their doctrines were exposed to the same hardships and sufferings.

6. Is it credible, then, that under these circumstances, twelve men, most of them illiterate, and all of them without influence, should of themselves invent a system of theology the most sublime, and of ethics the most perfect, and opposed, therefore, to all the vicious propensities, lax morality, and licentious and impure religion of the times; and by their own unaided powers give it a dominion over so large a part of the world, and in so short a period of time, as even to excite the astonishment and call forth the admiration of its bitterest enemies? If any one can believe such a thing, contradictory as it is to experience, and also to the nature of things, he must possess a much larger measure of faith than he is called upon to exercise in the reception of the Christian system.

7. The force of this argument did not escape the penetrating and acute mind of Gibbon, one of the most subtle and specious among infidel writers. The historian therefore undertook the hopeless task of assigning reasons for this extraordinary occurrence, which he hoped might be deemed adequate to the purpose, without further resorting to a divine influence and superintendence. These reasons have been subjected to a rigid scrutiny by Mr. Faber,* among other writers, who has shown them to be totally inadequate to solve the phenomena; and further, that this cannot be done without the admission of a supernatural interposition.

V. THE SUBSEQUENT REVIVALS AND TRIUMPHS OF CHRISTIANITY furnish a proof of its divine constitution, almost equally cogent with that derived from its early progress and dominion.

1. Upon this topic, the acute and eloquent author of the Natural History of Enthusiasm has the following observations, which, if they do not convince the skeptic, cannot fail to charm and confirm the believer:—

2. ‘If there were room to imagine that the first spread of Christianity was owing rather to an accidental confluence of favoring circumstances than to its real power over the human mind; or if it might be thought that any such peculiar virtue was all spent and exhausted in its first expansive effort; then it is natural to look to the next occasion in which the opinions of mankind were put in fermentation, and to watch in what manner the system of the Bible rode over the high billows of political, religious, and intellectual commotion. It was a fair trial for Christianity, and a trial essentially different from its first, when, in the 15th century, after having been corrupted in every part to a state of loathsome ulceration, it had to contend for existence, and to work its own renovation, at the moment of the most extraordinary expansion of the human intellect that has ever happened. At that moment, when the splendid literature of the ancient world started from its tomb, and kindled a blaze of universal admiration; at that moment, when the first beams of sound philosophy broke over the nations, and when the revival of the useful arts gave at once elasticity to the minds of the million, and a check of practical influence to the minds of the few; at the moment when the necromancy of the press came into play to expose and explode uncertainty of every other kind; and when the discovery of new continents, and of a new path to the old, tended to supplant a taste for whatever is visionary, by imparting a vivid taste for what is substantial;—at such a time, which seemed to leave no chance of continued existence to aught that was not in its nature vigorous, might it not confidently have been said, This must be the crisis of Christianity? If it be not inwardly sound; if it have not a true hold of human nature; if it be a thing of feebleness and dotation, fit only for cells, and cowls, and the precincts of spiritual despotism; if it be not adapted to the world of action; if it have no sympathy with the feelings of men, and of freemen; nothing can save it: no power of princes, no devices of priests, will avail to rear it anew, and to replace it in the veneration of the people; at least not in any country where has been felt the freshening gale of intellectual life. The result of this crisis need not be narrated.

* Difficulties of Infidelity, pp. 191-236.

† Republicanism or democracy exposes to two great dangers. The facility with which, under such a form of government, innovations can be made, may, in many cases, cause (what has been called the greatest error of government) that institutions be set up in advance of the people, and those not obtaining popular support, lawlessness ensues. But this evil, from the plenitude of democratic institutions, corrects itself. The other danger results in the same, though by a different route,—its institutions not being worthy with us, and venerable, not having historic objects and associations to cultivate the instinct of reverence, that faculty either hastens its life on persons, and so, in a certain sense, the old idol try of hero-worship is set up; or it is too inactive, and so, nothing being respected (the laws themselves being thought to be but creatures of their own), the people turn into irreverence to God, man, and law. Both these dangers show their remedy, which is now universally acknowledged to be—education, intellectual, moral, and religious. Intellectual education has had too exclusive attention, and in conformity with the example of Prussia, it is beginning to be seen, that moral education, to be effective, must be, not by precept or preaching merely, but by self-exercise of the moral faculties, in every-day efforts of choice and discrimination, as we strengthen any other taste, propensity, faculty, or muscle, by use. For religious

3. ‘It may even be doubted—had not Christianity been fraught with power—if all the influence of kings, and craft of priests, could have upheld it in any part of Europe, after the revival of learning; certainly not in those countries which received at the same time the invigoration of political liberty, and science, and commerce.

4. ‘With the history of the 15th and 16th century in view, it is asked if Christianity is a system that must always lean upon ignorance, and craft, and despotism, and which, when those rotten stays are removed, must fall, and be seen no more?

5. ‘Yet another species of trial was in store to give proof of the indestructibility and victorious power of Christianity. It remained to be seen whether, when the agitations, political and moral, consequent upon the great schism which had taken place in Europe, had subsided, and when the season of slumber and exhaustion came on, and when human reason, strengthened and refined by physical science, and elegant literature, should awake fully to the consciousness of its powers; whether then the religion of the Bible could retain its hold of the nations, or at least of those of them that enjoyed without limit the happy influences of political liberty and intellectual light. This was a sort of probation which Christianity had never before passed through.

6. ‘And what were the omens under which it entered upon the new trial of its strength? Were the friends of Christianity, at that moment of portentous conflict awake, and vigilant, and stout-hearted, and thoroughly armed to repel assaults? The very reverse was the fact. For at the instant when the atheistical conspiracy made its long-concerted, and well-advised, and spontaneous, and furious attack, there was scarcely a pulse of life left in the Christian body, in any one of the Protestant states. The old superstitions had crawled back into many of their ancient corners. In other quarters the spirit of protestation against those superstitions had breathed itself away in trivial wranglings, or had given place to infidelity—infidelity aggravated by stalled hypocrisy. The church of England—the chief prop of modern Christianity—was then torpid, and fainting under the incubus, of false doctrine and of a secular spirit, and seemed incapable of the effort which the peril of the time demanded; few indeed of her sons were panoplied, and soul-hearted, as champions in such a cause should be. Within a part only of a small body of dissenters (for a part was smitten with the plague of heresy), and that part in great measure disqualifed for free and energetic action by rigidities, and scruples, and divisions, was contained almost all the religious life and fervor anywhere to be found in Christendom.

7. ‘Meanwhile the infidel machinators had chosen their ground at leisure, and were wrought to the highest pitch of energy by a confident, and, as it might well seem, a well-founded, hope of success. They were backed by the secret wishes, or the undissembled cheerings of almost the entire body of educated men throughout Europe. They used the only language then common to the civilized world, and a language which might be imagined to have been framed and finished designedly to accomplish the demolition of whatever was grave and venerated; a language, beyond any other, of railing, of insinuation, and of sophistry; a language of polished missiles, whose temper could penetrate not only the cloak of imposture, but the shield of truth.

8. ‘At the same portentous moment the shocks and upheavings of political commotion opened a thousand fissures in the ancient structure of moral and religious sentiment, and the enemies of Christianity, surprised by unexpected success, rushed forward to achieve an easy triumph. The firmness and the wisest friends of old opinions desponded, and many believed that a few years would see atheism the universal doctrine of the Western nations, as well as military despotism the only form of government.

9. ‘It is hard to imagine a single advantage that was lacking to the promoters of infidelity, or a single circumstance of peril and ill omen that was not present to deepen the gloom of the friends of religion. The actual issue of that signal crisis is before our eyes in the freshness of a recent event. Christianity has triumphed. But shall it be said—or if said, believed—that the late resurrection of the religion of the Bible has been managed in the cabinets of monarchs? Have kings and emperors given this turn to public opinion, which now compels infidelity to hide its shame behind the very mask of hypocrisy that it had so lately torn from the face of the priest? To come home to facts with which all must be familiar—Has there not been heard, within the last few years, from the most enlightened, the most sober-minded, and the freest people of Europe, a firm, articulate, spontaneous, and cordial expression of preference, and of enhanced veneration, towards Christianity?

10. ‘The spread of the English stock, and language, and literature, over the North American continent, has afforded a distinct and very significant indication of the power of Christianity to retain its hold of the human mind, and of its aptness to run hand in hand with civilization, even when unaided by those secular succors to which its enemies in malice, and some of its friends in over-caution, are prone to attribute too much importance. The tendency of its republicanism, which obviously has some strong affinity with infidelity+—and the connection of the colonies, at the moment of their revolt, with France—and the prevalence of a peculiarly eager and uncorrected commercial temper—and the absence of every sort and semblance of restraint upon opinion—were concurrent circumstances, belonging to the infancy of the American Union, of a kind which put to the severest test the intrinsic power of Christianity, in retaining its hold of the human mind. Could infidel experimenters have wished for conditions more equitable under which to try the respective forces of the opposing systems?

11. ‘And what has been the issue? It is true that infidelity holds still its ground in the United States, as in Europe, and there, as in Europe, keeps company with whatever is debauched, sordid, oppressive, reckless, ruffian-like. But at the same time Christianity has gained rather education, we may hope much from the same, from Gell’s blessing on the universal circulation of the Bible, the numerous biblical works, and above all, on those harbingers of latter-day glories, Sabbath schools. [See Togwell’s ‘Habinger of the Millennium.’] Then, when the millions of our republic are educated, we shall perceive that true democracy is that form of government best fitted to the fast development of human civilization, to be expected upon earth—that in which the least hindrance is given to spiritual progress, in which, therefore, man is best educated for heaven, and in which respect to external forms and things is transferred to ‘spirituals,’ and man shall yield his will to the majesty of God’s eternal law alone; then, when the laws enacted by man shall coincide with those of God, will have come the ‘reign of the saints on earth,’ the glory of the Millennium Day.

See Bancroft’s History of the United States, where the great principles of our New World are shown and vindicated; and where is explained how the change in the condition of our land has been accomplished; and as the fortunes of a nation are not under the control of a blind destiny, the steps by which a favoring Providence [has called] these institutions into being, which have given us [what we enjoy of] happiness and glory.’ See introd. p. 4, 2d ed. than lost ground, and shows itself there in a style of as much fervor and zeal as in England; and perhaps, even has the advantage in these respects. Wherever, on that continent, good order and intelligence are spreading, there also the religion of the Bible spreads. And if it be probable that the English race, and language, and institutions, will, in a century, pervade its deserts, all appearances favor the belief that the edifices of Christian worship will bless every landscape of the present wilderness that shall then "blossom as the rose."¹

VI. We have now taken a brief, and necessarily imperfect, view of the guarantees which we possess for the original divine character of the revelation comprised in the sacred Scriptures, and for the integrity and preservation of the text by which it has been handed down to us. These guarantees are of the most satisfactory description, each one of them possessing at least the highest degree of probability; and the combined strength of the whole furnishing an amount of moral demonstration which cannot be challenged for any other ancient writings, nor be resisted by any ingenuous mind, surrendered up to the deliberate and dispassionate investigation of its claims. The word of Jehovah is "a sure word;" it comes to men in the "demonstration of the Spirit," and with "power," bringing down high imaginations, and every thing which exalts itself against God; "a humbling man, that it may [centre his love, thoughts, will and interests in God's, thus] raising him to the dignity of 'a son of God,' and justifying to worlds—seen and unseen—the inscrutable providence of its infinitely benevolent and only wise" Author.

CHAPTER IV.

SACRED INSTITUTIONS.

In the prosecution of that divine purpose [of bringing man's will back to conformity with God's], which we have seen it to have been the great object of revelation to accomplish, the Supreme Being has, from time to time, prescribed various institutions, and enjoined various duties. To these we shall now invite attention.

SECTION I.

THE CHURCH — PATRIARCHAL, JEWISH, AND CHRISTIAN.

Members of the Church — The Patriarchal Church — The Jewish Members of the Church; Corrupt Judaism — Jewish Sects — the Christian Church; its Constitution; Plurality; Equality of its Members; Submission to Divine Authority.

§ 1.— Of the Church generally.

The truths of divine revelation were published and tendered to the acceptance of the world — of mankind at large; but they have been, in all ages, received only by a few out of the general mass, which few, thus distinguished from the rest, have constituted "the church of the living God," or the assembly of believers and worshippers. Ac. 2: 47, 7:30. He. 2:12. The Greek appellation Ekklesia, from ek, out of, and koleos, I call, is clearly derivable from qhl, a calling, a gathering together, an assembly. It is applied to the general collection of the Israelitish people (De. 18:16); to the universal body of Christians (Mat. 16:18); and to any particular organized body or congregation (Ac. 16:5. Re. 1:2; 3). Among the characteristics of this community must especially be noted the fidelity of the members to themselves, to each other, and to God (Ge. 5:24, 6: 8,22. Ex. 20:3-17. Ps. 15; Mat. 6: 6; 7: 7; Phil. 4:3). But every thing is included in the spirit of hearty and habitual co-operation; "striving together," or as the sunathlontes min psuchi of Phil. 1:27, reads, "jointly contending with one soul." In numerous places of both Testaments, this spirit and practice are impressively demanded. Ps. 133; Is. 11:12-14. 1 Co. 12:31. 13:1-13. To increase their numbers, to proselyte from the world, to wait and wish for the accomplishment of sacred prophecy, to be united and unceasing in their exertions [for obedience], is their imperative duty and highest joy.*

§ 2.— Of the Patriarchal Church.

1. The patriarchal church was limited in its faith, and simple in its ritual and worship. The object of the dispensation under which it existed, was to inculcate the doctrine of redemption, through the peculiar death of the woman's promised seed; with its necessary concomitant — the doctrine of a recovered, happy immortality.† The church, at this period, therefore, comprised those who received and confided in these doctrines; as Abel, who obtained a witness from God that he was righteous (He. 11:4). Enoch, who walked with God (Ge. 5:24. He. 11,5),

Noah, who was heir of the righteousness which is by faith (He. 11:7), Abraham, who taught the doctrine of redemption, through the interrupted sacrifice of Isaac, looked for a heavenly country, and died in the faith (Heb. 11:8-19), Isaac, Jacob, Joseph [and Job], with many of their contemporaries and descendants, no doubt taught by their discourse and example, who by faith anticipated things to come, and obtained a good report, (He. 11:20-22, &c.).

2. The patriarchal church consisted of two periods — The first, from Adam to the flood; during which the apostasy of Cain, and his descendants took place, consisting in the rejection of the atonement, and which at length spread amongst the descendants of Seth, [true religion becoming a singularity, Ge. 4:26.] The second period was from Noah to the establishment of the Levitical dispensation; the apostasy from which consisted in astronomical hero-worship; while the doctrine of the atonement was strenuously maintained;‡

3. The priesthood, whose duty was to offer sacrifices, instruct the people, and superintend the worship offered to Jehovah, under the patriarchal dispensation, originally belonged to the first-born, Cain; but he forfeited it by apostate infidelity and murder. It then devolved upon Seth and his posterity, and was handed down through Noah, Shem, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob — Esau having sold his birthright to his younger brother — and thence to the time of Moses.

4. Of what may be called the discipline of the patriarchal church we know little or nothing; the notices in Ge. (which, with a few passages in Ga. and He. constitute our only records of this period) being few and scant of information.

§ 3.— Of the Jewish Church.

1. The Jewish church retained the same great and fundamental article of faith as that which constituted the prime feature of the patriarchal theology, but with additions called for by the peculiar character of the times when it was constituted, and the awful apostasy from the pure faith which prevailed almost universally in the world. The law given to the Hebrews by Moses was not intended in any way to interfere with or set aside the covenant made with Abraham, but rather to preserve it intact, and insure its fulfilment. Such is the reasoning of Paul, in his Epistle to the Galatians, who appear to have mistaken this matter. The gospel, as he argues, was preached to Abraham, and the covenant of faith made with him was so confirmed as to be incapable of being annulled:— "And this I say, that the covenant that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was 430 years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect. For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise; but God gave it to Abraham by promise. Wherefore then serveth the law?" It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made, and it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator.[§] Ga. 3.

2. Godwyn distinguishes the people of Israel into two sorts, Hebrews and Proselytes. Jennings advances a step higher, and divides the whole world, after the formation of the Hebrew commonwealth, into Jews and Gentiles.¶ The form of the Hebrew government being theocratic, each member of the state was also a member of the church, and hence the whole nation is said to be sanctified or holy. Le. 20:3, 21:3. 22:9, 16, 32, &c. In the later period of their history, the Jews were distinguished into two classes, viz. Hebrew Jews, and Hellenistic Jews or Greeks, as they are called in our translation, Jn. 12:20. Ac. 6:1. 9:29. 11:20. The former spoke and conducted their worship in the Hebrew, or rather Syro-Chaldaic language; and the latter in the Greek tongue. And although as members of the Jewish church they were considered as equally holy, the former were, nevertheless, considered as being the most honorable. Hence Paul boasts (Phil. 3:5) that he was "a Hebrew of the Hebrews," i. e. a Hebrew speaking and worshipping God in his own tongue. But, notwithstanding that the Jewish religion was peculiarly adapted to the Jewish nation, leave was given for the admission of proselytes, who were invested with certain privileges on their abjuration of idolatry, and submission to the worship of the true God. Of these proselytes there were three kinds, viz. slaves who embraced Judaism without receiving their freedom, proselytes of the gate, and proselytes of righteousness.||

(1) Slaves who embraced Judaism without receiving their liberty were either foreigners, who had been by some means bought into Jewish families, or they were the children of these foreigners. Of this kind of proselytes was Eliezer of Damascus, the steward of Abraham's house (Ge. 15:2,3), and to this does God compare Israel when he says, in Jer. 2:14, "Is he a homeborn slave; why is he spoiled?"

(2) Proselytes of the gate were persons who, without undergoing circumcision, on observing the Mosaic ritual, engaged to worship the true God, and observe the seven precepts of Noah. Naaman the Syrian (2 K. 5:18) and Cornelius the centurion (Ac. 10:2) are thought to have belonged to this class.

(3) The proselytes of righteousness were more highly favored than the proselytes of the gate, for they might trade with Jews, marry with Jews, enter within the sacred fence of the temple, and partake of the annual feasts.¶ There were several things, however, to which they were bound to submit, before they were entitled to these privileges; as, instruction in the principles of the Jewish religion, circumcision, baptism, the offering a sacrifice to Jehovah, &c. After having submitted to the rites of circumcision and baptism, the scholars who had attended as witnesses gave the proselytes a certificate, which, when presented to any synagogue, constituted them church members while they resided within the bounds.* If the head of a family was in this way baptized, the infants and slaves were baptized at the same time, without asking their consent; the former, because they could not give it; and the latter, as being the master's property, and having no rights of their own. Sons arrived at years of maturity were not baptized unless they wished it.†

(4) The female proselytes were received by baptism and sacrifice.‡

(5) We must not omit to remark, that, after having submitted to the prescribed rites, the proselyte was considered as having been born again. Thus the Jews say, 'When a man's made a proselyte, he is like a new-born infant,' and 'he hath a new soul.' They even went so far as to maintain that the bond of natural relation between him and his kindred was now dissolved. Some have supposed that there is an allusion to the proselyte's renunciation of his natural relations in Lu. 14:20, and Ps. 45:10. Tacitus, in his character of the Jews, having mentioned their custom of circumcision, as adopted by proselytes, adds, 'They then quickly learn to despise the gods, to renoance their country, and to hold their parents, children, and brethren, in the utmost contempt.' It is probable this unnatural contempt, which the Jewish doctors taught proselytes to entertain of their nearest relations, might be one thing, on account of which they are said to have 'made them twofold more the children of hell than themselves.' Mat. 23:15.§

3. Among the sacred persons in the Jewish constitution, we may properly enumerate,—

(1) The KINGS, who were the vicegerents of God, as the supreme magistrate of the state, and whose persons were, consequently, considered to be sacred and inviolable, 1 S. 24:5-8. 2 S. 1:1.

(2) The PROPHETS formed another class of sacred persons, and were raised up by God Himself, to be the ministers of his dispensation. The business of the prophets was not merely to reveal secret things, whether past, present, or future; but also to instruct the people, and interpret the law and will of God. According to St. Augustine,|| they were the philosophers, divines, instructors, and guides of the people; forming the bulwarks of religion, as witnesses of the divine presence, and living monuments of his will. In the earliest ages of the world, some individuals were raised up to sustain this sacred office; but from Moses to Malachi there was an uninterrupted succession of these public teachers, who testified against the misdoings of the people, labored to call them back to a sense of their duty, and comforted and animated the pious and sincere, by predictions of future blessings. Their mode of living was most frugal, and their apparel was generally very plain. Their fidelity and zeal in the service of Jehovah frequently exposed them to cruel persecutions, in which they chose rather to submit to death than to sully their sacred character. The gift of prophecy was not always annexed to the priesthood: there were prophets of all the tribes, and sometimes even among the Gentiles. Godwyn observes that, for the propagation of learning, colleges and schools were erected for the prophets. The first intimation we have of these is in 1 S. 10:5, where the company of prophets are supposed to have been students in a college of prophets at Gibeath. These students were called sons of the prophets, and are frequently mentioned in after-ages, even in the most degenerate times (see 2 K. 2:3,5, 4:38); and it seems from 1 K. 18:4, that they were very numerous. They were educated under a proper master (who was commonly, if not invariably, a prophet) in the knowledge of religion and of sacred music (1 S. 10:5, 19:20), and were thereby qualified to be public teachers of religion. It seems that the prophets were generally chosen out of these schools. (See Am. 7:14,15.) It was usual among the heathen to designate all such persons as were conversant with divine things by the name of prophet, in conformity with which Paul, when citing a passage from Epimenides, calls him a prophet (Ti. 1:12). Speaking of prophets in the Christian church, the same apostle clearly defines their character by saying, that 'he who prophesieh, speaketh unto men to edification, and exhortation, and comfort' (1 Co. 14:3).¶

(3) NAZARITES were persons separated from the use of certain things, and peculiarly devoted or consecrated to the service of God. The law relative to the Nazarite is given in Nu. ch 6. The vow of the Nazarite consisted in the following particulars: (1) He consecrated himself in a very especial and extraordinary manner to God. (2) This was to continue for a certain time, eight days or a month, but perhaps seldom less than a year, that he might have a full growth of hair to burn in the fire, which is under the sacrifice of the peace-offering. (3) During the time of his separation he drank no wine nor strong drink, nor used any vinegar formed from an intoxicating liquor, nor ate fresh or dried grapes, nor tasted even the kernels or husks of any thing that had grown upon the vine. (4) He never shaved his head, but let his hair grow, as the proof of his being in this separated state, and under vows of peculiar austerity. (5) He never touched any dead body, nor did any of the last offices, even to his nearest kin, but was considered as the priests, who were wholly taken up with the service of God, and regarded nothing else. (6) All the days of his separation he was holy; during the whole time he was to be incessantly employed in religious acts. Perpetual Nazarites, as Samson and John Baptist, were consecrated to their Nazariteship by their parents. Those who made a vow of Nazariteship out of Palestine, and could not come to the temple when their vow was expired, contented themselves with observing the abstinence required by the law, and cutting off their hair in the place where they were: the offerings and sacrifices prescribed by Moses, to be offered at the temple by themselves, or by others for them, they deferred till a convenient opportunity. Hence Paul, being in Achaea, having made the vow of a Nazarite, had his hair cut off at Cenchrea, a port of Corinth, but deferred the complete fulfilment of his vow till he came to Jerusalem. Ac. 18:13. When a person found that he was not in a condition to make a vow of Nazariteship, or that he had not leisure fully to perform it, he contented himself with contributing to the expense of the sacrifices and offerings of those who had made and were fulfilling this vow. By this means he became a partaker of such Nazariteship. Maimonides says, that he who would partake in the Nazariteship of another, went to the temple, and said to the priest, 'In such a time such a one will finish his Nazariteship; I intend to defray the charge attending the shaving off his hair, either in part or in the whole.' When Paul came to Jerusalem (Ac. 21:23,21), James, with other brethren, advised that, to quiet the minds of the converted Jews, he should unite with four persons, who had vows of Nazariteship, and contribute to their charges and ceremonies, by which the people would perceive that he did not disregard the law, as they had been led to suppose.††

§ 4.—Of Corrupt Judaism.

1. It is impossible to take even a cursory survey of the Jewish religion, without being struck with its vast superiority over the most refined and exalted system adopted by the heathen nations of antiquity, even where these had borrowed most of their light from the Sun of righteousness, which shone with such resplendent glory in Judea. Its principles were so congenial with the nature and character of man, his obligations and duties, his wants and desires; its advantages so numerous and manifest; and its ritual so fascinating and engaging; that it would seem almost impossible that its subjects should ever abandon it in favor of the disgusting rites and degrading superstitions of idolatrous worship. Nevertheless, it is a lamentable fact, that the people who were favored with this revelation, and destined to be the preservers and teachers of the knowledge of the true God, at various periods of their history, abandoned their temple and oracle—their religion and their God—to mix with the surrounding nations in the impurities of their worship; and at others, engrailed upon their pure and hallowed system of doctrines sundry idolatrous rites.

2. The first palpable exhibition of a desire to relapse into idolatrous practices was made under circumstances of the most aggravating character, in the well-known matter of the golden calf. Under the administration of the judges there was an awful degeneracy, from which they were to a considerable extent recovered during the government of Samuel and David. Towards the close of Solomon's reign, that monarch set a sad and a fatal example to his subjects, which soon spread through the whole length and breadth of the land, and ultimately subjected the two nations to a total deportation and captivity, which so far answered the design of God, in curing them of their idolatrous propensities, that in every subsequent period of their history they seem to have regarded it with the utmost abhorrence.

3. In various places of the O. T., mention is made of the groves and high places dedicated to idolatrous purposes, and where the Israelites are said to have 'burnt incense and wrought wickedness, to provoke the Lord, as did the heathen.' 2 K. 17:9,13. For this reason no altar dedicated to Jehovah was allowed to be set up near them.||

4. At the time of our Savior's appearance, errors of a most pernicious kind had affected the whole body of the people, and the more learned part of the nation was divided upon points of the highest importance. They regarded the whole of religion as consisting in the rites of the Mosaic law, and in the performance of some external acts of duty. They were unanimous in excluding from eternal life all other nations; and, as a consequence, they were treated with the utmost contempt and inhumanity. The multitude were sunk in the most deplorable ignorance of God and of divine things; and had no notion of any other way of rendering themselves acceptable to the Divine Being than by sacrifices and the other external rites of the Mosaic law. Hence proceeded the profligate wickedness which prevailed to so alarming an extent during the period of our Savior's ministry. To this fact Josephus must be regarded as an unexceptionable witness. He states, that 'both publicly and privately they were universally corrupt. They vied which should surpass each other in impiety against

GUIDE TO THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

God, and injustice towards men. The great men harassed the people, and the people studied to ruin the great. 'In one word, there never was a city that suffered such calamities, nor a race of men, from the foundation of the world, that ever was more profligate and abandoned.' In another place he says, 'I cannot forbear declaring my opinion, though the declaration fills me with great emotion and regret, that if the Romans had delayed to come against these wretches, the city would either have been ingulfed by an earthquake, overwhelmed by a deluge, or destroyed by fire from heaven, as Sodom was; for that generation was far more enormously wicked than those who suffered these calamities.*'

If any part of the Jewish religion were less corrupt than the rest, it was the form of external worship, established by the law of Moses. And yet a variety of rites were introduced into the service of the temple, of which no traces are to be found in the sacred writings.† The institution of these additional ceremonies was owing to those revolutions which rendered the Jews more conversant with adjacent nations than they had formerly been; for when they saw the sacred rites of the Greeks and Romans, notwithstanding the excellency and fulness of their own ritual, they were induced to adopt them in the service of the true God.

The Samaritans, who celebrated divine worship in the temple that was built on Mount Gerizim, lay under the same evils that oppressed the Jews, with whom they lived in the bitterest enmity; and were also, like them, highly instrumental in increasing their own calamities. They suffered as much as the Jews from troubles and divisions, fomented by the intrigues of factious spirits. Their religion was also more corrupted than that of the Jews themselves, as Christ declares in his conversation with the woman of Samaria. For they mixed the errors of the Gentiles with the sacred doctrines of the Jews, and were excessively corrupted by the idolatrous customs of the pagan nations.‡

§ 5.—Of the Jewish Sects.

We have no information concerning the existence of any religious sects in the Jewish church before the Babylonian captivity; it is thought by some writers, that in the time of the Maccabees, it was divided into two parties, the Zadikim, or righteous, who observed only the written law of Moses; and the Chasidim, or Asideans, the pious, who superadded the constitutions and traditions of the elders. On this subject, however, considerable diversity of opinion prevails among the learned. Of the religious sects which existed in the times of the New Testament history, the principal were the Sadducees, the Pharisees, and the Essenes.

I. THE SADDUCEES.—This sect derived its origin from Sadoc, who flourished in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, about 263 years before Christ, and was the pupil of Antigonus Sochaeus, an eminent Jewish doctor and president of the Sanhedrin, who in his lectures inculcated the reasonableness of serving God from the innate and intrinsic excellence of the duty itself, and not from the servile principle of meretricious recompence. From this doctrine Sadoc instead of concluding from analogy that his future state would be a natural consequence of the habits formed here, inferred that there was no future state, and that rewards and punishments were confined to this life. Those who espoused his sentiments obtained the name of Sadducees. Their creed is thus copiously expressed: 'They say that there is no resurrection [Campbell, future life], neither angel nor spirit.' Hence that captious query concerning the woman who had survived seven husbands, which they addressed to our Lord for his solution, thinking to involve him in an inextricable dilemma. They disregarded all the traditions of the elders, and admitted, in our Savior's time, only the five books of Moses, as proper to be read in the synagogues; and considered that God did not interfere in human affairs. Their numbers were inconsiderable, but among them were some of the most eminent persons in the state. Josephus has thus described them: 'The Sadducees maintain that the soul perishes with the body. They pay no regard to any prescriptions, except the injunctions of Scripture. They deem it a virtue to maintain disputes with the teachers of that wisdom which others espouse. Those who have adopted their tenets are but few; but those few are persons of the first distinction. Hardly any business of the state is transacted by them; for when they are invested with any civil office, it is entirely against their inclination, and solely through necessity; for then they conform to the measures of the Pharisees, notwithstanding the common people would never bear them.'

II. THE PHARISEES.—This was the most distinguished and popular sect among the Jews, and first appeared about 140 B. C. The Pharisees affected great mortification and abstraction from the world, imposed on themselves frequent stated fasts, and made long prayers at the corners of the streets. In fact, they were most ostentatiously religious, so far as outward observances went; but were inwardly consummate hypocrites. They believed in a future state of rewards and punishments, and therefore held the Sadducees in the highest abhorrence. Their notion of the resurrection, however, was nothing more than the Pythagorean transmigration. They held the doctrine of predestination, and that all things were under the government of an irreversible fatality.¶ In fine, the scrupulous performance of a thousand trifling minutenesses made up their religion; the love and acquisition of power, and the reputation of superior sanctity, were the end and aim of all their actions: they had a form of godliness, but were strangers to its power; for they were under the dominion of the most detestable of all vices, spiritual pride and hypocrisy. Josephus has given the following account of their tenets:—'Now the Pharisees live meanly, and despise delicacies in diet; and they follow the conduct of reason, and what that prescribes to them as good for them, they do. They also pay a respect to such as are in years, nor are they so bold as to contradict them in any thing they have introduced. And when they determine that all things are done by fate, they do not take away the freedom from men of doing as they think fit, since their notion is, that it hath pleased God to make a rule, whereby what He wills is done; but so that the will of man can act virtuously or viciously. They also believe that souls have an immortal vigor in them, and that, under the earth, there will be rewards or punishments, according as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life; that the latter are to be detained in an everlasting prison, but that the former shall have power to revive and live again. On account of which doctrines they are able to persuade the body of the people; and whatsoever these do about divine worship, prayers, and sacrifices, they perform according to their direction; insomuch that the cities give great attestation to them, on account of their virtuous conduct, both in the actions of their lives and in their discourses.'|| The most considerable part of the religion of the Pharisees consisted in a scrupulous observance of the traditional law, which was regarded by them as being of higher authority than the written law. 'The words of the scribes,' said they, 'are lovely above the words of the law; for the words of the law are weighty and light, but the words of the scribes are all weighty.' Hence it was that our Savior so frequently charged them with rendering the word of God of none effect by their traditions.

III. THE ESSENES are not once mentioned in the sacred writings, through they formed a considerable community in the time of our Savior. They studiously courted retirement, devoted themselves to agriculture, and affected great simplicity and innocence of manners. They had a community of goods, and were unusually strict in the observance of the Sabbath. They believed that all things were governed by fate; that the soul was immortal; and that there was a future state of retribution.¶

IV. THE SAMARITANS are frequently mentioned in the O. T. The following account of them is collected from Lampe and Kuinoel, by Bloomfield:—The Samaritans were descended from the remnant of the Israelites not carried away into captivity, and afterwards intermixed with Gentiles from the neighboring parts of Assyria, especially the Cuthi, who had come to colonize and occupy the vacant situations of the former inhabitants. In this new colony, idolatry was introduced and permitted from the very first; yet so as to worship Jehovah in conjunction with the false gods. 2 K. 17:29. When afterwards Cyrus permitted the Jews to return from captivity and rebuild their temple, the Samaritans, who wished to form a union in religious matters with the Jews, requested that the temple might be erected as the common labor and expense of both nations. But Zerubbabel, and other Jewish rulers, rejected their request, urging that Cyrus had committed the work to them only, and had charged the governors of Samaria to keep away from the place, and only assist the Jews out of the public revenues of the province. The Samaritans, however, said they were to worship there, since the temple had been erected for the worship of the Supreme Being by all the human race.|| When the Samaritans had received this repulse from the Jews, they felt much mortified, and laid wait for revenge; they endeavored to obstruct the restoration of the temple, and the increase and prosperity of the new Jewish state, by various methods.¶ Hence originated a mutual hatred between the nations, which was afterwards kept up and increased by the revolt of Manasseh, and the erection of a temple on Mount Gerizim. For Manasseh, a brother of Jaddus the high-priest, had, contrary to the laws and customs of the nation, taken in marriage the daughter of Sanballat, the ruler of Samaria (Ne. 13:23, &c.); and when the Jews, indignant at this, had ordered that he should divorce her as an alien, or no longer approach to the altar and the sacred institutions, he fled to his father-in-law, a high-priest who alienated many from the religious worship of the Jews, and by gifts and promises drew over great numbers, and even some of the priests, to the Samaritan party. But now that the temple was erected on Mount Gerizim, still greater contentions arose between the Jews and Samaritans concerning the place of divine worship. For the Samaritans denied that the sacred rites at Jerusalem were pure and of divine ordination; but of the temple on Mount Gerizim they affirmed that it was holy, legitimate, and sanctioned by the presence of the Deity. The Samaritans, moreover, only received the books of Moses. The rest of the sacred books (since they vindicated the divine worship at Jerusalem) they rejected, as also the whole body of the traditions, keeping solely to the letter. From these causes the Jews were inflamed to the most rancorous hatred towards this rival nation; insomuch that to many of them the Samaritans were objects of greater detestation than even the Gentiles. See Luke 10: 33. It is no wonder, then, that there should have been such a constant reciprocation of injuries and calumnies as had served to keep up a perpetual exasperation between the two nations. The fault, however, was not all on the side of the Jews; for (as we learn from Bartenora ad Rosehaschana, ii. 2, cited by Schoetgen) the Samaritans inflicted this enmity by taking every opportunity of injuring, or at least offering provocations to, the Jews. The following anecdote may serve as an example: — ‘When the time of the new moon was just at hand, the Jews had a fire kindled on the highest mountains, to warn those who were afar off of the exact time of the norithuum. What did the Samaritans do? Why, in order that they might lead the Jews into an error, they themselves, during the night-time, kindled fires on the mountains. Therefore, the Jews were obliged to send out trusty and creditable persons, who should give out the time of the new moon, as observed by the Jerusalemitish Sanhedrin, or defined by other persons to whom that office was committed.’ The Samaritans, however, did not entertain so much hatred towards the Jews, as the latter did towards the former; nor did they deny towards them the offices of humanity. See Luke 9:53, 10:32. Jesus, however, disregarded, nay, disconcerned, this hatred, and as He did not hesitate to eat with tax-gatherers, so neither did He avoid intercourse with Samaritans.” In the estimation of a Jew, the very name of a Samaritan comprised madness, and malice, and drunkenness, and apostasy, and rebellion, and universal detestation. When they were instigated with rage against our blessed Lord, the first word their fury dictated was Samaritan!: ‘Thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil!’ And it is remarkable that the amiable and benevolent son of Sirach uses this expression in his writings: ‘Two nations my soul hateth’ (the Samaritans and the Philistines) (Ecclesi. 1:26). A signal and affecting proof, how far the wisest and best of men among the Jews were carried away with the national prejudices,

The Samaritans, as it appears from the account of them by Origen, were, down to his day, deniers of a resurrection, and of the soul’s immortality. The Sadducean heresy is said to have taken its rise, or its avowed and public prevalence, from Samaria; and from this very principle of rejecting the authority of the prophets.†

V. The SCRIBES, though not forming any distinct sect, demand a notice, from the perpetual reference made to them in the N. T. They were a profession of men, generally Pharisees, devoted to the ministry, and to the study of sacred literature. They were the literati among the Jews; they sat in Moses’ seat; and their knowledge of the law, and of the theology which then prevailed, obtained for them a place in the Sanhedrin, or supreme council of the nation, and qualified them to be the public and stated teachers of the people. They obtained their name from their original employment, which was transcribing the law. But in process of time, they exalted themselves into its public ministers and expositors; authoritatively determined what doctrines were contained in Scripture, and what were not; taught the common people in what sense to understand the law and the prophets; and were the oracles consulted in all difficult points of doctrine and duty.

VI. The LAWYERS mentioned in the N. T. appear to have been the same order of men as the SCRIBES, and obtained this appellation from having devoted themselves to the study of the law, and the teaching of it to the people.

VII. The ELTERS. The only difference between these and the Scribes, consisted in this, that the former were laymen, while the latter were of the clergy. They were commonly chief men in the tribes, and their judgment had great weight.

§ 6. — Of the Christian Church.

1. Unlike the Jewish church — which embraced the whole nation, without reference to the vitality of the faith possessed by the individuals of which it was composed — the Christian church comprises only those who form part of the spiritual seed of Abraham. It predicates nothing of men as men; it knows of no rule but that of truth, of principle, of conscience. The apostolic churches were composed either of true Christians, or of those who, to human appearance, were such. They were saluted, by inspired men,

§ It may be presumed, that the Israelites, when they came out of Egypt, entertained the views respecting a future state which prevailed in that country. If it was so, I think we have substantial reason to conclude, that a divine revelation of the truth of an existence beyond the grave, would, in the actual state of their minds, have done them no good; but, on the contrary, would have been so likely to be perverted by them, and mingled with the grossest errors, that it was for their advantage to have that revelation withheld, till such time as, having become established in a true theology, educated in the doctrine of one God, and trained to some just conception of his attributes and agency, they would be prepared to receive the other doctrine with some just estimation of its worth, and preserve it in some degree of purity.

Respecting the belief of the ancient Egyptians in the state of the human soul after death, it would not be reasonable to expect to obtain full satisfaction from such sources of information as remain to us. The supposition, however, that any reasonable views of its condition were entertained by a people whose theology was so monstrous, would be in violation of all probability; and, in fact, the best authorities instruct us, that, whatever might be the esoteric doctrine on the subject (which probably amounted to no more than the resumption of the spirit into its divine source, and accordingly its loss of individual existence), and of the capacity of punishment and reward, the popular doctrine indissolubly connected the continued life of the soul with a metempsychosis — with a circuit of transfer from the body of one animal to that of another.

¶ Of what avail would it have been to confirm the doctrine of an immortality to a people who identified it with the belief, that the undying essence, the human spirit, was but one of the forms of hostile nature? Of what avail to communicate it to them in any shape, when the existing habits of their minds would have forcibly brought it back to this base and pernicious semblance? As far as we may reasonably entertain such a question, does it not seem reasonable to say, that it was more fit for God, and more consistent with what we know, in other respects, of his method of educating this people, to reserve this great doctrine from their consideration as part of his disclosures to them, till other generations should arise, which, educated far beyond the reach of the brutalizing follies of Egypt, and made capable of some better conceptions of the spiritual world and man’s place in it, by what their law taught them of the undivided sovereignty and excellent perfections of its Head, should not put out again in deep darkness the light meant to enlighten the world? || See Mosheim’s Commentaries on the Affairs of the Christians before the time of Constantine, vol. i. 263-267. Properly (says Dr. Campbell) there are, in the New Testament, but two original senses of the word ekklēsia, which can be called different, though related. One is, when it denotes a number of people actually assembled, or accustomed to assemble together, and is then properly rendered by the English terms congregation, convention, assembly, and even sometimes crowd, as in Ac. 19:32, 40. The other sense is to denote a society united together by some common tie, though not convened, perhaps not convenient, in one place. And in this reception, as well as in the former, it sometimes occurs in classical writers, as signifying a state or commonwealth, and nearly corresponding to the Lat. ecclesia. When the word is limited, or appropriated, as it generally is in the New Testament, by its regimen, as, tou Thēou, tē Kōrēn, tēn Christōn, or by the scope of the place, it is always to be explained in one or other of the two senses following, corresponding to the two general senses above mentioned. It denotes either a single congregation of Christians, in correspondence to the first, or the whole Christian community, in correspondence to the second. We can hardly ever be at a loss to know from the context which of the two is implied. That it is in the former reception, is sometimes evident from the words in construction, as, tēs ekklēsias tēs in Kēyherais, and tē ekklēsia tou Thēou tēn in Karinthō, and the like. In the latter sense it ought always to be understood when we find nothing in the expression, or in the scope of the passage, to determine us to limit it; for instance, in the following, Epi toutē tē petrōn ekklēsias kaī hēmerā tē ekklēsia. Ho huius prōsterei tōis sōzomenōis kaī hēmerā tē ekklēsia. In this last reception of the word for the whole body of Christ’s disciples, whenever dispersed, it came afterwards to be distinguished by the epithet katholikē. They said kaī ekklēsia kaī katholike, the catholic or universal church.

¶ In any intermediate sense, between a single congregation and the whole community of Christians, not one instance can be brought of the application of the word in sacred writ. We speak now, indeed (and this has been the manner for ages), of the Gallican church, the Greek church, the church of England, the church of Scotland, as of societies indepen-

See Ac. 8:1, 5:14, 6:7, 11:22, 1 Co. 1:2, 16:19, Ro. 16:5, Col. 4:16, Re. 1:1, 11, 20, 21:8, &c.

3. In the primitive churches there was a perfect equality amongst the members, no one having greater power or authority than another, but the whole constituting one body, in which the general authority was lodged. Speaking of the constitution of the church at Jerusalem, Mosheim observes, 'The power of enacting laws, of appointing teachers and ministers, and of determining controversies, was lodged in the people at large; nor did the apostles, although invested with divine authority, either resolve on or sanction anything whatever, without the knowledge and concurrence of the general body of Christians of which the church was composed. See Ac. ch. 15, &c.'

4. The Christian churches were formed and maintained upon a purely voluntary principle. 'The weapons of their warfare were not carnal, but mighty through God, to the pulling down of strong holds.' The whole apparatus of Christian propagation was spiritual; the church at large was a grand missionary institution for the diffusion of truth and holiness. The idea of levying an involuntary contribution for the maintenance of the ministry, or for the purpose of erecting Christian temples, or for the aggrandizement of a particular sect, or for the support of a large system of ecclesiastical rule, in which the power of the civil magistrate should be thrown into the scale of the church, never entered into the heads of inspired apostles, save when under the divine afflatus of that Spirit by whom they were enabled to foretell the corruptions of succeeding ages.

5. The members of the church of Christ are rescued, in spiritual matters, from all thralldom to the doctrines and commandments of men. As, on the one hand, they are not to allow themselves to be called masters; so, on the other, they are not to call any man master upon earth. In every thing to be believed, in every thing to be practised, the N. T. is the all-perfect and the exclusive rule. From that inspired record the churches of Christ are not at liberty, by any rule of the Master's suggestion, to make their own fallible and imperfect digest, and then to require the belief, ex animo, of those who unite themselves to their fellowship. This is to substitute the rule of human doctrine for the laws of the blessed and only Potentate. To demand subscription to mere human articles, though they may rest upon a scriptural basis, is to tarnish the spirituality of the Redeemer's kingdom, and to create subversion to man, rather than to God.

SECTION II.

SPIRITUAL DUTIES.

Divine Worship — Prayer — Thanksgiving — Singing.

1. To express the general idea of worship, the Hebrew and Greek writers of Scripture have employed the words sebh and proskuneō; the primary import of which is devout prostration. The obligation of this duty, which arises out of the relation in which man stands to his Maker, is enjoined in various parts of the Scriptures. See Ps. 96:8, 9, 95:6, Ju. 4:23, Ac. 17:24, 25, Phil. 3:3.

2. Amongst the acts of divine worship must be primarily noticed that of prayer, or supplicatory addresses to the Most High. The Hebrew tphilah, interposition, mediation, intercessory supplication, is from phll, which is said to denote the idea of judging, and, secondarily, that of petitioning. Ps. 109:7, 'his plea in court.' Proseuchē is of the same frequent occurrence in the N. T., and signifies a prayer to God, whether petitioning good (Mat. 21:22), or deprecating evil. Ac.

dent and complete in themselves. Such a phraseology was never adopted in the days of the apostles. They did not say the church of Asia, or the church of Macedonia, or the church of Achaea, but the churches of God in Asia, the churches in Macedonia, the churches in Achaea. The plural number is invariably used when more congregations than one are spoken of, unless the subject be of the whole commonwealth of Christ. Nor is this the manner of the penmen of sacred writ only. It is the constant usage of the term in the writings of ecclesiastical authors for the first two centuries.² Lectures on Eccles. Hist. lect. vi.

How much more pleasing it would be, says Dr. Schmucker, to hear

12:5. The obligation of prayer is frequently enjoined and enforced. Phil. 4:6, Lu. 18:1, 1 Pe. 4:7, Ps. 50:15, 62:8, Jb. 5:8, Ja. 1:5-7, 1 Ti. 2:1, 2, 11:3, Is. 55:6, Ps. 115:13, Mat. 7:7, 21:22, Ps. 65:2, &c.

3. Grateful confession, or thanksgiving, is denoted in the Hebrew Scriptures by the term hadh, and from this parent stock have sprung the several branches — ndo, I celebrate; ado and aeido, I sing; and ode, an ode. The well-known word Hallelujah, literally, the English sound of the Heb. hlyyh, 'Praise ye the Lord,' and to the same source must be traced the acclamation of the ancient Greeks, Elele Ie, with which they opened and closed their hymns in honor of Apollo. Injunctions to this delightful and grateful duty may be found in Ps. 67:3, Is. 42:10, 12, Ps. 107:8, 22, Ep. 5:20, He. 13:15, Ps. 50:14, 23, 95:1, 2.

4. The exercise of singing has formed a part of divine worship from the earliest ages. Shysh is a song, ancient as the period of Israel's escape out of Egypt (Ex. 15); but used also in after-times as well as zmr, which is said to be a psalm or hymn, from its regular composition, both in regard to words and music. That 'spiritual songs' of various descriptions were extant, and even popular, in the primitive churches, appears from several passages in the N. T. (Ep. 5:19, Ja. 5:13, 1 Co. 1:15, et al.); and that 'hymns were sung to Christ, as to a God,' is explicitly stated by Pliny, in his 97th Epistle. In the Hebrew church the practice of singing, in offering thanksgivings to God, was common. See Ps. 92:1, 2, 69:30, 31, 33:2, 3, 95:1, 2, 2 Ch. 5:13, &c. [Notes, Ja. 15:13, Ep. 5:19, &c.]

CEREMONIAL OBSERVANCES.

The Jewish Ritual — Objects and Uses of the Ceremonial Law — Christian Rites — Jewish Festivals: the Sabbath; the Passover; the Feast of Pentecost; the Feast of Tabernacles; the Feast of the New Moon; Feast of Trumpets; Fast of Expiation; the Sabbath Year; the Jubilee.

§ 1. — The Jewish Ritual.

Some writers on Jewish antiquities have thought that the ceremonial laws were merely arbitrary, and that the reasons of them were only to be sought for in the will of God, which He has not chosen to reveal; making them thereby to differ essentially from the Christian institutions, which are said to be 'rational milk,' and 'a rational service.' 1 Pe. 2:2, Ro. 12:1. But this is surely derogatory to the character of God, and hurtful to that obedience which He required. Let us attend, therefore, to the indications given of its purpose, and see what the intention of Jehovah was in giving it to the Jews. There are three ends which it evidently served. It taught the leading doctrines of religion in a sensible and impressive manner; it served as a fence against idolatry; and prepared the minds of its subjects for a brighter dispensation.³

1. It taught the Jews the leading doctrines of religion in a sensible and impressive manner. Thus, it taught the unity of God, by having only one presence; one most holy place, as the seat of that presence; one altar, at which all the priests were to minister, and all the sacrifices to be offered (Le. 17:1-9); and only one tabernacle and temple dedicated to that one Jehovah, the Creator of all things, of what power or dignity soever they were conceived to be. And, as it taught the unity of God, so it also taught the doctrine of a general providence. The throne in the tabernacle and temple was only the figure of his throne in the heavens; and the daily sacrifices, the burnt-offerings appointed for the Sabbaths every week, the new moons every month, and for the feast of trumpets, on the first day of the civil year, were all intended to impress the Israelites with a deep sense of the superintending care of God, at all times and in all places. Nor did the ceremonial law indicate a general providence only; it also taught the particular interest which Jehovah took in the works of his hands; for the whole of it encouraged the Hebrew to ask every blessing from Jehovah as his God, and to fear the evils denounced on disobedience as inflicted by Him. Indeed, every sacrifice and offering were constant evidences of this truth, and encouragements to this hope; for they taught that, while God superintended the general affairs of the universe, he took a particular interest in the family of Abraham. The Hebrew worship also taught the necessity of holiness in every worshipper; for, if we consider the directions for consecrating the tabernacle and temple, for hallowing the sanctuary, for purifying and consecrating the priests and Levites, that they might be hallowed to minister before Jehovah, we shall easily observe that they all taught holiness to the Lord. Indeed, nothing unholy or unclean was allowed to approach the Presence, till cleansed by the washings and sacrifices it directed; and such purity in lesser matters inferred a holiness of a higher nature, and taught the importance of being holy as God is holy, as well as being holy because He is so. Let it only be remarked further, on this part of the subject, that the ceremonial law was sanctioned by rewards and punishments; temporal, indeed, in their nature, but well adapted to enforce their observance.

2. A second use of the ceremonial law was to preserve the Israelites from idolatry; and this it did in various ways.

(1) By removing the principles that supported it; viz. ignorance of the true character of God, and ascription of divine honors to inferior intelligences. From the just notions it gave the Israelites of God and his government, it taught them that all other gods besides Him were false, vain idols, the works of men's hands. It showed that those beings whom the heathen worshipped, of whatever nature or character, were but the creatures of the one Jehovah, and subject to Him. It taught that God was the fountain of all their blessings, and that He alone gave rains and fruitful seasons; and, by so doing, it prevented them from falling into the error of worshipping inferior intelligences, as the guardians and benefactors of mankind. It allowed of no such thing as inferior divine worship, but represented God as a jealous God, who would not give his glory to another, nor his praise to graven images. In these ways, then, it removed the principles which served to support the practice of idolatry.

(2) By giving them a ritual of their own, every way fitted to their circumstances. At the time it was promulgated, they were in such circumstances (the nations around them having all sensible objects of worship), that, if it had not then pleased God to appoint them a ritual, and by that mean to make them a separate nation and people, it seems morally impossible to have kept them from idolatry; and then the knowledge and worship of the true God must have been lost in the world. The same reasons which made a ritual convenient, and in their circumstances even necessary, made a full ritual as convenient and necessary; such as should reach to every part of worship, as it was intended to be a hedge against idolatry every way. The numberless variety of ceremonies has often been remarked; and to a superficial observer, all, or at least the most of them, Protestants speak of the Baptist branch, the Presbyterian branch, the Methodist branch, the Episcopal branch of the church, than to hear of the Baptist, the Methodist, the Episcopal church, and many other churches, as though Christ's body were divided! See Bib. Repos. 1838. Ed.

appear to no purpose. But let him reflect on the consequences of one less minute. They would have supplied its defects by amendments of their own, [and it is historical fact, that even to their numerous rites commanded they were constantly adding others from their own invention,] and, notwithstanding their own law, they would have borrowed from their neighbors what they imagined had not been sufficiently provided for by their own lawgiver. Thus the law would have failed in one of its designs — to prevent their falling into idolatry. A people so fond of ceremonies as the Jews were, would have been uneasy and impatient without them; and when they saw that their neighbors had rites for every occasion, they would either have adopted them for their own use, or have invented others of their own imagination, of equal danger, or of worse consequence. Another circumstance respecting the Hebrew ritual was, that it was uniformly held out as preferable to every other. From their long abode in Egypt, it is easy to conceive the Jews well acquainted with, and even fond of, Egyptian ceremonies. Their reputation, antiquity, and confirmation by miracles, esteemed true, would all add some weight to this assertion. It became, therefore, any rule, if it was to guard them against its influence, to come recommended by a higher authority than the considerations of antiquity, the use of the wisest people, or even the oracles of demons. Accordingly, we find it recommended as the law of God Himself, and given to them as his peculiar people. Hence the common preface to each of its laws — 'The Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them;' and hence a proper answer to the objection of its being unbecoming the wisdom of God to ratify, in so solemn a manner, a bare system of rites and ceremonies. Nor should we overlook even the burdensome nature of the Jewish ceremonial, as a means of preserving them from idolatry; for while it was burdensome by the number of its precepts, extending from the greatest things to the most minute; by their rigor in demanding obedience, and punishing disobedience; by their comparative inutility, since they could neither obtain the pardon of moral guilt, nor impart virtue, nor procure admittance into heaven by their expense; by the constant attention they required, to prevent contracting ceremonial guilt, and the expense of removing it; and by the length of time which was requisite before they could be distinctly understood, and readily acted upon; yet this very burdensomeness, which attended the ceremonial institute, served as a means to keep them from idolatry. For they could never forget that it was imposed by the Almighty, as a punishment for their making and worshipping the golden calf; and that, to the conscientious observer, it left little time or inclination for searching after and adopting the rites of the heathen.* Nor should it be forgotten, that it was strictly enjoined them to add nothing to it, and to take nothing from it. In the Hebrew government, the sole authority of making laws was in Jehovah, as their king. Hence the true reason of the temporal rewards and punishments which were attached to the ceremonial ritual. They were suited to the rude state of the Jewish mind after a long period of bondage: they came from God, and not from the heathen deities; they were suited to his character as their king under the theocracy. Nations can only be punished as nations in the present life; and it would have been raising the value of ceremonial obedience too high, to have sanctioned it with eternal rewards, or eternal punishments.

(3) The ritual law promoted the same end, by appointing certain public marks to distinguish them from idolaters. The whole ritual was a distinctive mark; but there were some parts of it more so than others. Thus circumcision, while it was a seal of the covenant of grace, was also a sign of the covenant of peculiarity. For as the worshippers of idols had often some distinguishing mark on their bodies, to show their attachment to the idols they worshipped, so did God cause this to be imprinted on the bodies of the Israelites, to teach them, that as the lusts of the flesh prevailed among the heathen,† and around their temples, so they should mortify these lusts, and carry on their bodies the distinctive mark of their own God. The Sabbath, also, was another mark to distinguish the Israelites from idolaters. For as the heathens believed in the eternity of the world, and disregarded the observance of the Sabbath, so God gave this institution to the Israelites, as commemorative of his having created the world, and consequently of its not being eternal. Nor should it be forgotten, that the great strictness that was commanded on the Sabbath, evidently had two ends in view; the solemnization of the mind for sacred purposes, and striking against the leading violations of it among idolaters. The three public festivals were also public marks which distinguished the Jews from idolaters. For the passover, among other ends, showed God's judgment against the gods and idols of Egypt; Pentecost tended to root out idolatry, as being commemorative of the giving of the law; and the feast of tabernacles contributed to the same end, by leading them to acknowledge Jehovah as the God of seasons [while opening the soul to the sweet influences of external nature, so abused to idolatry]. Nor should we overlook that public and particular mark — the appointment of meats and animals into clean and unclean, as articles of food or destined for sacrifice. Various reasons have been assigned for this; but the true reasons, according to Spencer, seem to have been, that they might be a peculiar people, as it is expressed in Le. 20:21–26; that the observance of that law might be a lesson of sanctity, that they were dedicated to the Lord (Le. 11:43–45, 20:1–26); that it might mystically signify that the Jews were clean, and the Gentiles unclean (Ac. 10:11–16); and especially that it might keep them from following the practices of the heathen. For the Israelites were acquainted with the superstitious opinions and practices of the Egyptians in this respect, many of whom abstained from all flesh whatever, from a notion of its unlawfulness; and had they been left in uncertainty, they might have adopted the superstitious opinions relative to the holiness or impurity of animals which prevailed in Egypt. God therefore appointed a distinction of meats under certain limitations; and those animals were prohibited, among others, which were used among the heathen in purifications, sacrifices, magical rites, at festivals, and in the ratification of covenants.‡

(4) Another defence which the ceremonial law afforded against idolatry, was the confining of most of the sacred things to certain places, persons, and times. Before the giving of the law they worshipped where they pleased; but after the giving of the law that liberty was withdrawn. The tabernacle, and afterwards the temple, were enjoined as the only places for offerings and worship. Le. 17:3–5. De. 12:5–13. This regard to place was certainly a means of preventing idolatry; for, since they might not sacrifice but at Jerusalem, they were hindered, even when at a distance from that place, from frequenting the idols and altars of the heathen. But if binding their sacred rites to the tabernacle or temple was a defence against idolatry, so also was the confining the priesthood to particular persons. In no nation was there a priesthood like that of the Jews. Others were called individually by the people, or recommended by accidental circumstances; but theirs was from birth, and confined to the tribe of Levi. They were chosen in place of the first-born of Israel, and had their office confirmed to them by the blossoming of Aaron's rod (Nu. 17:8–11); and by the infliction of leprosy on Uzziah the king, when he attempted to encroach upon it. 2 Ch. 26:18–20. Before the law, the heads of families were the priests; but this choice of the tribe of Levi excluded all others, and was productive to Israel of many advantages. For it prevented sacrifices anywhere else than at the temple, since they were accountable; it created a host to fight for the glory of God, and the honor of their order, against idolatry; it acted on a regard for principle, and the esprit du corps; whilst the instructions they communicated, and the example they exhibited, would naturally tend to check their countrymen in their desire for idolatry. The confining of many of their sacred things to certain times, was also a means to promote the same end. Thus, all their feasts depending on the appearance of the moon, tended to show that she was only a creature; since, whilst idolaters paid her homage, they were worshiping the only true God. The beginning of the civil year, likewise, was much employed in heathen rites; and to counteract this, God appointed the feast of trumpets on the 1st day; the 10th was the day of annual expiation; and from the 15th to the 23d was the feast of tabernacles. The Jews had, therefore, more feasts in this month to the true God, than the heathen had to their false deities. Perhaps even their morning and evening sacrifices were, among other reasons, appointed in opposition to those heathen sacrifices in the night, to the dead and the dii inferni, which were not always the most chaste. One thing is certain, that by this limitation of sacred rites to particular persons, places, and times, the Jews were greatly prevented from imitating the practices of their heathen neighbors. They had a splendor in their worship which struck the senses; an order which pleased the mind; and a purity becoming the Being they were called upon to address; which was very different from the obscene rites of other nations.§

(5) Another defence which the ceremonial law afforded the Jews against idolatry was, the prohibition of too familiar an intercourse with heathen nations. It was impossible for them to avoid the common intercourse of life, when business required; but that was different from making heathens their bosom friends, or connecting themselves with them by marriage. Accordingly such intimate connections were expressly forbidden, lest they should be led after their idols; and a national antipathy was created against all strangers, which was noticed and condemned by heathen writers, who were ignorant of the cause. And Paul says, that they were "contrary to all men." 1 Th. 2:15.

(6) Lastly, their ritual preserved the Jews from idolatry, by the prohibition of every idolatrous rite. Thus, in Le. 17:7, they were forbidden to offer sacrifices to devils, the hirci-footed deities of Egypt, because it was most debasing to human nature, and dishonoring to God. They were forbidden to make their children pass through the fire to Moloch (Le. 18:21), because some burnt them alive in honor of the sun; and others shook them over, or threw them through the flames, by way of illustration, to insure the favor of the pretended divinity, and devote them to his service. But besides this visible countenance which they were forbidden to give to idolatry, we find God also providing against the approaches to it, by prohibiting every kind of divination and magic. Both were known among the heathens, and prohibited to the Jews. Le. 19:26, &c. They were also prohibited from observing "times." Indeed, in the law they are joined together (see the last-cited passage), as being near akin; for in beginning journeys, contracting marriages, engaging in war, &c., the heathen nations, from the earliest times, appear to have used divination by birds, serpents, clouds, the viscera of animals, and slaves, to learn whether they would be successful or not. Such a conduct engendered superstition, prevented often the transaction of public and private business, and was a virtual want of acknowledgment of and dependence on God, as the Sovereign of the universe. The Jews, therefore, were forbidden to imitate the nations in these respects. Deut. 13:11. They were further forbidden, in conjunction with the above-mentioned practices, to eat with the blood, or rather, ‘at the blood.’ For the Zabians, or worshippers of the host of heaven, among the Chaldeans and Egyptians, when they sacrificed an animal to their demons, poured out the blood, and ate a part of the flesh at the place where the blood was poured out, and sometimes a part of the blood also, believing that they hereby held communion with the demon.* To this Jehovah alludes, when He says, ‘Ye eat with (at) the blood, and lift up your eyes towards your idols; and shed (or pour out) blood (into a vessel or ditch for their food); and shall ye possess this land?’ And to this does the apostle refer, when he says, ‘I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils (or demons). Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of devils; ye cannot be partakers of the Lord’s table, and of the table of devils.’ 1 Cor. 10:20, 21. There were times, indeed, when they were commanded to pour out the blood of the animals they slew; but it was either to be like water, i.e. as a common thing, when they killed animals for food (Deut. 12:15, 16, 21); or to be covered with dust, when they killed venison, in opposition to the heathen sportsmen, who left it exposed, as food for the god of the chase. Lc. 17:13. Various other prohibitions are to be found in the law; such as boiling a kid in its mother’s milk — rounding the corners of the head and beard — cutting the flesh for the dead — confounding or interchanging the dresses of the sexes — sowing the fields with divers seeds — ploughing with an ox and an ass together — snaking garments of linen and woolen interwoven — all of which have been quoted with ridicule by the thoughtless, and variously explained by commentators.† But the true reason doubtless was, that these practices were common among idolaters; and the object of the law was, to make an obvious difference between them and the worshippers of the true God. The words of Tacitus, therefore, are strictly true, if instead of Moses, we substitute God. ‘Moses, that he might attach the nation of the Jews forever to himself, instituted new rites, and contrary to the rest of men. For all things are profane to them, which are accounted sacred by us; and all things are permitted to them, which are prohibited to us.’‡

3. Hitherto we have been considering the two ends of the ceremonial law, viz. that it was intended to teach the Jews the leading doctrines of religion, in a sensible and impressive manner; and to be a defence against idolatry; let us now attend to the third end for which it was given; viz. to prepare their minds for a brighter dispensation. Paul calls the Jewish ritual the ‘shadow of good things to come’ (Heb. 10:1); ‘figures,’ or antitypes, ‘of the true’ (9:21); ‘an example and shadow of heavenly things’ (8:5); ‘a parable of the time to come’ (9:23); the whole law ‘a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ’ (Gal. 3:21); and its institutes ‘the elements of the world’ (1:3), or rudiments to teach men the first principles of piety and of the gospel, in a manner adapted to the childhood of the world [and the spiritual state of humanity at that time]. Nor are there wanting sufficient reasons why God delivered gospel truths in this mysterious manner. It suited the state of the Jews, to whom, as to an early and rude people, types, symbols, fables, and parables were the common modes of instruction. It was consonant to the education of Moses, who was taught in all the hieroglyphics of Egypt. It was fitted to the intermediate nature of the Jewish dispensation; giving it more light than the patriarchal, but less than the Christian. It was placing the old covenant and its mediator below the new covenant and its mediator. And as the Jewish law was given to the whole Jewish nation, learned and unlearned, it was proper that there should be truths for the carnal, and truths for the spiritual minded. 2 Esdr. 14:26, 44–46. Hence has the ceremonial law often been termed the Jewish gospel, because it exhibited to those who were exercised to godliness the leading doctrines of the covenant of grace; faith in the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world — acceptance with God through the blood of atonement — holiness of heart, and holiness of life, through the gracious aids of the Holy Spirit — and a future state of rewards and punishments. On all these points the Epistle to the Hebrews forms a beautiful commentary. A religion, then, that had such advantages as these to boast of, ought not to be too hastily decried. It was perfect, in that it was suited to the situation and circumstances of the people to whom it was given; it was only imperfect when compared with the more complete economy of the gospel.

4. One cannot contemplate the ceremonial law without also reflecting on its gradual abolition; for it was positively binding on every Jew till the death of Christ, in whom its spiritual meaning was fulfilled. Its observance became a matter of indifference between the death of Christ and the destruction of Jerusalem, and hence those prudential maxims and regulations which are to be found in the Acts of the Apostles, and the several Epistles, with respect to those converts from Judaism to Christianity, who had still an attachment to it. But it became criminal after the destruction of Jerusalem, because it could not then be legally observed, the temple and the altar having been destroyed.

§ 2. — Christian Rites.

The Christian system is one of pure and perfect worship. It is a spiritual service, and is freed, therefore, from those ceremonial observances which constituted the body of the Jewish economy. See Jn. 4:20–24, &c. There are but two rites — one initiatory, and the other commemorative — introduced into the church of Christ; these are baptism (Mat. 28:19, 20; Ac. 2:38–41; 1 Cor. 1:16), and the Lord’s supper (1 Cor. 11:20). Each of these sacred obligations has long been the theme of controversy, in respect to its subjects, mode, and object; but it does not comport with our purpose to discuss the question here.

§ 3. — Jewish Festivals.

The Jewish festivals, which were of divine appointment, were either weekly, as the Sabbath; monthly, as the new moons; or annual, as the passover, or pentecost, the feast of ingathering or of tabernacles, and the feast of trumpets; to which may be added the annual fast, or day of expiation. Besides these, there were the sabbatical year and the jubilee, which returned after a certain number of years. Independently of the advantages derivable from these institutions in a civil and political point of view, their influence on the religious character of the nation must have been of a most powerful kind. As often as they returned, the people were reminded of the numerous and stupendous miracles which had been wrought by the Creator in their behalf, and of the consequent obligations to virtue and holiness which devolved upon them. Viewed in this light, they also became incontestable vouchers for the occurrences to which we allude, and consequent evidences of the divine origin of the Mosaic economy. We must offer a few remarks upon each of these institutions.

I. THE SABBATH.

1. Every 7th day was appointed a holy festival, which was to be held sacred as a day of worship, in commemoration of the creation of the world by JEHOVAH, and also to perpetuate the remembrance of the deliverance of the Israelites from the land of their bondage. Critics are not agreed as to the time when this festival was originally instituted; some being of opinion that it was in the beginning of the world, and that the passage in Ge. 2:12 is to be understood as determining this; while others conceive that it was not given until the time of Moses, and that this passage is prospective; the Sabbath being only mentioned there as it was connected with the subject of which the inspired historian was writing. To discuss the subject here would be greatly to exceed the limits we have proposed. The reader who wishes to investigate the matter may consult a work by the Rev. George Holden, in which he will find a fair view of the controversy, with almost all that can be said on either side of the question. It is but right, however, to add, that the ‘Critica Biblica’ contains an extended review of this work, in which the writer controverts many of Mr. Holden’s positions.

2. The Jews, reckoning their day from evening to evening, were commanded to begin their Sabbaths in the same manner: ‘From even until even shall ye celebrate your Sabbath.’ Lc. 23:32. This direction is rather obscure, as the Jews reckoned two evenings, the former beginning about the 9th hour of the natural day, and the other about the 11th hour. We shall see that they were required to sacrifice the paschal lamb ‘between the evenings;’ but in one place the time is specified, ‘at even, at the going down of the sun’ (Deut. 16:16), whence it appears that the whole time comprehended between the two evenings was also called simply ‘the evening.’¶ The law requiring the computation of the Sabbath ‘from even to even,’ implies, therefore, that the commencement of the Sabbath was to be reckoned from the termination of the whole time called ‘the evening,’ and ‘between the evenings;’ consequently the sacred rest began after sunset on Friday evening, and ended at the same time on Saturday evening.

3. The eve of the Sabbath commenced with the first of the two Jewish evenings, about 3 o’clock in the afternoon, which was the time of the evening sacrifice, and lasted till sunset. This is also called the preparation, because the people then ceased from their ordinary labor, cooked their viands, and prepared whatever was necessary for the due observance of the sabbatical rest. Some, indeed, are of opinion that the preparation included the whole of Friday, and the subject is confessedly involved in some degree of uncertainty. It is probable that the preparation, properly so called, commenced at 3 o’clock on the afternoon of Friday; but the whole day was sometimes so denominated.

4. Among the services and duties required on this day, none are so conspicuous as the strictness of the rest which it enjoined.|| The command is, ‘In it thou shalt do no manner of work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor the stranger that is within thy gates.’ Ex. 20:10. This strict and entire rest is enjoined with a frequency which shows the importance attached to it (Ex. 23:12, 31:21; Deut. 5:14); and the severest penalties are denounced against its violation. Ex. 31:15, 35:2. Nor is the severity of this prohibition mitigated by any subsequent law in the O. T.; it is rather sanctioned and enforced. Thus we find in the sacred writings prohibitions against Bathing and washing. Ne. 10:18–21, 13:15–22. Kindling fires. Ex. 35:3.—This, however, must be understood with some limitation; for fire was absolutely necessary for the sabbatic sacrifices, and it would have been a breach of the divine law of mercy not to kindle a fire for the sick and infirm. The meaning of the precept, therefore, is, that no fire was to be kindled on the Sabbath-day for cooking meat, which is elsewhere forbidden, or for any other servile purpose. Cooking rituals. Ex. 16:23.—This and the former law were, as Michaelis observes, especially calculated for the climate of Palestine. As the Sabbath began at sunset (and in Palestine the sun in the shortest days never sets before 5 o'clock, nor in the longest before 7), the Jews there might have their principal meal prepared in the afternoon of Friday; for between the summer and winter months there would only be a difference of about 2 hours. By lighting good fires on the Friday afternoon, they might also be very comfortable till the Sabbath evening. But in our northern climate these would be very grievous prohibitions.* Menial work.—Besides the general law against all manner of work, there is a further direction given in Jer. 17:21, 22; and reference may be given to Nu. 15:32-36. The employment of beasts. Ex. 20:10, 23:12. De. 5:13, II.—These, no more than man, were to be deprived of rest, or to be tortured with unremitting toil. Travelling. Ex. 16:29.—This statute, which was given in the wilderness, was only intended to restrain the Jews from going out on the Sabbath to gather in manna, or to do any servile work. But the Hebrew doctors have built many fanciful notions on the prohibition, such as, that it was unlawful for a man to go from any town or village where he resided, farther than 1000 cubits, or about an English mile, and that in whatever posture a person might be on the Sabbath morning, he or she was to continue in it during the remainder of the day. Hence we read of a Sabbath-day's journey in Ac. 1:12; and our Lord doubtless referred to this superstitious notion in Mat. 21:20. These conceits, however, are foreign from the meaning of the law, which merely forbids such travelling as is inconsistent with the rest and duties of the festival. It has been maintained, that war is classed among works prohibited on the Sabbath; but Michaelis has successfully controverted this notion.†

* Dr. James Townley has an interesting account of the Zabians, in his Essays on Ecclesiastical History, pp. 1–22.

5. Notwithstanding the strictness of the sabbatical law, it would be unreasonable to suppose it designed to exclude works of necessity and charity. It cannot be believed that a Being of infinite benignity would ever consider his laws violated by actions proceeding from motives of pure benevolence, and which at the same time administered to the good of fellow-creatures. Our Savior performed many works of this kind on the Sabbath-day.

6. The Sabbath was designed to be a day of refreshing repose, and of joy and gladness (Is. 30:29, &c.); and hence we find, in the time of our Savior, notwithstanding the gloom and sadness with which the Scribes and Pharisees invested it, that the Jews were wont to make entertainments upon the 7th day (Lu. 14:1); and both Josephus and Philo consider feasting and rejoicing as essential to its celebration. The modern Jews have converted it into a day of festive entertainments, and often of unseemly revelry and merriment.

7. But the Sabbath was also to be a day of devotion: it was to be sanctified (Ex. 20:8. De. 5:12); i. e., to be separated from common to sacred purposes. Hence there were on the Sabbath, in addition to the daily offerings, some sacrifices peculiar to itself. A dono de barnt-offering was commanded, Nu. 28:10; see 2 Th. 2:4, 8:13, 31:3. Ne. 19:33. Ez. 45:17. On every Sabbath-day, there were four lambs sacrificed two in the morning and two in the evening; and the meat-offerings and drink-offerings which accompanied the sacrifices were to be doubled. It is hard to determine whether the Levitical law enjoined the practice of public worship on this day. The only thing that appears to sanction the opinion is, that it is in several places said to be 'a holy convocation,' which denotes an assembly or convention. The phrase, however, is too doubtful in its signification to warrant us in affirming this to have been the case. If it were permitted to infer the ancient practice from that which obtained in the Jewish church in the time of our Savior, the matter might be easily decided. It was then usual to assemble in stated places on the Sabbath-day, for sacred and religious purposes. Ac. 16:13, 18:4. It was the day set apart for teaching and admonishing the people (Mk. 1:21, 6:2. Lu. 1:16, &c. Ac. 11:13, &c.); and we are told that the law was read and expounded. Ac. 13:27, 15:21. But these practices at the Christian era leave it undecided whether they were always observed, much less whether they were enjoined by the law.‡

8. The Sabbath has been considered by some writers as a type of the future state of the saints in heaven; and its perpetual obligation has been thence deduced. The only passage, however, that at all seems to countenance this opinion, is He. 4:1-11, and the whole text is by far too difficult of interpretation to warrant a confident conclusion.¶

II. THE PASSOVER.

1. This was the first instituted and most solemn of all the Jewish festivals. It was founded on the eve of the Israelites' departure from Egypt, for the purpose of commemorating their signal deliverance from that 'furnace of affliction,' and their exemption from those calamities with which their oppressors were universally visited. Ex. 11:1-4, 7. It was therefore enjoined, that on the eve of this promised deliverance, a spotless victim of the first year, 'from the sheep or from the goats,' should be sacrificed by each Israelitish family, who were to eat its flesh with unleavened bread and bitter herbs. If the family were too small to eat a whole lamb, then two families were to unite together. The blood of the paschal lamb was ordered to be sprinkled on the lintel and on the door-posts of the houses of Israel, by dipping in it a bunch of hyssop (Ex. 12:7, 13), as a token, to the destroying angel, that the houses bearing this mark, and all in them, were under the protection of God.

2. The manner of eating the passover was most significant. By eating it with unleavened bread and bitter herbs, the Israelites were reminded of the rigor of that servitude which rendered their lives bitter; whence this bread is called 'the bread of affliction.' De. 16:3. They were also commanded to eat it standing, in the posture of travellers who were in haste, and had no time to lose, that faith in the promise of their speedy deliverance might be kept alive and confirmed; and as it was designed that they should commence their march immediately after supper, they were to have their loins girded, and their staves in their hands, that there might be no delay when the signal was given.

3. The appellation 'passover' was by a metonymy given to the lamb that was sacrificed on the occasion (Ezr. 6:20. Mat. 26:17); whence the expressions 'to eat the passover' (Mk. 14:12-14), and 'to sacrifice the passover' (1 Co. 5:7). Hence, also, Christ is called 'our passover,' or troe paschal Lamb. The whole continuance of the feast is, in a lax sense, styled the 'passover' (Jn. 13:30. Lu. 22:1); yet strictly speaking, the passover was kept only on the 14th day of the month Nisan, which was the 1st of the ecclesiastical or sacred year, and the ensuing 7 days were the feast of unleavened bread; so called, because, during its continuance, the people were to eat unleavened bread, and allow no other to remain in their dwellings. Sacrifices peculiar to the festival were to be offered on each of the 7 days; but the first and the last were to be sanctified above all the rest, as Sabbath, by abstaining from all servile labor, and holding a holy convocation. Ex. 12:16. Le. 23:7, 8. The time appointed for sacrificing the paschal lamb was on the evening of the 14th day of the month; or, as it is in the Hebrew, 'between the two evenings,' i. e. just at sunset (De. 16:6), or, as some critics understand it, about 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

4. The manner of celebrating the passover, after the establishment of the Hebrews in the land of promise, differed in some measure from the original observance of the festival. The qualities of the paschal victim remained the same; but it was to be separated from the flock 4 days before the time for its being killed. The first passover-victim was slain in the private dwellings of the Jews; but when they left the land of their captivity, it was to be sacrificed 'in the place which Jehovah should choose to place his name there.' De. 16:2. Every particular person, or a delegate from every paschal society, slew his own victim. The lamb being killed, one of the priests received its blood into a vessel, which was handed from one priest to another, until it reached him who stood beside the altar, by whom it was sprinkled at its foot. The lamb was then flayed, and the fat taken out and consumed; after which the owner took it to his home, where it was roasted whole, and eaten by the paschal society, with unleavened bread and bitter herbs. It was enjoined upon the Hebrews not to break the bones of the victim (Ex. 12:46), as a further indication of the haste in which they first partook of the feast, not leaving time to break the bones and suck out the marrow. It also had a typical reference which we shall consider presently. Nor was any part of the lamb to remain till the morning: if it were not all eaten, it was to be consumed by fire. v. 10. The same law was extended to all eucharistical sacrifices (Le. 22:30), no part of which was to be left or set by, lest it should be corrupted, or converted to any profane or common use; an injunction which was designed, no doubt, to maintain the honor of sacrifices, and teach the Jews to treat with reverence whatever was consecrated more especially to the service of God.|| After the Israelites were established in their own land, that part of the institution which required them to eat the passover standing, and equipped as travellers, was dispensed with: they partook of the sacrificial meal like men at rest and ease.

5. The guests placed themselves, in a reclining posture, on couches around the table, their left arms leaning thereon, and their feet extending outward and backwards. This shows the meaning of the evangelist's expression, of the beloved disciple leaning on the bosom of Jesus (Jn. 13:23), and on his breast. v. 25, 21:20. It also explains how the woman who was a sinner, and had brought an alabaster-box of ointment, could stand at Christ's feet leaning him, while she anointed them with the ointment, and wiped them with the hair of her head. Lu. 7:36. Being thus seated, a cup of wine was mingled with water, over which the master of the family, or 'the rehearser of the office of the passover,' offered thanks, at the conclusion of which the whole company drank of the cup. The ceremony of washing hands (by the servant's pouring water over them, as usual now in the East; comp. 2 K. 2:11) was then introduced, after which the table was furnished with the paschal lamb cake of unleavened bread, bitter herbs, a part of the 11th day's offerings, and a dish of thin sause, compounded of bruised dates, figs, raisins, steeped in vinegar till it was of the consistence of clay, to remind them of the clay in which their fathers wrought while in Egypt. The table being thus furnished, the president took a small piece of salad, having blessed God for having created fruit of the ground, he ate it as did also the other guests; after which the president explained the import of the paschal lamb, of bitter herbs, and of unleavened bread; repeating Ps. 113:114; he concluded the following prayer: 'Blessed be Thou, O Lord our God, king everlasting, who hast redeemed us, and redeemed our fathers out of Egypt, and brought us to this night, to eat unleavened bread and bitter herbs.' At the conclusion of this, all the company drank off the 2d cup of wine and water, and the hands were again washed, accompanied with an ejaculatory prayer. After the basins were removed, the president took the two cakes of unleavened bread, broke one of them into two pieces, laid the broken cake upon that which was entire, and gave thanks to the Lord, who brought bread out of the earth.

The two cakes were then divided among the company, who ate them with bitter herbs, and the thick sauce; after which the president pronounced the following prayer: 'Blessed be Thou, O Lord our God, king everlasting, who hast sanctified us by the commandments, and hast commanded us concerning the eating of the unleavened bread.' It will be observed, that our Lord, at his appointment of the supper, reversed the order of blessing and breaking the bread—He first giving thanks, and then breaking the bread. It is to that part of the feast just noticed, that our Lord's words relative to Judas refer: 'He that dippeth his hand with Me in the dish, the same shall betray Me.' He also pointed out the traitor, by giving him the sop, or piece of unleavened bread and bitter herbs, which had been dipped in the thick sauce before mentioned. The meat of the peace-offerings was next eaten, with an appropriate prayer; and then the flesh of the paschal lamb, which was the concluding dish; after which they washed a third time. A 3d cup of wine was then filled, which was emphatically called 'the cup of blessing,' because over it the president returned thanks. Paul uses the same phrase for denoting the sacramental cup in the Lord's supper; and it is generally supposed that it was from this 3d cup, and a part of the unleavened bread remaining from the passover, that our Lord took the elements for the Christian communion. Lastly, a 4th cup of wine was set on the table, called 'the cup of the Hallel,' because over it the president completed the Hallel which he had begun over the 2d cup. Over that he had repeated Ps. 113 and 114, and he now proceeded to repeat from Ps. 115 to 118; after which he concluded with 'the blessing of the song.'

6. These particulars will materially illustrate the evangelical histories, concerning the celebration of the last passover by our Savior, and the institution of the Lord's supper. The paschal society on this occasion consisted of the Redeemer and his 12 disciples. As the Jewish passover was made the occasion of discoursing on the mercy of God in the deliverance of the people from their bitter servitude, so our Savior makes use of it for expatiating on that mercy, as more conspicuously manifested in the gift of his Son, and the redemption of the world through his death. As the president distributed among the guests the consecrated bread, so our Savior brake the bread, after having given thanks, and gave it to his disciples, saying, 'Take, eat; this is my body, which is given for you. This do in remembrance of Me.' Hence Paul declares that, in celebrating this feast, we 'do show forth the Lord's death until He come again.' In conformity with the custom of concluding the feast by chanting or singing 'the blessing of the song,' our Savior and his disciples concluded by singing a hymn, or song of thanksgiving.^t

7. Before concluding the description of the paschal solemnity, we must remark that it was customary, on this occasion, for the inhabitants of Jerusalem to give the free use of their rooms and furniture to strangers who came up to keep the feast. For this reason Jerusalem is called 'the common city;' it was common to all the tribes at the time of the great festivals. This will explain the otherwise inexplicable conduct of our Savior, in sending his disciples to a man in the city, saying, 'The Master saith, My time is at hand; I will keep the passover at thy house with my disciples.' It was also the custom, in the latter period of the Jewish history, to liberate some criminal on this occasion, which explains Mat. 27:15, &c.

8. Such was the manner of celebrating the passover of the 1st month, on the 14th day of Abib or Nisan, which every Israelite was required to observe, except on particular occasions, enumerated in Nu. 9:1-13, on pain of death. It should not be forgotten, however, that there was also a passover of the 2d month, observed on the 14th day of Jair or Zif, by those individuals who were precluded from attending the former. The regulations for both were alike (Nu. 9:14-15), except that in the 2d month they might have leaven in their houses, for the use of their families, and that the singing of the Hallel was dispensed with during the time they were eating the paschal supper.^u

9. That the passover had a typical reference to Christ, appears from the apostle calling Him 'our passover,' in 1 Co. 5:7; but concerning the points of resemblance between the type and the antitype, there is, as might be expected, some difference of opinion amongst the commentators. The reader who may wish to see the question discussed, is referred to Jennings's Jewish Antiquities, or to Witsius's OEconomia Ecclesiastica.

10. The ceremonies connected with this festival closed on the 16th of the month, when the sheaf of the first-fruits of the barley-harvest was offered, as a grateful acknowledgment of the goodness of God in bestowing the former and the latter rains, and producing the fruits of the earth. The sacrifice and thanksgiving to be offered on this occasion are prescribed in Le. 23:9-11.

III. THE FEAST OF PENTECOST.

1. This was the second of the 3 grand Hebrew festivals, and derives its name from the circumstance of being kept 50 days after the first day of unleavened bread. See Le. 22:15,16. De. 16:9-12. From the same circumstance it is called 'the feast of weeks,' being celebrated 7 weeks, or a week of weeks, after the celebration of the former feast. It was also called 'the feast of harvest,' and 'the day of first-fruits' because the Jews then offered thanks to God for the bounties of the harvest, in bread baked of the new corn. Ex. 23:16. Le. 23: Nu. 28: Its object was to commemorate the giving of the law on Sinai.

2. The day on which the feast of pentecost was celebrated was separated from a common to a sacred use. All the males of Judea were ordered to attend at Jerusalem; two wheaten cakes were presented as the first-fruits of the wheat-harvest, for the whole nation; and every individual laid his first-fruits on the altar, as a token of gratitude for the bounties of Providence. Another thing was the burnt-offering for the day, consisting of seven lambs of the first year, without blemish, one young bullock, and two rams, and their accompanying meat and drink-offerings. After this, a kid of the goats was offered for a sin-offering, and two lambs of the first year for a peace-offering. The Hallel, or the whole of the Psalms, from 113 to 118: inclusive, was then sung, which terminated the duties of the day.^v

3. [A part of the] Christian church also celebrates the feast of pentecost 50 days, or 7 weeks, after the passover, or the resurrection of our Savior. There is little doubt but that the pentecost after our Savior's death fell on a Sunday.^w The tradition among the fathers is express, that on this day the church has always celebrated this festival. There seems to be a remarkable correspondence between the giving of the law on Sinai, and the descent of the Holy Ghost on the day of pentecost. The former was accompanied with thunders and lightnings, and the latter with a mighty rushing wind and the appearance of tongues of fire,

IV. THE FEAST OF TABERNACLES.

1. This was the last of the 3 great festivals, and, like the passover, lasted for a week, during which time the people left their ordinary dwellings to abide in booths, or arbors, made of 'the fruits of goodly trees, branches of palm-trees, boughs of thick trees, and willows of the brook.' Le. 23:40. Hence it is called by the evangelist, skene-pagia, or the 'feast of tents,' Jn. 7:2. The booths were erected in the temple, in the public places, in courts, and on the flat roofs of the houses. The time appointed for the celebration of this feast was the 15th of the month Tisri; its design being (1) to remind the Hebrews of their fathers dwelling in tents in the wilderness (Le. 23:40-43), and (2) to be a yearly thanksgiving after the ingathering of the harvest. Ex. 34:22, &c.

2. The mode of celebrating this festival was as follows:—On the first day of the feast, which was accounted a Sabbath, the people abstained from all servile work, that they might have time to construct their booths. These being erected, they attended the public worship of the several days, and offered in their order the appropriate sacrifices, which were remarkable in the decrease which took place on each successive day. Besides the daily morning and evening sacrifices, which were indispensable, they offered on the first day 13 bullocks, 2 rams, 14 lambs, and a kid of the goats, with their meat and drink-offerings. Nu. 29:12-16. These offerings the 6 successive days were regularly decreased one bullock on each day. But on the 8th day, which was accounted a Sabbath, there were only 1 bullock, 1 ram, 7 lambs, and a kid of the goats, with their meat and drink-offerings.^x Nu. 29:17-38.

3. In the time of our Savior, some variations had been effected in the manner of observing this feast, through the traditions of the Pharisees. The first thing they did on the 1st day of the feast was to procure some palm and myrtle branches, and then go to a place a little below Jerusalem, on the brook of Kedron, for two willow branches each; one for the lulab, or bunch of palms and myrtle, bound up by means of a twig, a cord, a silver or golden thread, according to the taste of the individual; the other to place at the side of the altar. Their lulabs they constantly carried in their right hands during the 1st day of the feast, and in their left a branch of the citron, with its fruit. The first place they resorted to was the temple, to attend the morning sacrifice. When the parts of the sacrifice were laid on the altar, the singular ceremony of pouring out the water commenced, the manner of doing which was as follows:—One of the priests, with a golden flagon, of 3 logs (or 12 egg-shells full), went to the pool of Siloam, where, filling it with water, he returned to the court of the priests, by the gate on the south side of the court of Israel, thence called the water-gate. The trumpets sounded on his entering the court, and he ascended to the top of the altar, where were placed two basins, the one with wine, for the ordinary drink-offering, and the other for the water which he had procured. Pouring the water into the empty basin, he mixed the wine and the water together, for the libation. When he raised the basin for the purpose of pouring forth its contents, the people cried, 'Hold up thy hand!' this was for the purpose of seeing whether he did it in a proper manner; for a Sadducee, in contempt of their traditions, instead of pouring it over the altar, had once poured it upon his own feet. At the time of this libation they sang the Hallel (Ps. 113-118: inclusive); and when they came to the beginning of Ps. 113, 'O give thanks unto the Lord,' the people expressed the ardor of their feelings by shaking their branches.

4. Immediately after this part of the service was concluded, the people joined in the peculiar service of the day; while the burnt-

VIII. THE SABBATICAL YEAR.

1. The statute relative to this extraordinary festival is as follows:—‘6 years thou shalt sow thy land, and shalt gather in the fruits thereof; but the 7th year thou shalt let it rest and lie still, that the poor of thy people may eat; and what they leave, the beasts of the field shall eat. In like manner thou shall deal with thy vineyard, and with thy olive-yard.’ Ex. 23:10,11. During this period, therefore, the land was to lie fallow, and ‘enjoy its Sabbath.’ Michaelis will not allow that this institution was designed to teach the doctrine of a special providence towards the inhabitants of the land; but that it was so, seems clear from Le. 25:20,21—‘And if ye shall say, What shall we eat at the 7th year? Behold, we shall not sow nor gather in our increase; then will I command my blessing on you upon the 6th year, and it shall bring forth fruit for 3 years.’ As long, therefore, as the sabbatic year should be kept by the inhabitants of Judea, God would be performing a perpetual miracle, which none of them could mistake. The 7th year was the year of release from personal slavery (Ex. 21:2), and of the remission of debts. De. 15:1,2. It was also during this year that the law was read to the people at the feast of tabernacles. De. 31:10-13.

2. It is observable that there is no express mention of the observance of this institution in the sacred writings; and it is probable, therefore, that the faithlessness of the people led them to distrust the promise of God, and to sow and gather during the 7th, as well as other years. Moses, indeed, seems to have anticipated this; for when, in Le. ch. 25, he threatens the Israelites, among other judgments for disobedience, with the desolation of their land, he says (v. 34), ‘Then shall the land hold the Sabbaths which it had not held before.’ And the breach of this law is specified as one of the national sins which brought on the captivity, that the land might enjoy her Sabbaths. 2 Ch. 36:21. After the return to Judea, they are known to have observed this institution; and Alexander the Great granted an exemption from taxes in the sabbatical years. 1 Mac. 6:19,53.

IX. THE JUBILEE.

1. This was the grand sabbatical year, celebrated every 49th and 50th year; and was ushered in with trumpets, throughout all the land of Israel, on the 10th day of the month Tzri, or the day of annual expiation. Le. 25:9. All debts were now to be cancelled, and all slaves and captives to be set at liberty; for the Hebrews were to ‘proclaim liberty throughout all the land, and to all the inhabitants thereof.’ Le. 25:10. Such estates as had been mortgaged, or otherwise pledged, now reverted back to their original proprietors, except houses in walled towns, to which this privilege did not extend. Le. 5:30.

2. The reason and design of the law of jubilee, says Dr. Jennings’s, was partly political and partly typical. It was political, to prevent the too great oppression of the poor, as well as their being liable to perpetual slavery. By this means the rich were prevented from accumulating lands upon lands, and a kind of equality was preserved through all their families. Never was there any people whose liberty and property were so effectually secured as the Israelites. God not only engaged to protect those invaluable blessings by his Providence, that they should not be despoiled of them by others, but provided in a particular manner, by this law, that they should not be thrown away through their own folly; since the property which every man or family had in their dividend in the land of Canaan, could not be sold or in any way alienated for more than half a century. By this means, also, was the distinction of tribes preserved, in respect both to their families and possessions; for this law rendered it necessary for them to keep genealogies of their families, that they might be able, when there was occasion, in the jubilee year, to prove their right to the inheritance of their ancestors. By this means it was known to a certainty of what tribe and family the Messiah sprung. Upon this Dr. Allix observes, that God did not suffer them to continue in captivity out of their own land for the space of two jubilees, lest by means their genealogies should be lost or confounded. A further civil use of the jubilee might be, for the reader computation of time. For, as the Greeks computed by olympiads, the Romans by lustra, and we by centuries, the Jews probably reckoned by jubilees; and it might be one design of this institution to mark out these large portions of time for the reader computation of successive years of ages.

3. The typical use and design of the jubilee is pointed out by the prophet Isaiah, when he says, in reference to the Messiah, ‘The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound, to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord.’ Is. 61:1,2. Here, ‘the acceptable year of the Lord,’ when ‘liberty was proclaimed to the captives,’ and ‘the opening of the prison to them that were bound,’ evidently refers to the jubilee; but, in the prophetic sense, it means the gospel state and dispensation, which proclaims spiritual liberty from the bondage of sin and Satan, and the liberty of returning to our own possession, to which, having incurred a forfeiture by sin, we had lost all right and claim.†

4. What was remarked concerning the non-observance of the sabbatical year by the Jewish people, may also be extended to the year of jubilee. Nowhere in history is its celebration either mentioned or intimated. No where do the sacred writers reckon by years of jubilee, which would have been a much more convenient chronology than to date by the reign of their kings. From 2 Ch. 35:21, Michaelis infers that the celebration of the sabbatical year was intermitted for 70 times in succession; and the jubilee, of consequence, for 10 times. He remarks, ‘After it is there said, that for 70 years the land had, during the Babylonian captivity, kept Sabbath, i.e. lain fallow, it is related, even until she should comfort herself for her disturbed Sabbath, and he as it were satisfied; or, as he proposes to render it, “until she had numbered her unkept Sabbaths.”’ Here there is a manifest reference to Le. 26:34,35—‘Then shall the land enjoy her Sabbaths, as long as it lieth desolate, and ye be in your enemy’s land; even then shall the land rest, and enjoy her Sabbaths: as long as it lieth desolate it shall rest; because it did not rest in your Sabbaths, when ye dwelt upon it.’‡

X. Besides the festivals appointed by the Mosaic law, we find intimations of the observance of other festivals and fasts by the Jewish people, in various parts of Scripture. Thus Jeremiah speaks of the fast of the 4th month, on account of the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans (52:6,7); and of the 10th month, when the Babylonian army began the siege of Jerusalem. v. 4. We also read of the fast of the 5th month, on account of the burning of the city and temple by the Chaldeans (2 K. 25:9), and of the 7th month, in memory of the murder of Gedaliah. v. 23. These fasts are all mentioned together in Zeh. 8:19, to which we may, perhaps, add the feast Xylophoria, or of the wood-offering, when the people brought great store of wood to the temple for the use of the altar. This is said to be grounded on Ne. 10:4. See also 13:30,31. In addition to these fasts and festivals, the modern Jewish calendar is crowded with a multitude of others; but as there is no mention of them in Scripture, it is no part of our business to notice them. There are two festivals, however, which we have not enumerated in those above mentioned, that demand a specific notice, viz. the Feast of the Dedication, and the Feast of Purim.

1. THE FEAST OF THE DEDICATION, which was appointed by Judas Maccabeus, as a new dedication of the temple and altar, after they had been polluted by Antiochus Epiphanes, on the 25th of the 9th month (Chislev), B. C. 170,|| lasted for 8 days. From the general illumination which took place during the continuance of this festival, it obtained the name of the Feast of Lights. The greatest religious countenance which was given to it while the temple stood, was the singing the Hallel there every day, as long as the solemnity lasted.¶ It is but once mentioned in Scripture, viz. in Jn. 10:22, where Jesus is said to have been present at it.

2. THE FEAST OF PURIM, or of Lots, which commemorated the deliverance of the Jews from the plot laid against them by Haman, under the reign of Artaxerxes, was celebrated on the 13th, 14th, and 15th days of the 12th month Adar. The 13th was held as a fast, being the day on which they were to have been destroyed; and the two following days as a feast, for their glorious and providential deliverance. We know not whether any particular sacrifices were offered at the temple on this occasion; but it is probable that the book of Esther was read through by some of the priests, in the court of the women. Calmet has collected from Bashanah, and Leo of Modena, a number of particulars relative to the manner of observing this Jewish feast, the chief of which follow: On the eve of the feast they give alms liberally to the poor, that these also may enjoy the feast of lots; and on the feast-day they send a share of what they have at table to those who need. On the evening of the 13th, they assemble in the synagogue, and light the lamps; and as soon as the stars begin to appear, they begin to read the book of Esther, which they go through. There are 5 places in the text in which the reader raises his voice with all his might, and makes such a dreadful howling as to frighten the women and children. When he comes to the place which mentions the 10 sons of Haman, he repeats them rapidly, without taking breath, to show that these 10 persons were destroyed in moment. Whenever the name of Haman is pronounced, the children furiously strike the benches with mallets, or stones, and make lamentable cries. It is said that they used to bring into the synagogue a great stone with HAMAN written on it, and that all the while the book of Esther was reading, they struck it with other stones, till they had beaten it to pieces. After the reading is concluded, they return home, where they make a meal rather of milk-meats than of flesh. Early on the following morning, they again repair to the synagogue, where, after reading the account of the war of Amalek (Ex. 17), they again read the book of Esther, with a repetition of the ceremonies we have noticed. After quitting the synagogue, they make good cheer at home, and pass the rest of the day in sports and dissolute mirth; the men dressing themselves in women’s clothes, and the women in men’s, contrary to the express prohibition of De. 22:5. Their doctors have decided that they may drink wine till they cannot distinguish between ‘cursed be Haman’ and ‘blessed be Mordecai,’ because it was by compelling Ahasuerus to drink, that Mordecai obtained the deliverance of the Jews. They compel all—men, women, children, and servants—to be present at the synagogue; because all shared in the deliverance, as all were exposed to the danger.

SECTION IV.

SACRED PLACES.

The Land of Israel — The Tabernacle — The Temples of Solomon, Zerubbabel, and Herod — Synagogues.

Before we notice the sacred buildings of the Jewish people, it may be necessary to remark, that the whole land was by them considered as sacred, and was thence termed the Holy Land. They divided the whole world into two general parts, the land of Israel and the land out of Israel, the latter being considered as profane and unclean. The whole land of Israel was holy, not excepting Samaria; nor even Idumea, after its inhabitants had embraced the Jewish religion. As for Syria, they considered it between the two; i. e. neither quite holy, nor altogether profane. Besides the holiness ascribed in Scripture to the land of Israel in general, as it was the inheritance of God's people, and the place appointed for his worship, the Jews were pleased to attribute different degrees of holiness to its several parts, according to their different situations. Those parts, for instance, which lay beyond Jordan, were reputed less holy than those that were on this side; because the sanctity of a place was in proportion to its contiguity to the temple.* Walled towns were also considered as being more clean and holy than other places, because lepers were excluded from them, and the dead were not buried there. Even the very dust of Israel was esteemed to be pure, while that of other nations was considered as polluted and profane. This will perhaps explain the direction given by our Savior to his apostles, that when they departed out of any house or city that would not receive them, they should shake off the dust of their feet, as a testimony against the inhabitants, and as an intimation that they were now on a level with heathens and idolaters.†

§ 1. — The Tabernacle.

1. We have an account of three public tabernacles among the Jews, prior to the building of Solomon's temple. The first, which Moses erected for himself, is called 'the tabernacle of the congregation.' In this he gave audience, heard causes, and inquired of God. Perhaps the public offices of religious worship were also performed in it for some time; and hence its designation. The second tabernacle was that which Moses built for God, by his express command, partly to be the place of his residence as king of Israel (Ex. 40:31,35), and partly to be the medium of that solemn worship which the people were to render to Him, v. 26-29. The third public tabernacle was that which David erected in his own city, for the reception of the ark, when he received it from the house of Obed-edom. 2 S. 6:17. 1 Ch. 16:1. But it is of the second of these tabernacles that we have to treat, which was called THE Tabernacle, by way of distinction.‡

2. Moses, having been instructed by God to rear this structure according to the pattern shown to him in the mount, called the people together, and informed them of his purpose, with a view to afford them an opportunity of contributing towards so noble and honorable a work (Ex. 25:2, 35:5); and so liberally did the people bring their offerings, that he was obliged to restrain them in so doing (v. 21-36:7). The building we are now about to describe was constructed with extraordinary magnificence, and at a prodigious expense, so that it might be in some measure suitable to the dignity of the Great King, for whose palace it was designed; and to the value of those spiritual and eternal blessings, of which it was also designed as a type or emblem.

3. The value of the gold and silver only, used for the work, and of which we have an account in Ex. 38:24-25, amounted, according to Bp. Cumberland's reduction of the Jewish talent and shekel to English coin, to upwards of £182,563. If we add to this the vast quantity of brass or copper that was also used; the shittim-wood, of which the boards of the tabernacle, as well as the pillars which surrounded the court, and sacred utensils, were made; as also the rich embroidered curtains and canopies that covered the tabernacle, divided the parts of it, and surrounded the court; and if we further add the jewels that were set in the high-priest's ephod and breastplate, which are to be considered as part of the furniture of the tabernacle; the value of the whole materials, exclusive of workmanship, must have amounted to an immense sum. This was raised partly by voluntary contributions and presents, and partly by a poll-tax of half a shekel a head for every male Israelite above twenty years old (ch. 30:11-16), which amounted to 100 talents, and 1773 shekels, that is, £35,339 7s. 6d. sterling (ch. 36:23).

4. The learned Spencer§ imagined that Moses borrowed his design of the tabernacle from Egypt. But this notion, as Jennings has shown, is directly at variance with matter of fact, the structure of Moses differing most essentially from those used in the heathen worship, in situation and form, as well as in typical design and use, as pointed out by the apostle in 1 Cor. 9:9.¶

The following remarks and cut, from the Pictorial Bible, go to show some of these differences.

'The differences are more considerable than the analogies. The temple is in a grove — a thing forbidden in Scripture: every individual is bare-headed; the Jews never worshipped uncovered. The trumpet-blowers sit; but it is a received maxim of the Jewish doctors, that no one should sit in the temple-courts, except the reigning King, of David's house. The congregation ranges on each side the altar, and between it and the sanctuary; the women mingle; with the Hebrews, none were admitted to the court of the sanctuary but the priests and Levites, and the women had a separate court from the men. Put one of the three officiates most conspicuous in the worship of Isis, also a female. The Hebrews too, measured the space between the sanctuary and altar most holy; and in worship even the priests removed below the altar. But here it is exactly opposite. Probably a turn to id'olatry, the Hebrews worshipped the queen of heaven in the way here seen.'

Worship of Isis; from Antiquities of Herculanum.

5. The building itself was of an oblong rectangular form, 20 cubits long, 10 broad, and 10 in height (Ex. 26:12-29, 36:22-31); i. e. according to Bp. Cumberland, 55 feet long, 13 broad, and 13 high. The two sides and the western end were formed of boards of shittim-wood, overlaid with thin plates of gold, and fixed in solid sockets, or bases of silver. Above, they were secured by bars of the same wood, overlaid with gold, passing through rings of gold, which were fixed to the boards. On the east end, which was the entrance, there were no boards, but only 5 pillars of shittim-wood, whose chapters and fillets were overlaid with gold, having hooks of gold, standing on five sockets of brass. The tabernacle, thus erected, was covered with 4 different kinds of curtains. The 1st and inner curtain was composed of fine linen, magnificently embroidered with figures of cherubim, in shades of blue, purple, and scarlet: this formed the beautiful ceiling. The next covering was made of goats' hair; the 3d of rams' skins, dyed red; and the 4th and outward covering was made of badgers' skins, as our translators have it, but which is not quite certain; the original denotes only skins of some description, dyed of a particular color.¶ We have already said, that the east end of the tabernacle had no boards, but only 5 pillars of shittim-wood; it was therefore enclosed with a richly-embroidered curtain, suspended from these pillars. Ex. 27:16.

6. Such was the external appearance of the sacred tent, which was divided into two apartments, by means of four pillars of shittim-wood, overlaid with gold, like the pillars before described, 2½ cubits distant from each other; only they stood on sockets of silver, instead of sockets of brass (Ex. 26:32, 36:36); and on these pillars was hung a veil, formed of the same materials as the one placed at the east end. Ex. 26:31-33, 36:35. We are not informed in what proportions the interior of the tabernacle was thus divided;

but it is generally thought to have been divided in the same proportion as the temple afterwards built according to its model; i.e. $\frac{1}{3}$ of the whole length being allotted to the first room, or the holy place, and $\frac{1}{2}$ to the 2d, or most holy place.[¶] Thus the former would be 20 cubits long, 10 wide, and 10 high; and the latter 10 cubits every way. It is observable that neither the holy nor the most holy place had any window. Hence the need of the candlestick in the one, for the service that was performed therein: the darkness of the other would create reverence, and might, perhaps, have suggested the similar contrivance of the Adyta in the heathen temples.

7. The tabernacle, thus described, stood in an open space, of an oblong form, 100 cubits in length and 50 in breadth, situated due east and west (Ex. 27:18); and surrounded by pillars of brass, filleted with silver, at the distance of 5 cubits from each other. The sockets of these pillars were of brass; and they were fastened to the earth by pins of the same metal. Ex. 33:10, 17, 20. Their height is not stated, but it was probably 5 cubits, that being the length of the curtains that were suspended on them (Ex. 38:18), and which formed an enclosure round the court, of fine-twined white linen yarn (Ex. 27:9, 38:8, 16); except that at the entrance on the east end, which was of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine white twined linen, with cords to draw it either up or aside, when the priests entered the court. Ex. 39:40.

8. Within this area stood the altar of burnt-offerings,[†] and the laver and its foot. The former was placed in a line between the door of the court and the door of the tabernacle, but nearer the former (Ex. 40:6, 29); the latter stood between the altar of burnt-offering and the door of the tabernacle. Ex. 38:3.

9. The furniture of the tabernacle.

(1) In the holy place were 3 objects worthy of notice, viz. the altar of incense, the table for the show-bread, and the candlestick for the lights. 1. The altar of incense was made of shittim-wood, and completely covered with plates of gold. It was 1 cubit square, and 2 cubits in height; the horns at its corners being also of the same materials. The crown or ornamental cornice was of gold; and under this were placed 4 rings of the same precious metal, for the purpose of receiving the staves of shittim-wood and gold, by which it was to be carried from place to place. Ex. 30:1-5, 37:25-28. The position of this altar was in the middle of the sanctuary, before the veil (Ex. 30:6-10, 40:26, 27), and on it the incense was burned morning and evening. Ex. 30:31-33. On the north side of the altar of incense, i. e. on the right hand of the priest as he entered, stood, 2. The table for the show-bread, Ex. 26:35, 40:22, 23. This was made of the same materials as the altar, and was 2 cubits in length, 1 in breadth, and $\frac{1}{2}$ in height, having a crown or ornamental cornice round about, and a border and a second crown above this. Ex. 25:23-25, 37:10-12. The staves and rings belonging to it were of the same description as those belonging to the altar; and its dishes, spoons, covers, and bowls, were all of pure gold. Ex. 25:26-30, 37:13-17. 3. The golden candlestick stood on the south side of the holy place, and was of beaten gold, consisting of 7 branches for lights. Ex. 25:33-30. These,

drawn so far towards the veil, as to allow the ark to stand at the wall of the apartment (Ex. 25:10-15, 37:1-5). Into the ark were put, by divine appointment, the testimony, or tables of the covenant (Ex. 25:16-21, De. 10:1-5); a golden pot containing an omer of the manna with which the Israelites were fed in the wilderness, to be kept as a testimony of that wonderful event (Ex. 16:32-34, He. 9:1); and Aaron's rod that budded. Nu. 17:6-11, He. 9:3, 4. In the side of the ark was a place where Moses enjoined that a copy of the law should be kept. De. 31:21-26. The mercy-seat was a covering to the ark, made of pure gold (Ex. 25:17-21, 26:31, 37:6); and upon this were placed, 3. The cherubim, 2 figures of singular appearance, each having 4 faces, viz. the face of a lion, the face of a man, the face of a calf, and the face of an eagle—all attached to a human body with 4 wings, and 4 hands under the wings, and standing on feet resembling those of a calf or an ox. Ex. 15:14. They were of pure beaten gold; two of their wings covered their bodies, and the other two were extended over the mercy-seat, while their faces looked inward and downward upon it. It was from between these that Jehovah promised to meet the Israelites as their Lawgiver and covenant God, and to deliver the commandments which He might think proper to give them. Ex. 25:18-22, 37:7-9, § Nothing, perhaps, has afforded a greater scope for the ingenuity of commentators than these cherubim emblems. Without advertising to the opinions of ancient theologists, we find sufficiently discordant ones among those of the most eminent modern writers. Hutchinson, Bate, and Parkhurst, maintain that they were representations of the blessed Trinity, with the human nature taken into the divine essence, for the work of human redemption; making the work of creation and providence evidently subservient to that end.|| Dr. Doddridge, Mr. Wesley, and Bp. Mant, consider them as hieroglyphics of the angelic nature. Dr. Priestley imagines them to have been representatives of all nature. Mr. Scott supposes them to have been emblems of the true ministers of the gospel. Dr. A. Clarke regards them as the representatives of the ALL MIGHTY, and those creatures by whom he produced the great effects of his power, to whatever order of beings they may belong; while Pyle, Hall, and Faber, consider them as emblematical representations of the body of true believers, of both dispensations, legal and evangelical.¶ It is observable that one leading idea runs through most of the interpretations, which refers them to the plan of redemption, either in its authors, its agents, its subjects, or its general history.

10. This remarkable and costly structure was erected in the wilderness of Sinai, on the 1st day of the 1st month of the 2d year, after the Israelites left Egypt (Ex. 40:17); and when erected, was anointed, together with its furniture, with holy oil (v. 9-11), and sanctified by blood, Ex. 24:6, 8; He. 9:21. The altar of burnt-offering, especially, was sanctified by sacrifices during 7 days (Ex. 29:37), while rich donations were given by the princes of the tribes, for the service of the sanctuary. Nu. ch. 7.

11. We must not omit to notice, that the tabernacle was so constructed as to be taken to pieces and put together again, as occasion required. This was indispensable; it being designed to accompany the Israelites during their travels in the wilderness, till their arrival in the promised land. As often as they removed, therefore, the tabernacle was taken down, and borne in regular order by the Levites. Nu. ch. 4. Whenever they encamped, the tabernacle was pitched in the midst, the tribes taking their stations around in a quadrangular form, under their respective standards, at the distance of two thousand cubits; while Moses and Aaron, with the priests and Levites, occupied a place between the camp and the sacred structure.*

12. Before we close this section, we may advert to the spiritual reflections which the tabernacle and its furniture might excite in the minds of pious Israelites; for the apostle instructs us, that they were 'a shadow of good things to come' (He. 9:9, 10:1). The curtains, then, around the tent, might teach them a holy reverence for divine things; the altar of burnt-offering pointed to the perfection of the Messiah's sacrifice; and the laver taught them the necessity of regeneration, and of daily application to that fountain which was opened in the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness. The tabernacle in general, where Jehovah condescended to reside, was a type of the body of Christ, in which, as in a tent, He tabernacled while on earth. The silver sockets, forming the foundation, might remind them of those important doctrines on which all evangelical religion is founded; and, by being made of the half-shekels exacted of every male in Israel, they were calculated to show the personal interest that each should take in religion and its worship. The outer covering of goats' hair might point out the unattractive appearance of religion to the men of the world; the beautiful under-covering might indicate its glory as seen by the saints; the covering of rams' skins, dyed red, might remind them of the efficacy of the Messiah's blood, as a hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest; while the covering of badgers' skins, which the Jewish traditions say was blue, might point out to them that true tabernacle which God had pitched, and not man. Nor was spiritual instruction to be less derived from entering the sacred tent. For, in the holy place, the table of show-bread was a constant acknowledgment of God, as the giver of every temporal blessing; the candlestick, with the lamps, pointed to the seven spirits of God, whence all spiritual illumination proceeded; and the altar of incense taught them the efficacy of prayer, when offered up from a pure heart, and perfumed with the incense of the Messiah's merits. Nor were the instructions which might be derived from the most holy place less important; for the veil, that separated the two apartments, not only indicated the partition wall which divided the Jews from the rest of the world, and was taken away by the death of Christ, but also that veil which still conceals from mortal view the place of God's peculiar residence; the tables of the law were an instance of God's condescension to his chosen people; the rod that budded was emblematical of the unrivalled honor and unfading glory of a greater than Aaron; and the pot of manna, deposited in the ark, typified the hidden manna, of which all the saints are partakers, while travelling through the wilderness of this world. Nor could they overlook the mercy-seat, as pointing out the divine goodness to offending sinners; † and the cherubim of glory, which, by looking down to that propitiatory, represented the delight of the Trinity in this their work of mercy and love.‡

§ 2.—The Temple.

1. Having surveyed the tabernacle, we proceed to the temple at Jerusalem, which was formed upon the model of the former edifice, but built upon a much more extended and magnificent scale. It has been thought that there were 3 different temples; the 1st being built by David and Solomon; the 2d, by Zerubbabel and Joshua the high-priest; and the 3d, by Herod, a little before the birth of Christ. The Jews, however, acknowledge but two, not allowing the 3d to be a new temple, but only the 2d one repaired and beautified. And this is thought best to agree with the prophecy of Haggai (2:9). 'The glory of this latter house shall be greater than that of the former,' which is generally interpreted with reference to the Messiah's honoring it with his personal presence and ministry.§

II. The first temple was that of Solomon, for which materials were provided by David before his death.

1. It occupied one of the 3 eminences on which the city of Jerusalem was built, and which is well known to the Scripture reader as Mount Moriah. This name is differently explained by commentators. Its most literal meaning is 'the myrrh of Jehovah,' or 'the bitterness of Jehovah'; but how to explain it of the mountains around Jerusalem is not so easy. Perhaps it referred to the productions for which the country around Jerusalem was famed; 'the myrrh of Jehovah' meaning, in the Hebrew idiom, excellent myrrh. Be this as it may, the fact is certain, that the bitterness of Jehovah, God-man the Mediator, was afterwards experienced on these very mountains; for the garden of Gethsemane, in which He suffered such dreadful agony, was on one of them; the places where He was mocked, scourged, and condemned, were on another; and Calvary, where (while crucifying Him) they offered Him wine mingled with myrrh (Mk. 15:23), was on a third. For though the term Moriah was afterwards confined to the particular hill on which the temple was built, it originally comprehended the several mountains round about Jerusalem. Hence God said to Abraham, 'Take thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah, and offer him there for a burnt-offering, upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of' (Ge. 22:12).

2. At the division of Judea among the twelve tribes, it so happened that, small as the space on the top of Moriah was, it became the property of two tribes; for the greatest part of the temple courts was in the portion of Judah; and the altar, porch, holy and most holy places, were in the portion of Benjamin. In its original state, the summit of Moriah was unequal, and its sides irregular; but it was a part of the ambition of the Jewish kings to have it levelled and extended;|| insomuch that, during the 2d temple, it formed a square of 500 cubits, or 304 yards on each side, allowing, as is commonly done, 21.333 inches to the cubit. Almost the whole of this space was arched under ground, to prevent the possibility of pollution from secret graves; ¶ and it was surrounded by a wall of excellent stone, 25 cubits, or 47 feet 7 inches, high; without which lay a considerable extent of flat and gently-sloping ground, which was occupied by the buildings of the tower of Antonia, the gardens, and the public walks.*

3. The plan and the whole model of this structure was laid by the same divine architect as that of the tabernacle, viz. God himself; and it was built even in the same form as the tabernacle, only of much larger dimensions. The utensils for the sacred service were also the same as those used in the tabernacle, only several of them were larger, in proportion to the more spacious edifice to which they belonged. The foundations of this magnificent edifice were laid by Solomon, in the year of the world 2992; and was

* Lamy's App. Bib. h. i. ch. 4.

† The Heb. caphoreth is derived from a word which signifies to cover or overspread; because, by an act of parabol, sins are represented as being covered, so that they no longer appear in the eye of divine justice, to displease and call for punishment; and the person of the offender is covered, or protected from the stroke of the broken law. In the Septuagint, the word hilastērion is used, which signifies a propitiatory, and is the name used by the apostle, Heb. 9:5. As the word hilastērion, mercy-seat or propitiatory, is applied to Christ (Ro. 3:25), 'whom God hath set forth to be a propitiatory (hilastērion), through faith in his blood, for the remission of sins that are past,' we learn that Christ was the true mercy-seat, the thing signified by the caphoreth, to the ancient believers. And we learn further, that it was by his blood that an atonement was to be made for the sins of the world. And as God showed Himself between the cherubim, over this propitiatory or mercy-seat, so it is said, 'God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself.' 2 Co. 5:19, &c. See Dr. A. Clarke on Ex. 25:17.

§ Jenning's Jewish Antiq. h. ii. ch. I. It is difficult to reconcile this with the fact of Herod's rebuilding the temple of Zerubbabel, as he is stated to have done by Josephus, Ant. b. xv. c. 11; for if he pulled down the old temple to its foundations, and erected a new one, it is plain that this was a building as totally distinct from that of Zerubbabel, as that of Zerubbabel was from the temple of Solomon. How then are we to reconcile the prophecy above cited with the fact that our Savior did not appear while the second temple was standing? for we can hardly suppose that the Jewish historian has erred in the statement which he has here made, corroborated as that statement is by the evangelist in Jn. 2:21. Dr. Blayney has attempted to do this by a different rendering. 'In the Heb.' he remarks, 'the words will be found to stand precisely thus: Great shall be the glory of this house, the latter more than the former.' So that the words latter and former may as well be construed with the glory as with this house. Accordingly, the Seventy have adopted this construction; and the context seems evidently to justify the propriety of their translation; for in the introductory part of this prophecy, the word first or former is manifestly applied to glory, and not to this house: 'Who is left among you, that saw this house in her first glory?' And how do you see it now? Is it not in your eyes in comparison of it as nothing?' Hag. 2:3. It is manifest, too, that in this passage, the term this house is not confined in its application to the house the Jews were then building, but is undeniably meant of Solomon's temple. Nor, indeed, is it generally necessary to render a house identically the same, according to the common acceptance of language, that it be built at one and the same time, and exactly of the same form and materials; it is sufficient, though it should have been rebuilt at different times successively, if it be erected still on the same site, and devoted to the same purpose. It is the house of God, the temple appropriated to divine worship at Jerusalem, which was intended by this house, whether built by Solomon, by the Jews under Zerubbabel, or by Herod. Were it otherwise, how could Solomon's temple be called this house, as it is in the passage just now cited? or how are we to understand the words (Ex. 5:11-13) which the Jews are said to have spoken to the Persian officers, who demanded their authority for rebuilding the temple? 'We are,' say they, 'the servants of the God of heaven and earth, and build the house that was built there many years ago, which a great king of Israel built and set up. But after that our fathers had provoked the God of heaven to wrath, he gave them into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, the Chaldean, who destroyed this house. But Cyrus made a decree to build this house of God.' Here it is plain that the words this house are alternately applied to the temple of Solomon and that built under Zerubbabel, and may certainly as well be extended to that of Herod. — His course preached before the University of Oxford, Nov. 9th, 1788, 4to, and reprinted in the Methodist Magazine, vol. v. 3d series, p. 515, &c.

finished A. M. 3000, having occupied 7 years and 6 months in the building. It was dedicated A. M. 3001, with peculiar solemnity, to the worship of Jehovah, who condescended to make it the place for the special manifestation of his glory. 2 Ch. 5:6; 7.

4. We have already said that the front or entrance to the temple was on the eastern side, and consequently facing the mount of Olives, which commanded a noble prospect of the building; the holy of holies, therefore, stood towards the west.* The temple itself, strictly so called, which comprised the portico, the sanctuary, and the holy of holies, formed only a small part of the sacred edifice, being surrounded by spacious courts, chambers, and other apartments, much more extensive than the temple itself, which was never designed to hold a concourse of people—it was for the service of the Lord, and the priests were the only people employed in it.

5. As we possess only verbal descriptions of the temple of Solomon, it is impossible to obtain a very accurate idea of its relative parts and their respective proportions. Hence we must not feel surprised that no two writers, who have undertaken to describe it, agree in their descriptions. The following account, which has been compiled with great care, may be sufficient to give us a general notion of the building.

(1) The temple itself was 70 cubits long; the porch being 10 cubits (1 K. 6:3), the holy place 40 cubits (v. 17), and the most holy place 20 cubits (2 Ch. 3:8). The width of the porch, holy and most holy places, was 23 cubits (2 Ch. 3:3); and the height over the holy and most holy places was thirty cubits (1 K. 6:2). The height of the porch was much greater than this, being no less than 120 cubits (2 Ch. 3:4), or 4 times the height of the rest of the building, [which proves that it resembled the Egyptian temples in this respect. Comp. the cut and ground plan of the ancient temple of Edfou, given on p. 112.] To the N. and S. sides, and the W. end of the holy and most holy places, or all round the edifice, from the back of the porch on the one side, to the back of the porch on the other side, certain buildings were attached, called side chambers, and consisting of 3 stories, each 5 cubits high (1 K. 6:10), and joined to the wall of the temple without. But what may seem singular is, that the lowest of these stories was 5 cubits broad on the floor; the second, 6 cubits; and the 3d, 7 cubits; and yet the outer wall of the whole was upright, v. 6. The reason of this was, that the wall of the temple, against which they leaned, had always a scarcement of a cubit at the height of every 5 cubits, to prevent the joists of these side chambers from being fixed in it. Thus the three stories of side chambers, when taken together, were 15 cubits high, and consequently reached exactly to half the height of the side walls, and end of the temple; so that there was abundance of space, above these, for the windows which gave light to the temple, v. 4. Josephus differs very materially from this in his account of the temple;† for which we know not how to account, but by supposing that he has confounded the Scripture account of Solomon's temple with that of the temple after the captivity and of Herod;‡

(2) In noticing the several courts of the temple, we naturally begin with the outer one, which was called,

(a) The court of the Gentiles, and into which persons of all nations were permitted to enter. The most common approach to this was by the E. gate, which was the principal gate of the temple. It was by far the largest of all the courts pertaining to the sacred building, and comprised a space of 133,991 superficial cubits, or 14 English acres, 1 rood, 29 poles, and 13 yards; of which above two thirds lay to the S. of the temple. It was separated from the court of the women by a wall of 3 cubits high, of lattice-work, so that persons walking here might see through as well as over it. This wall, however, was not on a level with the court of which we are speaking, but was cut out of the rock 6 cubits above it, the ascent to which was by 12 steps. On pillars placed at equal distances in this wall, were inscriptions in Greek and Latin, to warn strangers, and such as were unclean, not to proceed further, or pain of death.|| It was from this court that our Savior drove the persons who had established a cattle-market, for the purpose of supplying those with sacrifices who came from a distance. Mat. 21:12,13. We must not overlook the beautiful pavement of variegated marble, and the piazzas, or covered walks, with which this court was surrounded. Those on the E., W., and N. sides were of the same dimensions; but that on the S. was much larger.¶ The porch called Solomon's (Jn. 10:23. Ac. 3:11) was on the S. side or front of the temple, and was so called because it was built by this prince, upon a high wall of 400 cubits from the valley of Kedron.

(b) The court of the women, called in Scripture the new court (2 Ch. 20:3), and the outer court (Ez. 46:21), was so designated by the Jews, not because none but women were permitted to enter it, but because it was their appointed place of worship, beyond which they might not go; unless when they brought a sacrifice, in which case they went forward to the court of Israel. The gate which led into this court, from that of the Gentiles, was the beautiful gate of the temple, mentioned Ac. 3:2; so called because the folding-doors, Intel, and side-posts, were all overlaid with Cornithian brass.†† The court itself was 135 cubits square, having four gates, one on each side; and on 3 of its sides were piazzas, with galleries above them, whence could be seen what was passing in the great court.‡‡ At the 4 corners of this court were 4 rooms, appropriated to different purposes. Ez. 16:21-24. In the first, the lepers purified themselves after they were healed; in the second, the wood for the sacrifices was laid up; the Nazarites prepared their oblations and shaved their heads in the third; and in the fourth, the wine and oil for the sacrifices were kept. There were also two rooms more, where the Levites' musical instruments were laid up; and also 13 treasure chests, two of which were for the half-shelak, which was paid yearly by every Israelite; and the rest for the money for the purchase of sacrifices and other oblations.¶¶ It was in this court of the women, called the treasury, that our Savior delivered his striking discourse to the Jews, related in Jn. 2: 1-20. It was into this court, also, that the Pharisee and publican went to pray (Lu. 18: 10-13), and into which the lame man followed Peter and John after he was cured; the court of the women being the ordinary place of worship for those who brought no sacrifice. Ac. 3:3. From thence, after prayers, he went back with them, through the beautiful gate of the temple, where he had been lying, and through the sacred fence into the court of the Gentiles, where, under the eastern piazza, or Solomon's porch, Peter delivered that sermon which converted 5000. It was in the same court of the women that the Jews laid hold on Paul, when they judged him a violator of the temple, by taking Gentiles within the sacred fence. Ac. 21:26, &c. In this court the high-priest, at the feast of expiation, read a portion of the law. Here also the king, on the sabbatical year, did the same at the feast of tabernacles.|||

(c) The court of Israel was separated from the court of the women by a wall 32½ cubits high on that side, but on the other only 23; the reason of the difference being, that as the rock on which the temple stood always became higher on advancing westward, the several courts naturally became elevated in proportion. The ascent into the court was by a flight of 15 steps, of a semicircular form, on which the Levites stood and sang the 'Psalms of degrees' (120-134) at the feast of tabernacles. This gate is spoken of under several appellations in the O. T.; but in the time of our Savior it was known as the gate Nicanor. It was here that the leper stood, to have his atonement made, and his cleansing completed. It was here that they tried the suspected wife, by making her drink of the bitter water; and it was here also that women appeared after child-birth for purification. The whole length of the court, from E. to W., was 187 cubits, and the breadth, from N. to S., 135 cubits. This was divided into two parts; one of which was the court of the Israelites, and the other, the court of the priests. The former was a kind of piazza surrounding the latter, under which the Israelites stood, while their sacrifices were burning in the court of the priests. It had 13 gates, with chambers above them, each of which had its particular name and use.¶¶ The space comprised in the court of the priests was 165 cubits long and 119 cubits wide, and was raised 2½ cubits above the surrounding court, from which it was separated by the pillars which supported the piazza, and the railing which was placed between them. 2 K. 11:8,10. Within this court stood the brazen altar on which the sacrifices were consumed, and the molten sea in which the priests washed, and the ten brazen lavers for washing the sacrifices; also the various utensils and instruments for sacrificing, enumerated in 2 Ch. ch. 4.

(d) It is necessary to observe here, that although the court of the priests was not accessible to all Israelites, as that of Israel was to all the priests, yet they might enter it on three several occasions, viz. to lay their hands on the animals which they offered, or to kill them, or to wave some part of them. Their entrance, however, was not by the E. gate, and through the place where the priests stood, but ordinarily by the N. or S. side of the court, according as the sacrifices were to be slain on the N. or S. side of the altar. In general, it was a rule, that they never returned from this court by the same door that they entered. Ex. 40:44.††

(3) From the court of the priests the ascent to the temple was by a flight of 12 steps, each ½ a cubit in height, which led into the sacred porch. Of the dimensions of this, as also of the sanctuary and holy of holies, we have already spoken. We shall therefore only observe here, that it was within the door of the porch, and in the sight of those who stood in the courts immediately before it, that the two pillars, Jachin and Boaz, were placed. 2 Ch. 3:17. Ez. 40:49.

6. The temple, thus described, retained its pristine splendor but 33 years, when it was plundered by Shishak, king of Egypt. 1 K. 14:25,26. 2 Ch. 12:9. After this period, it underwent sundry profanations and pillagings, and was at length utterly destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, A. M. 3116, B. C. 588, after having stood, according to Usher, 424 years, 3 months, and 3 days.

III. After this sacred building had lain in ruins for 53 years, the foundations of the second temple were laid by Zerubbabel, and the Jews who had availed themselves of the privilege granted by Cyrus, returned to Je-

* This, it will be perceived, was directly the reverse of the plan on which the heathen temples were built; these being so constructed that the worshippers should have their faces to the east. [Note and cut, p. 111.]

They had not proceeded far, however, before they were obliged to desist, on account of an order from Artaxerxes, king of Persia, which had been procured through the misrepresentations of the Samaritans and others. 41. During 15 years the work stood still (v. 24), but in the 2d year of Darius it was recommenced; and on the 3d day of the month Adar, in the 6th year of Darius, it was finished and dedicated (Ezr. 6:15, 16), 21 years after it was begun. B. C. 515.^{*} The dimensions of this temple in breadth and height were double those of Solomon's. The weeping of the people at the laying of the foundation, therefore (Ezr. 3:12, 13), and the diminutive manner in which they spoke of it, when compared with the first one (Hag. 2:3), were not occasioned by its inferiority in size, but in glory. It wanted the 5 principal things of the former, viz. the ark and mercy-seat—the Divine Presence, or visible glory of the Shechinah—the holy fire on the altar—the Uriim and Thummim—and the spirit of prophecy. In the year A. M. 3357, this temple was plundered and profaned by Antiochus Epiphanes, who ordered the discontinuance of the daily sacrifice, offered swine's flesh upon the altar, and completely suspended the worship of Jehovah. I Mac. 1:62.

larger than that of Zerubbabel, as that of Zerubbabel was larger than Solomon's. For whereas the second temple was 70 cubits long, 60 broad, and 60 high, this was 100 cubits long, 70 broad, and 100 high. The porch was raised to the height of 100 cubits, and was extended 15 cubits beyond each side of the rest of the building. All the Jewish writers praise this temple exceedingly for its beauty, and the costliness of its workmanship; for it was built of white marble, exquisitely wrought, and with stones of large dimensions, some of them 25 cubits long, 8 cubits high, and 12 cubits thick.[†] To these there is no doubt a reference in Mk. 12:1. Lu. 21:5.

3. Of the several parts and courts of this temple it is unnecessary that we should here speak. They have been already described, with some little variation, in our account of the temple of Solomon. We may add, however, that the vast sums which Herod laid out in adorning this structure gave it the most magnificent and imposing form. 'Its appearance,' says Josephus,[‡] had every thing that could strike the mind and astonish the sight. For it was on every side covered with solid plates of gold, so that when the sun rose upon it, it reflected such a strong and dazzling effulgence, that the eye of the beholder was obliged to turn away from it, being no more able to sustain its radiance than the splendor of the sun.[§] To strangers who approached the capital, it appeared at a distance like a huge mountain covered with snow; for where it was not decorated with plates of gold, it was extremely white and glistening.[¶] The historian, indeed, says that the temple of Herod was the most astonishing structure he had ever seen or heard of, as well on account of its architecture as its magnitude, and likewise the richness and magnificence of its various parts, and the fame and reputation of its sacred appurtenances. And Tacitus calls it immense opulent templum—a temple of immense opulence. Its external glory, indeed, consisted thus it continued for 3 years, when it was repaired and purified by Judas Maccabees, who restored the divine worship, and dedicated it anew.

IV. Herod, having slain all the Sanhedrin except two, in the first year of his reign, or 37 years before Christ, resolved to atone for it by rebuilding and beautifying the temple.[†] This he was the more inclined to do, both from the peace which he enjoyed, and the decayed state of the edifice. For, besides the common ravages of time, it had suffered considerably by the hands of enemies; since that part of Jerusalem was the strongest, and consequently the last resort of the inhabitants in times of extremity. After employing 2 years in preparing the materials for the work, in which 1000 wagons and 10,000 artificers were employed, besides 1000 priests to direct the works, the temple of Zerubbabel was pulled down, 17 years before Christ, and 40 years before the first passover of his ministry.[‡] Herod's temple was fit for divine service in 33 years; but a great number of laborers and artificers were still employed in carrying on the out-buildings, all the time of our Savior's abode on earth, and even till the appointment of Gessius Florus as governor of Judea.[§]

2. The temple of Herod was considerably

tempestuously shaking their heads, and saying, 'O Thou, who couldst demolish our temple, and rear it up again, in all its splendor, in the space of three days, do now save Thyself, and descend from the cross!' Mat. 27:40. Their superstitious veneration for the temple further appears from the account of Stephen. When his adversaries were baffled and confounded by that superior wisdom and those distinguished gifts he possessed, they were so exasperated at the victory he had gained over them, that they sent and suborned persons to swear that they had heard him speak blasphemy against Moses and against God. These inflaming the populace, the magistrates, and the Jewish clergy, he was seized, dragged away, and brought before the Sanhedrin. Here the false witnesses, whom they had procured, stood up, and said, 'This person before you is continually uttering the most reproachful expressions against this sacred place' (Ac. 6:13), meaning the temple. This was blasphemy not to be pardoned. A judgement composed of high priests and scribes would never forgive such impiety.^{||} We witness the same thing in the case of Paul, when they imagined that he had taken Trophimus, an Ephesian, with him into the temple, and for which insult they had determined to imbrue their hands in his blood. Ac. 21:33, &c.

V. We have only to add that, from several passages of Scripture, it appears that the Jews had a body of soldiers who guarded the temple, to prevent any disturbance during the ministration of such an immense number of priests and Levites. To this body of men, whose office it was to guard the temple, Pilate probably referred, when he said to the chief-priests and Pharisees who waited on him to desire he would make the sepulchre secure, 'You have a watch: go your way, and make it as secure as you can.' Mat. 27:55. Over these guards one person had the supreme command, who in several places is called the captain of the temple, or officer of the temple guards. Ac. 4:1. 5:25, 26. 16:12. Josephus mentions such an officer, Antiq. b. xx. § 2; Wars, c. 17, § 2.^{||}

VI. A few remarks on the daily service of the temple may properly close this section.

1. The first thing we notice is the morning service. After having enjoyed their repose, the priests bathed themselves in the rooms provided for that purpose, and waited the arrival of the president of the lots. This officer having arrived, they divided themselves into two companies, each of which was provided with lamps or torches, and made a circuit of the temple, going in different directions, and meeting at the procurator's chamber, on the S. side of the gate Nicanor. Having summoned him to prepare the rakes for the high-priest's meat-offering, they retired with the president to the S. E. corner of the court, and cast lots for the duties connected with the altar. The priest being chosen to remove the ashes from the altar, he again washed his feet at the laver, and then, with the silver shovel, proceeded to his work. As soon as he had removed one shovelful of the ashes, the other priests retired to wash their hands and feet, and then joined him in cleaning the altar and renewing the fires. The next duty was to cast lots for the 13 particular duties connected with offering the sacrifice, which being settled, the president ordered one of them to fetch the lamb for the morning sacrifice. While the priests on this duty were engaged in fetching and examining the victim, those who carried the keys were opening the 7 gates of the court of Israel, and the 2 doors that separated between the porch and the holy place. When the last of the 7 gates was opened, the silver trumpets gave a flourish, to call the Levites to their desks for the music, and the stationary men to their places, as the representatives of the people.* The opening of the folding-doors of the temple was the established signal for killing the sacrifice, which was cut in pieces and carried to the top of the altar, where it was salted and left, while the priests once more retired to the room Gazith to join in prayer. While the sacrifice was being slain in the court of the priests, the two priests appointed to trim the lamps and cleanse the altar of incense were attending to their duties in the holy place. After the conclusion of their prayer, and a rehearsal of the ten commandments and their phylacteries, the priests again cast lots, to choose two to offer incense on the golden altar, and another to lay the pieces of the sacrifice on the fire of the brazen altar. The lot being determined, the two who were to offer the incense proceeded to discharge their duty, the time for which was between the sprinkling of the blood and the laying the pieces upon the altar, in the morning; and in the evening, between the laying of the pieces upon the altar and the drink-offering. As they proceeded to the temple, they rang the megaphita, or great bell, to warn the absent priests to come to worship, the absent Levites to come to sing, and the stationary men to bring to the gate Nicanor those whose purification was not perfected. The priest who carried the censor of coals, which had been taken from one of the three fires on the great altar, after kindling the fire on the incense altar, worshipped and came out into the porch, leaving the priest who had the incense alone in the holy place. As soon as the signal was given by the president, the incense was kindled, the holy place was filled with perfume, and the congregation without joined in the prayers.† These being ended, the priest, whose lot it was to lay the pieces of the sacrifice upon the altar, drew them into the fire, and then, taking the tongs, disposed them in somewhat of their natural order. The four priests who had been in the holy place now appeared upon the steps that led to the porch, and extending their arms, so as to raise their hands higher than their heads, one of them pronounced the solemn blessing, Nu. 6:24-26. After this benediction, the daily meat-offering was offered; then the meat-offering of the high-priest; and last of all the drink-offering; at the conclusion of which the Levites began the song of praise, and, at every pause in the music, the trumpets sounded and the people worshipped. This was the termination of the morning service.‡ It should be stated, that the morning service of the priests began with the dawn of day, except in the great festivals, when it began much earlier; the sacrifice was offered immediately after sunrise.

2. During the middle of the day, the priests held themselves in readiness to offer the sacrifices that might be presented by any of the Israelites, either of a voluntary or an expiatory nature. Their duties would therefore vary according to the number and nature of the offerings they might have to present.

3. The evening service varied in a very trifling measure from that of the morning, and the same priests ministered, except when there was one in the house of their father who had never burned incense, in which case that office was assigned to him; or if there were more than one, they cast lots who should be employed.§

VIII. The holiness of the place, and the injunction of Le. 19:3, 'Ye shall reverence my sanctuary,' laid the people under an obligation to maintain a solemn and holy behavior when they came to worship in the temple. We have already seen that such as were ceremonially unclean were forbidden to enter the sacred court on pain of death; but in the course of time there were several prohibitions enforced by the Sanhedrin which the law had not named. The following have been collected by Lightfoot out of the rabbinical writings:—(1) 'No man might enter the mountain of the house with his staff';—(2) 'None might enter in thither with his shoes on his feet,' though he might with his sandals; (3) 'Nor might any man enter the mountain of the house with his scrip on him'; (4) 'Nor might he come in with the dust on his feet,' but he must wash or wipe them, 'and look to his feet when he entered into the house of God'; to remind him, perhaps, that he should then shake off all worldly thoughts and affections. (5) 'Nor with money in his purse.' He might bring it in his hand, however, and in this way it was brought in for various purposes. If this had not been the case, it would seem strange that the cripple should have been placed at the gate of the temple, to ask alms of those who entered therein. See Ac. 3:2. (6) 'None might spit in the temple: if he were necessitated to spit, it must be done in some corner of his garment.' (7) 'He might not use any irreverent gesture, especially before the gate of Nicanor,' that being exactly in front of the temple. (8) 'He ought not make the mountain of the house a thoroughfare,' for the purpose of reaching a place by a nearer way; for it was devoted to the purposes of religion. (9) 'He that went into the court must go leisurely and gravely into his place; and there he must demean himself as in the presence of the Lord God, in all reverence and fear.' (10) 'He must worship standing, with his feet close to each other, his eyes directed to the ground, his hands upon his breast, with the right one above the left.' See Lu. 18:13. (11) 'No one, however weary, might sit down in the court.' The only exception was in favor of the kings of the house of David. (12) 'None might pray with his head uncovered. And the wise men and their scholars never prayed without a cap.' This custom is alluded to in 1 Co. 11:4, where the apostle directs the men to reverse the practice adopted in the Jewish temple. (13) Their bodily gesture, in bowing before the Lord, was either 'bending of the knees,' 'bowing the head,' or 'falling prostrate on the ground.' [Comp. the cuts on the colored page.] (14) Having performed the service, and being about to retire, 'they might not turn their backs upon the altar.' They therefore went backward till they were out of the court.||

§ 3.—The Synagogues.

1. The term synagogue primarily signifies an assembly; but, like the word church, it came at length to be applied to places in which any assemblies, especially those for the worship of God, met or were convened. From the silence of the O. T. with reference to these places of worship, most commentators and writers on biblical antiquities are of opinion that they were not in use till after the Babylonian captivity. Prior to that time, the Jews seem to have held their social meetings for religious worship either in the open air, or in the houses of the prophets. See 2 K. 4:23. Afterwards, synagogues could only be erected in those places where ten men of age, learning, piety, and easy circumstances, could be found to attend to the service which was enjoined in them. Large towns had several synagogues; and soon after the captivity, their utility became so obvious, that they were scattered over the land, and became the parish churches of the Jewish nation. Their number appears to have been very considerable; and when the erection of a synagogue was considered as a mark of piety (Lu. 7:5), or passport to heaven, we need not be surprised to hear that they were multiplied beyond all necessity, so that in Jerusalem alone there were not fewer than 460 or 420.¶ They were generally built on the most elevated ground,* and consisted of two parts. The one on the most westerly part of the building contained the ark, or chest, in which the book of the law and the sections of the prophets were deposited, and was called the temple, by way of eminence. The other, in which the congregation assembled, was termed the body of the church. The people sat with their faces towards the temple, and the elders in the contrary direction, and opposite to the people; the space between them being occupied by the pulpit or reading-desk. The seats of the elders were considered as more holy than the others, and are spoken of as 'the chief seats in the synagogue.' Mat. 23:6.

2. The stated office-bearers in every synagogue were 10, though in rank they were but 6. Their names and duties are given by Lightfoot, to whom the reader is referred. But we must notice the Archisynagogos, or ruler of the synagogue, who regulated all its concerns, and granted permission to preach. Of these there were 3 in each synagogue. Dr. Lightfoot believes them to have possessed a civil power, and to have constituted the lowest civil tribunal, commonly known as 'the council of three;' whose office it was to decide the differences that arose between any members of the synagogue, and to judge of money matters, thefts, losses, &c.|| To these officers there is probably an allusion in 1 Co. 6:9. The second office-bearer was 'the angel of the church,' or minister of the congregation, who prayed and preached. In allusion to these, the pastors of the Asiatic churches are called angels. Re. ch. 2, 3.

3. The service of the synagogue was as follows:—The people being seated, the minister, or angel of the church, ascended the pulpit, and offered up the public prayers; the people rising from their seats, and standing in a posture of deep devotion. Mat. 6:5. Mk. 11:25. Lu. 18:11, 13. The prayers were 19 in number, and were closed by reading the exhortation. The next thing was the repetition of their phylacteries; after which came the reading of the law and the prophets. The former was divided into 54 sections, with which were united corresponding portions|| from the prophets (see Ac. 15:21, 13:27); and these were read through once in the course of the year. After the return from the captivity, an interpreter was employed in reading the law and the prophets (see Ne. 8:2-10), who interpreted them into the Syro-Chaldaic dialect, which was then spoken by the people. The last part of the service was the expounding of the Scriptures, and preaching from them to the people. This was done either by one of the officers, or by some distinguished person who happened to be present. The reader will recollect one memorable occasion on which our Savior availed Himself of the opportunity thus afforded to address his countrymen (Lu. 4:20), and there are several other instances recorded of Himself and his disciples teaching in the synagogues. See Mat. 13:54. Mk. 6:2. Jn. 18:20. Ac. 13:5, 15:44. 14:1. 17:2-4, 10-12, 17. 18:4, 25. 19:8. The whole service was concluded with a short prayer or benediction.¶

4. The Jewish synagogues were used not only for the purposes of divine worship, but also for courts of judicature, in such matters as fell under the cognizance of the council of three, of which we have already spoken. On such occasions the sentence given against the offender was sometimes carried into effect in the place where the council was assembled. Hence we read of persons being beaten in the synagogue, and

* The whole congregation was divided into twenty-four classes, each of which sent a representative.

¶ Luke says (6:12) that our Lord went up into a mountain to pray, and continued all night in a proseucha, or oratory dedicated to God. These proseuchae are several times mentioned in the N. T., and are considered by

The Levites — Their rank — Their clerical and domestic — Their consecration — Their dues — Their support — Their ministrations — V. The Nethinim and Stationary Men.

In treating of those persons who sustained sacred functions in the Jewish church, we shall follow the order in which they are enumerated and classed by the indefatigable Lightfoot; * viz. the High-priest — the Superior Offerers of the Temple — the Priests — the Levites — the Levites — the Stationary Men, and the Nethinim.

§ 1. — The High-Priest.

1. In the Aaronic priesthood, the law established two orders or degrees; of which the superior was allotted to Aaron himself, and to his successors in the pontifical dignity; and the inferior to the other priests. Hence it appears that those functions which the Scriptures attribute to Aaron, as peculiar to himself, belonged exclusively to the high-priests, while the rest of the offices might be legitimately performed by the other priests.

2. In addition to the splendor of his dress, and the dignity of his office, of which we shall presently speak, there were certain things of a civil nature in which the high-priest differed from other men. It was necessary, for instance, that he should be free from bodily defect. Le. 21:17-21. He could neither marry a widow, nor a woman that had been divorced, nor a profane woman; but only a virgin. v. 7-15. He might not be defiled for the dead, or mourn, except for his nearest relations. v. 1-3. He might not be veiled if others were, or unveiled if they happened to be so; and while others sat on the ground, he sat on a seat. In short, the Jewish policy seems to have been, never to allow that principal functionary to forget that he was the priest of God, and solemnly separated from the rest of men. Yet, high as his character was, in a sacred point of view, he was not raised above the law; for there were circumstances which show that, in civil matters, the crown was always superior to the mitre. Thus he might be a witness in a civil cause, and, if necessary, evidence might be given against him. He might act as a judge occasionally; and, when guilty, could himself be judged. If he so far forgot the sanctity of his character as to do any thing that required whipping, he was suspended from his office, punished by the Sanhedrin, and then deposed. His shoe might be pulled off, for not raising seed unto his brother (De. 25:5), although he was not permitted to marry a widow. Le. 21:13,14. These, and several other things which might be mentioned, serve to show that the sanctity of his character did not raise him above civil control.†

3. That no species of sanctity or honor ought to be wanting to the priesthood, the Aaronic priests were consecrated to their office by various rites and ceremonies, in the following manner: — The first part of the consecration commenced with ablation (Ex. 29:4. Le. 8:6), to teach them the necessity of holiness to the proper discharge of so sacred an office. As soon as the lustrations had been duly performed on Aaron and his sons, Aaron himself was arrayed in the pontifical attire; the splendor and magnificence of which were proportioned to the dignity of the priesthood, and of the services to be performed. Hence they are said to have been made 'for glory and for beauty.' Ex. 23:2. The vestments of the high-priests were the coat, the drawers or breeches, the girdle, the robe, the ephod, the breastplate, the mitre, and the crown [cut, p. 47]; all which, being very beautiful, and some of them made of gold, have been called by the Jews golden vestments. Ex. 23: These were put upon Aaron, and used to be worn by every high-priest in the performance of all the sacred functions, except only on the day of annual atonement. In the services of that day, no others were worn than the coat, the drawers, the girdle, and the mitre; these were made of linen, and are called, by the Jews, white vestments. Grief became that day, and pompous attire is unsuitable to grief. When arrayed with these vestments, Aaron was further dignified by being anointed with the holy oil (Ex. 29:7. 30:25. Le. 8:12), which the Jewish writers say was profusely poured over his head, and thence drawn over his forehead, so as to describe on it, according to some, the Greek X, according to others the K, or according to others the Hebrew ד, which is the first letter of the word priest in that language; for there is nothing which the Jews leave uninvolved in their subtleties. The holy unction, however, was significant of honor and joy, as well as of sanctity and divine inspiration. In allusion to this, David says, 'Thou lovest righteousness and hatest iniquity; therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows.' Ps. 45:7. Hence it is, also, that the Son of God, being endued with the Holy Spirit without measure (Jn. 3:34), is called Messiah, Christ, the anointed. Hence, likewise, Christians themselves, who are made spiritual kings and priests (Re. 1:6), are said to be 'anointed,' and to have 'received an unction.' 2 Co. 1:21. And hence, in the last place, among the ancient Christians, mention was connected with baptism.‡

4. These rites having been performed upon Aaron, his sons were next enrobed with the vestments appointed for them, and then the oblation of three sacrifices for the whole of them followed — First, a sin-offering, as a kind of expiation by which they were to be purified; secondly, a burnt-offering, as a gift or present to recommend them to their Lord; and lastly, a peace-offering, as a sacred feast by which they were introduced into the family of God. For even the offerers themselves were permitted to feed upon peace-offerings; and those who rightly fed upon them were considered as God's doineses. Ex. 29: 3. With the blood of the ram, which was immolated as a peace-offering, the right ears of all the priests were then imbibed, and the thumbs of their right hands, and the great toes of their right feet. Ex. 29: 20. Le. 8:23,24. By this ceremony every priest was admonished what great attention he was required to give to the study of the law, to the sacred services, and to his ways — a term by which the Hebrews denote the general conduct. Abaranel observes that these ceremonies were performed on the right ear, right hand, and right foot, to teach the priest that his hearing, his actions, and his manners, ought always to have a right tendency; for the right denotes perfection.§ After these things were done, Moses, who was appointed to officiate as a priest in these solemnities, 'took of the ram' last mentioned; 'the fat and the rump, and all the fat that covereth the inwards, and the caul above the liver, and the two kidneys and their fat, and the right shoulder; and one loaf of bread, and one cake of oiled bread, and one unleavened wafer, and put all in the hands of Aaron and his sons; and placing his hands under their hands [note and cut, 1 Ch. 29:24], he waved them all to and fro, and presented them to God, the possessor of all things; and having thus presented them, he 'took them from off their hands,' and proceeded to 'burn them upon the altar.' Le. 8:25-28. Ex. 29:22-25. The breast of this ram he waved in the same manner, and took for himself, that being his share, as he had done the duty of a priest. He then sprinkled Aaron and his sons, and all their garments, with blood taken from the altar, and with the holy oil. In this manner he consecrated both the priests themselves and the sacerdotal vestments. Le. 8:29,30.

5. By these rites and ceremonies, repeated for 7 successive days, the whole family of Aaron was originally invested with the priesthood. Le. 8:33,34. But as long as any of the holy oil remained, all his successors in the priesthood, when about to enter on their office, were anointed and arrayed with the pontifical vestments, for the same number of days. Ex. 29:29,30. Hence the high-priest is sometimes designated in the Scripture as 'the priest that is anointed.' Le. 4:3. 5,16. But after the consumption of the sacred oil made by Moses, which the Jews affirme was never made again, it was a sufficient investment in the high-priesthood to be arrayed in the pontifical robes for 7 successive days; after which he was said to be 'consecrated by the garments.' The case of the high-priest differed from that of the common priests, who were never consecrated afresh after the original consecration of their fathers, the immediate sons of Aaron. The reason of this difference was, that the pontificate descended according to personal claims, but the priesthood by hereditary right.]

6. The high-priest, being thus installed, was prepared for discharging the various parts of his office, which were as follow: — (1) To offer sacrifices for the people; some of which he performed alone, as on the great day of atonement, in the most holy place; some with the assistance of the priests, as the offering of incense, and trimming the lamps, at certain times, in the holy place; and some with the assistance of both priests and Levites, as all the services of the brazen altar, where the priests assisted in killing, and the Levites in removing what was offensive about the bodies of the beasts sacrificed. — (2) To bless the people, either at stated seasons, according to the form prescribed in Nu. 6:23-27, or occasionally, as when Eli blessed Hannah, 1 S. 1:17. — (3) To judge the people, either in things concerning the house and worship of God (Zch. 3:6,7), or in hard and difficult cases of a civil nature, when he was joined with the civil judge or ruler. De. 17:12. Dr. Owen makes him also to have been, ex officio, a member of the Sanhedrin, which he thinks is countenanced by De. 17:8-13, although he owns that this is denied by some of the Jews.

7. The high-priest held his office for life, i. e. he could not be deposed by any legal procedure. But it frequently happened, in the times toward the end of the Jewish polity, that the office was made an object of emolument and ambition, and priests were deposed and installed according to the pleasure of those who wielded the supreme authority in the state. See the books of Maccabees, and Josephus's Jewish Writs, b. iv. c. 3.

8. In closing these observations, we must not omit to notice the typical character of the high-priest, the illustration of which truth is one of the objects proposed by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews. As our great High-priest, Christ has offered a more excellent sacrifice than those with which Aaron was provided. He, 'through the Eternal Spirit, offered Himself without spot to God,' and then passed through the heavens into the most holy place, to present the oblation of his blood on our behalf.

§ 2.—The Superior Officers of the Temple.

Of these the following were the principal ones:

1. The sagan was the officer next in dignity after the high-priest. There is some difficulty in ascertaining the precise nature of his duties; but he seems to have been the assistant of the high-priest while present, and his substitute when absent. For as all the affairs of the temple were under the direction of the high-priest, and no individual could attend to them all, so it was judged requisite to give him an assistant. Hence the sagan acted as high-priest in all the business of the temple which was not peculiar to that sacred character, when the high-priest himself was either absent or indisposed. This office also related to the priests below him; for Maimonides says that all the priests were under the disposal of the sagan. In this sense, Lightfoot remarks, Zadok and Ahimelech are said to have been priests in the days of Abazar, the high-priest; he is also of opinion that, where Annas and Caiaphas are said to have been high-priests together (I Cor. 3, 2), the meaning is, that Caiaphas was high-priest, and Annas his sagan.

2. The next officers in point of dignity were the katholikin, or chief overseers of the treasures. They were 2 in number, and, as their title imports, were placed over the property of the temple. They were to the sagan what the sagan was to the high-priest.

3. The next office was that of the amerkelin, of whom there were 7. They were the overseers of the 7 gates round the court of Israel. They had also the keys of the temple wardrobes, and of the rooms of the several vessels.

4. The gesherita, or deputy-collectors, under the katholikin and amerkelin, were appointed to receive all that was due by statute, or voluntarily offered, to the temple treasury. The 5 ranks of priests thus noticed are thought by Lightfoot to have formed the beth-din, or consistory of the priests, for transacting the business of the sanctuary; neither inflicting fines nor corporal punishments, but superintending the service and the devoted things. They are called councillors and sitters; and Joseph of Arimathea, who was an honorable counsellor, is supposed to have been one of their number.

5. The head of the course, or the priest who presided over the course that served for the week, was the 6th officer in point of dignity. These are the same officers who in the Gospels are termed chiefs of priests.

6. The heads of the houses of their fathers, in each course of the priests, were the lowest order, except the ordinary priests.

7. Besides these officers, there were 15 overseers, over so many companies, for the purpose of seeing in the proper ordering of every thing connected with the temple service, in which the utmost regularity and the most rigid punctuality were observed.

§ 3.—The Priests.

1. The age at which the priests were allowed to enter upon their office is not stated in Scripture, but it is supposed to have been 30 years. From 25 to 30 they learned their duties, and from 30 to 50 they served their office, when they might retire if they chose. Of their marriages we know but little; like the high-priests, they were forbidden to marry widows, or women who had been divorced; but might marry virgins, or the widows of priests (Ex. 14, 22); and it was reckoned disgraceful to marry into families either of bad character, or bearing hereditary diseases. I.e. 21, 7. Great care was taken to prevent the ministers of the sanctuary from being polluted by any ceremonial defilement, and consequently disqualified for public service. In that respect they were to be holier than other men. For besides the general canon to avoid the ordinary violations of the divine law, which were binding on all the Israelites, their own particular defilements are specially mentioned (Le. 22, 1-10); and their mourning for the dead, and consequent defilement on that account, were confined to the nearest relations (v. 1-3), lest the service of God should be interrupted.

2. The dress used by the priests while officiating, consisted of a white linen bonnet, coat, breeches, and a girdle of the same material, embroidered with blue, purple, and scarlet. Ex. 28, 39-42, 39, 27-29. The bonnet was of the same form as the high-priest's mitre, but not so full and ornamented, and without the golden plate, on which was engraved 'HOLINESS TO THE LORD.' The girdle was of considerable length, so as to fold round them several times, thus serving both for warmth and for strengthening the loins. When they were not officiating, they wore the ordinary dress of their countrymen. Le. 6, 11.

3. The duties of the priests are fully described in the Pentateuch. They kept alive the sacred fire on the altar of burnt-offering, in the court of the priests. They killed the animals which were devoted, offering them in the manner appointed for each. They trimmed the lamps on the golden candlestick in the holy place; prepared, brought, and removed the show-bread; offered up prayers for the people; judged of leprosy, the causes of divorce, the waters of jealousy, vows, uncleannesses, &c. In short, they had the charge of the sanctuary, altar, service, and all the vessels connected with it (Nu. 13, 5, 7); to keep them in order, to free them from pollution, and to preserve decency through the whole of the ritual; for which last purpose particularly none were allowed to taste wine till the evening. Le. 10, 9. Ez. 4, 21. But the duties of the priests were not confined to the temple. They were judges in civil matters in the 13 cities appropriated to them (I Ch. 6, 51-60, 19, 6-10, Ez. 41, 21); and would naturally also be employed in offices suited to their sacred character, either in reading, explaining, and translating the law (De. 33, 10. Ne. 8, 2-6, 2 Ch. 17, 39); or, when synagogues were appointed, in sending a sufficient number of their order to the several places of public worship, to conduct the divine service. Nor were they freed from liability to serve the state in case of danger, of which we have numerous examples in the O. T. history.

4. The maintenance of the priesthood was derived from the following sources—the 13 cities, with their suburbs, which were appointed to them (Jos. 21, 1, 4, 19. I Ch. 6, 51-69); the portions of the sacrifices which were reserved from the altar; the first-fruits presented at the temple (Le. 2, 13-15, 16), which, by the rabbis, were fixed at the 13th, or 14th below the 5th, of the whole crop; the produce of everything devoted to the Lord; the firstlings of cattle; the first fleece of the sheep (De. 13, 1); the price paid for the redemption of the first-born (Nu. 3, 17, 13-16); the 10th of the tithes (Nu. 13, 26-31); the 5th part that was added to the estimation of trespass in the things of the Lord (I.e. 5, 15, 16); the fruit of all trees of the 1st year after they were planted, 19, 23-24. ¶

5. Concerning the number of the priests during the continuance of the tabernacle, we have no information. But in the time of David we find them so numerous that he divided them into 24 courses, each of which was to serve a week in its turn. I Ch. 21, 1-19. 2 Ch. 23, 1-2. Each of these courses had its head or chief, of whom we have spoken in enumerating the principal officers of the temple. This order seems to have been retained till the captivity; but as only 4 of the classes returned from Babylon, Ezra is said to have divided them into their original number, and to have distinguished each course by its former appellation. As the great number of the sacerdotal order occasioned their being first divided into 24 companies, so in after-times the number of each company became too large for them all to minister together; for there were no less, according to Josephus,* than 6000 priests in one course in his time. Each course was therefore divided according to the number of the houses of their fathers that were contained in it. The chiefs of each house formed the 6th class of officers noticed above.

§ 4.—The Levites.

1. The Levites were so named because they were the posterity of Levi, one of the sons of Jacob. They were chosen to the service of the sanctuary in place of the first-born of the males of Israel, who were counted holy to the Lord. Nu. 3, 12. In point of dignity, the Levites were of a middle rank, between the priests and the people. They were, properly speaking, the ministers and assistants of the priests, during the whole divine service. Nu. 4, 15. 1 Ch. 15, 22.

2. The Levites were at first divided into three classes, according to the number of the sons of Levi, viz. the Gershonites, the Kohathites, and the Merarites. Nu. 3, 17. Under the tabernacle, their office was to carry it and its furniture from place to place, each family having its particular department. At this time they did not enter upon their office till they were 30 years of age. Nu. 4, 3. Under the temple, the age was reduced to 20. 1 Ch. 23, 24. When the Israelites entered the promised land, the service of the Levites was somewhat altered; for while part of them attended the tabernacle and ark, the rest were distributed through the land, in the several cities that were allotted them. These cities were 35 in number; which, with the 13 given to the priests, made 48. Their names, with the tribes in which they stood, may be seen in Jos. 21, 20-24, 1 Ch. 6, 61-81. Six of these Aaronical and Levitical cities were styled cities of refuge, because they were appointed for those who had unintentionally been guilty of murder. De. 4, 11-13. Jos. 20, 2-9. In their several cities, it is supposed the Levites employed themselves in the instruction of youth. ¶

3. In the time of David, the Levites were divided into 24 courses, that they might attend the temple weekly, and only officiate about 2 weeks in the year. 1 Ch. 9, 20-24, 23, 7-23. 21, 20-31. 25, 1, &c. 26, 1-19. The employment of the Levites about the temple was three-fold: (1) As porters at the gates of the temple. (2) As guards of its sacred precincts during the night. Over these was placed an overseer, called 'the man of the mountain of the house,' whose business it was to see that each one did his duty. We are told in the Mishnah, that if, in going his rounds, he found any not standing, he said to him, 'Peace be unto thee'; but if he found any one asleep, he struck him, and might set fire to his garments; which was sometimes done. Lightfoot thinks there is an allusion to this in Re. 1, 15. 'I feasted, I slept as a thief; blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame.' ¶ (3) As musicians and singers, whose duty it was to conduct the vocal and instrumental part of the sacred service. This class formed the temple choir, and was divided into 24 courses. Such was the distribution of the Levites about the temple service; to which we may add, that on extraordinary occasions, they assisted the priests in killing the sacrifices; but were not allowed to mingle with the blood. 2 Ch. 29, 31. 30, 16, 17. 25, 11. They seem also to have had some share in the solemn act of blessing the people, at the conclusion of the public service (30, 27); to have joined with the priests in the general distribution of sum; for maintaining the sacerdotal orders throughout the several cities allotted to them (2. 5-7, 16-19); to have copied the law for the benefit of their countrymen, and even sometimes to have had such ols for explaining it; to have acted in the situation of officers and judges (1 Ch. 23:1); and to have given their proportion of defence to the state, 26:31-32. We also find them sustaining the military character, 27:17, 12:26-33.

4. The consecration of the Levites to their office is mentioned in Nu. 8:6-22, where we are informed that, after being sprinkled with water, having their bodies shaved, and their clothes washed, they took two young bullocks with the necessary appendages, and gave them to Aaron, to be offered, the one for a sacrifice, and the other for a burnt-offering.

5. Concerning the dress of the Levites we have no information. Calmet says they had no dress to distinguish them from their countrymen. In the reign of Agrippa, Josephus informs us¹ that the Levites requested permission from that prince to wear the furniture, like the priests, which was granted. This innovation was displeasing to the priests; and the Jewish historian remarks, that the ancient customs of the country were never forsaken with impunity; adding, that Agrippa permitted likewise the families of the Levites to learn to sing and play on instruments, that they might be qualified for the temple service as musicians.

6. The sources whence the support of the Levites was derived were, the 35 cities, with their suburbs, assigned to them; and the tithes of corn, fruit, and cattle; or rather nine tenths of all the titheable productions of the eleven tribes; for the priests received a tenth part of their tithes, which were regarded as their first-fruits, offered to God. Nu. 18: 21-21.

7. With regard to the numbers of the Levites, we observe that when numbered in the second year after the exodus, they were found to be 22,000 (Nu. 3:22, 23, 31); of which there were 8,500 fit for the service of the sanctuary. When enumerated by David a little before his death, those fit for the sacred service amounted to 37,000, of whom 21,000 were set over the works of the Lord; 6,000 were officers and judges, 1,000 were porters, and 4,000 musicians, 1 Ch. 23:3, 15. Among those who took advantage of Cyrus's decree, and returned from Babylon, we find only 341 (Ezr. 2: 40-42) or 350 (Ne. 7:21-25) Levites accompanying Zerubbabel. A few more, indeed, are mentioned in Ne. 12: 21-26; but they are very inconsiderable. Many chose rather to remain in Babylon than to return to Judea; and it is painful to observe, that even of those who did return, there were several whose hearts were not right with God. But they became sensible of the errors into which they had fallen; reformed the abuses that had crept in among them, and, as a token of obedience, signed with Nehemiah the national covenant (Ne. 10:9-13), and dwelt at Jerusalem to influence others by their authority and example. 11: 15-19.

§ 5.—The Nethinim and Stationary Men.

1. The Nethinim were persons given, as the name imports, to the priests and Levites, for performing the servile offices of the tabernacle and the temple. Jos. 9:27. The first of this kind of persons were the Gibeonites, who imposed upon the Israelites by a false statement, and thus saved their lives. Jos. 9:21-27. David and Solomon devoted to this service some of the persons taken in war, and 'the strangers that were in the land,' Ezr. 8:20, 2 Ch. 2:17, 16. The latter amounted to 153,600, 20,000 of whom became hewers of wood, and 70,000 bearers of bur-bows, who were placed under 3,600 of the chief of Solomon's officers. 1 K. 5: 15. Many of these returned from the captivity, preferring to sustain the meanest offices in the house of God, rather than to dwell in the tents of wickedness. Ezr. 2:53, 8:20, Ne. 3:26, 7:46-40.

2. The stationary men we have had occasion to mention, in treating of the service of the sanctuary, whence it has been seen that they were the representatives at the temple of the 24 classes into which the Jewish nation was divided. The design of their appointment was to serve, virtually, the presence of the entire nation, when the daily sacrifices and worship were offered. There were 24 courses of these officers, each of which attended at the temple for a week, during which time it was neither lawful for them to wash their clothes, nor be trimmed by a barber.²

The obligations to present sacrifices and oblations, and the time when they became due. VIII. The typical nature of the whole class of sacrifices.³

I.—I. The origin of an institution so widely prevalent as that of sacrifices, is a subject in all respects calculated to excite the attention and stimulate the inquiry of the learned; and, accordingly, the ample field of theology scarcely presents any topic upon which the abilities and erudition of the most eminent divines have been more frequently or more warmly exercised. Nor can it be regarded as a subject of mere literary curiosity; it is a question of great religious interest, arising from its connection with the Mosaic law, and with the Christian doctrine of atonement. It derives, too, especial importance from the relation it bears to prophecy; for if the rite of sacrifice be a divine institution, it must surely be invested with a typical character; i. e., it must have been intended as a symbolic representation, adapted to prefigure the expiatory sacrifice of the Son of God. Writers, however, the most competent to the discussion, have given sufficient judgments on the question—whether sacrifice is to be attributed to a divine or a human origin. Among the many distinguished theologians who have advocated the former opinion, Alp. Maier, on account of the wantonness of his intellectual powers, and the skill with which he wielded his vast erudition, holds a conspicuous rank. His 'Discourses and Dissertations on the Scriptural Doctrine of Atonement and Sacrifice' are justly esteemed the most classical work in defence of the divine origin of sacrifice. Mr. Faber has followed in the same track, and has thrown much light upon the subject, in his treatise on the 'Object and Genius of the Three Dispensations.' Ep. Warburton, & Mr. Benson,⁴ and Mr. Davison,⁵ on the contrary, maintain that we cannot insist on the divine institution of sacrifices, in its earliest age, nor build any thing on that assumption.

2. The positions which are maintained by the impugners of the divine origin of sacrifice are these: (1) That a divine appointment of sacrifice cannot be maintained, as the more probable account of the origin of that mode of worship. (2) That its human institution, if that be admitted, does not intrude in any manner upon the honor and sanctity of the Mosaic law; nor invade, much less invalidate, the essential doctrine, of the Christian atonement; and, (3) that if any person shall still prefer to ascribe the first sacrifices to a divine appointment, there is yet no tenable ground for the belief, that any revelation of their intent, in reference to the future sacrifice and atonement of the gospel, was joined with them.

3. Of these positions, the first is evidently the most important, and it has consequently been eloquently and powerfully enforced by the writers to whom reference has been made. The proofs by which it is sought to establish it are derived from both the historical and the doctrinal evidence of Scripture. Beginning with the historical evidence, much weight is attached to the observation, that there is a total silence in holy writ as to the rise of sacrifice. 'When the offerings of Cain and Abel,' says Mr. Davison, 'the first recorded instance of that or any other worship, are introduced, the record adds nothing as to the authority or the appointment of that kind of religious service. Whether commanded of God, or framed by man, the text leaves wholly unexplained. Not only is there no direct information, but neither is there any implied evidence in the history of the facts, intimating whether the worshipper, when he came to bring his offering, obeyed a command, or acted upon the suggestions of a customary or a spontaneous piety.'⁶

4. This negative argument has been powerfully urged by Ep. Warburton, and eloquently enforced by Mr. Benson; nor has it gained any additional force in the hands of Mr. Davison; for, when he proceeds to argue, that 'this silence of Scripture history, neutral in the narration, is far from neutral in its import,' he may be thought either to contradict himself, or to argue sophistically. But the argument, however propounded, cannot avail with the advocates of the opposite system, who deny the premises. In their view of the question there is 'an implied evidence in the history of the facts,' since the divine acceptance of Abel's offering is, in their estimation, evidence that the worship itself must have been commanded. The same inference, they believe, is deducible from the very expressions in the Scripture narrative, from the distinction of clean and unclean beasts, which, they think, could only be made for sacrificial purposes (Ge. 7:2), and from the appointment of the Sabbath as virtually including the appointment of sacrifice; for they cannot conceive that the Almighty would set apart the 7th day for religious services, without informing man of the nature of the services he was bound to perform. It cannot, however, be denied, that in the history there is no express mention of the divine institution of sacrifices; and upon this circumstance we may reason as an acknowledged fact; it may, nevertheless, be fairly doubted whether a negative argument of this kind can amount to more than a presumption, which, in the present case, is much diminished by another fact, namely, that in the book of Genesis, and the other historical parts of the sacred volume, there are omissions of equally important matter. Excepting Jacob's supplication at Bethel (Ge. 28:13-22), scarcely a single allusion to prayer is to be found in the whole Pentateuch. Circumcision, being the sign of God's covenant with Abraham, was beyond all question punctually observed by the Israelites; yet, from their settlement in Canaan, no particular instance is recorded of it till the circumcision of Christ—a period comprising about 1500 years. The observance of the Sabbath is never spoken of in the history of the patriarchal ages; and no express mention is made of it in the books of Joshua, Judges, Ruth, the First and Second of Samuel, or the First Book of Kings. Hence it is argued, that it can be nothing wonderful if the first institution of sacrifice, on the supposition of a divine command, is not recorded in the summary history of the primitive times.

3. Having concluded that the historical evidence of Scripture is adverse to the belief that primitive sacrifice was consecrated by a divine institution, these writers proceed to consider the objections which have been made to its human origin; the first of which is the natural incongruity of sacrificial worship—its unsuitableness to the dictates of reason. The stress of this argument is applied not to eucharistic, but to piacular sacrifice. The former, being an oblation of thanksgiving, is the natural and spontaneous offering of a heart impelled by gratitude to its Creator. The exception, then, taken to the natural reasonableness of sacrifice, bears only upon the sacrifice strictly so called, that of a living creature, slain, and offered as a holocaust upon the altar, and presented as an offering for sin. ‘In this kind of sacrifice,’ says Mr. Davison, ‘two conditions are to be distinguished—the guilt of the worshipper, and the atonement for, or expiation of, his sin.’ In reference to the second condition, the expiatory or atoning power of sacrifice, the following candid acknowledgments are made by this writer:—‘Instead of attempting to deduce the doctrine of expiation and atonement by animal sacrifice from the light of nature, or the principles of reason, I confess myself unable to comprehend, with the most ignorant, how it can ever be grounded on any such principles, or justified by them. There exists no discernible connection between the one and the other. On the contrary, Nature has nothing to say for such an expiatory power, and Reason every thing to say against it. For that the life of a brute creature should ransom the life of a man; that its blood should have any virtue to wash away his sin, or purify his conscience, or redeem his penalty; or that the involuntary sufferings of a being, itself unconscious and irrational, should have a moral efficacy to his benefit, or pardon, or be able to restore him with God;—these are things repugnant to the sense of reason, incapable of being brought into the scale of the first ideas of nature, and contradictory to all genuine religion, natural and revealed. For as to the remission of sin, it is plainly altogether within the prerogative of God—an act of his mere mercy; and since it is so, every thing relating to the conveyance and the sanction, the possession and the security, of it, can spring only from his appointment. Reason teaches repentance as a preliminary condition to the hope of pardon; but reason can do no more. External rites, merely human, whether rites of sacrifice or any other, may exhibit the repentance, but they cannot rise above the efficacy of that inward act which they exhibit. They cannot supply the shortness, or cure the infirmity, or satisfy the doubt, of its pretensions. The human instruments are here infinitely unequal to the end proposed. They may speak the suppliant suing for pardon; they can never speak the suppliant absolved. And though mere natural reason, when best informed, may not always have thought justly, or argued soberly, on the subject of repentance, we may confidently assert that one of its last resources would have been, that of adopting the blood of a victim, as the positive remedy for the guilt of moral transgression. If, therefore, the primitive age had its expiatory sacrifices, sacrifices framed according to this standard, it would be difficult to account for them as rational rites; still more difficult to think that under the palpable incapacity of their human origin they could have been accepted by God. No; expiatory sacrifice must have been of God’s own appointment, to reconcile it either to God, or to man himself, till he was fallen under a deplorable superstition.’²⁷

6. These conclusions, as just as forcibly expressed, render it essential to the system to which they belong, to evince, that in the primitive religion no expiatory or atoning virtue is ascribed to sacrifice. This is sought to be accomplished by an appeal to the Scripture history, where it is observed, that in the offerings of Abel, in the sacrifice of Noah, and in the oblations of the patriarchs, the sacrificial worship is given with the utmost simplicity of description. The altar is raised, the oblation is brought, and the victim is sacrificed; but with what notions, with what specific intent, is not defined. This, it is conceived, becomes more apparent by contrasting it with the different scene which meets our view on turning to the Mosaic law: ‘For the life of the flesh is in the blood, and I have given it to you, upon the altar, to make an atonement for your soul. For it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul.’ I.e. 17:11. This doctrine of the atoning power of blood, the writers whom we are noticing think to be a new doctrine, and one of which we find no positive information, nor any probable vestige in the primeval religion; and it is from disregarding this distinction, they assert, and from viewing primitive sacrifice through the law of Moses, that many writers have been led into erroneous notions of the nature and character of sacrifice in its first usage.²⁸ It, at least, admits of a question, however, whether Mr. Davison has substantiated his idea, that no expiatory virtue was annexed to primitive sacrifice; whether, if the permission to eat animal food was subsequent to the deluge, man could have any right over the life of the creature, and, by consequence, any right to offer an animal sacrifice; whether the declaration, that ‘unto Adam, and to his wife, did the Lord God make coats of skins, and clothed them’ (Ge. 3:21), do not imply that, as it cannot be supposed God would permit the taking away of the lives of animals merely for clothing, the grant of animal food not being given till the flood, the skins could be no other than those of animals slain in sacrifice—we shall not attempt to determine. It is obvious to remark, however, that if the rite of sacrifice be contrary to the dictates of natural reason, as is here presumed, it probably had some other source; but if it be consonant with reason, it may nevertheless have been instituted by a divine command. It would be absurd to reject the claim of a divine origin merely on the ground of conscientiousness with the natural dictates of human reason. Though Abp. Magee and many others contend for the unreasonableness of piacular sacrifice, there are some of a different opinion, who deem it irreverent to suppose that the Deity would adopt a rite on account of its being contrary to human reason, and yet contend, with equal zeal, for its divine origin. After all, the natural reasonableness or unreasonableness of sacrifice is a subject upon which the human mind is scarcely competent to form a judgment, without a knowledge of the whole scheme of Providence in the redemption of the world—which we neither have nor can have.²⁹

7. It is a matter of still higher moment to investigate the grounds which have been alleged for the divine institution of sacrifice; but we can only advert to Archbishop Magee’s main arguments, which are laid, (1) In certain notions respecting the nature and object of Abel’s faith; (2) In a corrected version of the text relating to Cain, Ge. 4:7; (3) In the testimony of the divine acceptance granted to the sacrifices of Abel and others; (4) In a comparison of the sacrifice of Abel with that of Christ (He. 12:24); and, (5) In some general reflections which represent the primitive and the Mosaic worship as united in a common system. Of these the text relating to Cain is of great importance: ‘If thou dost well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou dost not well, sin lieth at the door;’ where the clause in Italics is rendered by Abp. Magee, ‘a sin-offering lieth at the door; i. e. to make an atonement with, if thy deeds are evil.’ This construction of the passage, first proposed by Lightfoot, has been espoused by Kennicott, Pilkington, Parkhurst, Faber, Boothroyd, Dr. Adam Clarke, and others. The chief grounds upon which it rests are, (1) The grammatical structure; for the chattath, though feminine, is here connected with the masculine verb rebetz, which is perfectly consistent with the supposition that it denotes a sin-offering; & and, (2) The peculiar force of the verb rebetz, which strictly implies couching, or lying down as a beast. Against the argument founded upon this passage the opponents of the doctrine have contended in vain: it remains impervious to all their assaults.

8. The passage in He. 12:24, so often appealed to as confirmatory of the divine origin of sacrifice, is, if possible, of still greater weight in the argument: ‘And to Jesus, the Mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel.’ The comparison which is here made, is understood by the advocates of the divine appointment of sacrifice to be between the sacrifice offered by Abel and that of Christ; not between the blood of Abel himself and that of the Redeemer. If this construction of the passage be the true one—and the arguments by which Abp. Magee supports it seem unanswerable—then there must be a correspondence of nature in the two sacrifices; and consequently that of Abel was an expiatory one; which, of course, implies a divine appointment.

9. The doctrinal evidence by which the divine institution of sacrifice is thought to be evinced, is briefly this: ‘What is not commanded by God, cannot be a worship acceptable unto Him.’ For, 1st, the worshipper cannot render it in faith, since ‘faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God’ (Ro. 10:17); and, 2dly, there is a sentence of reprobation pronounced in Scripture upon ‘will-worship,’ the mere invention of human reason. Col. 2:23. In the strength of these objections to all voluntary institutions of religion, there is thought to be contained the valid conclusion that sacrifice must have been God’s own ordinance, to render it capable of his approbation. In meeting this argument, Mr. Davison, as the champion of the opposite theory, seems to allow too much merit to spontaneous piety. God’s will is the only measure of right and wrong in all moral actions; and, if He have given us a revelation, it must contain every thing essential; otherwise it would be an imperfect revelation. But we are not to suppose that a special commandment is given for every pious office, that every instance of moral and religious duty must be made a matter of positive revelation. Leading truths, and general principles, are alone declared; while the application is left to the sober judgment of men. The law of nature and of reason is also confirmed by the Holy Scriptures; so that it becomes a co-existent rule of duty, and whatever is sanctioned by it, is for that reason obligatory upon the conscience. There is, nevertheless, a broad line of distinction between duties so sanctioned and duties commanded in the sacred writings: they are both binding, but binding upon different grounds; and though it is a palpable error to reject the obligation of the law of nature, it is equally so to place it, in a religious point of view, on the same footing with the law of revelation. If the Bible, and the Bible alone, be the religion of Protestants, every thing entitled to the epithet ‘religious,’ must be founded on the Bible. [Comp. note T. L. 16.] Actions may be fit, may be expedient, may be required from other considerations; but if they be not founded on the Bible, they cannot be called Christian duties. It is dangerous to hold up any practice, not authorized by revelation, as a religious duty; a moral one it may be, and, as such, binding upon the conscience; but to enforce it on religious grounds, is to open a door for all the inventions of Papal will-worship. As no article of Christian faith, so no branch of Christian practice, is to be received as such, unless it can be proved by certain warranty of Holy Writ; not indeed always enjoined by a positive enactment, but sometimes deduced by inferential reasoning, yet in all cases resting on the fundamental truths and principles of religion. Supposing, however, that there may be acceptable religious services without a positive revelation; and supposing, further, that the Scripture has no where authorized us to treat peculiar sacrifices as shut out from acceptance, simply because they might not be commanded and instituted by a revelation, — it may be doubted whether this will meet the exigencies of the case before us. The stress of the argument built upon the divine acceptance of the patriarchal sacrifices, appears to be, not that they could by no means have been acceptable without a divine command, but that their being accepted is presumptive evidence of such a command. With respect to Abel’s sacrifice, for instance, it is more probable, from the very circumstance of its being approved by the Almighty, that it was an act of obedience to a sacred direction, than a spontaneous offering. Thought to assert, with Abp. Magee, that the early sacrifices could not have received the divine approbation without the authority of a divine institution,* may be to transgress the limits of our knowledge, yet does not such approbation highly favor the notion of their divine institution?

Sept., which is the term the apostle uses in 2 Co. 5:21, ‘He hath made Him to be in hamartian, a sin-offering for us, who knew no sin.’ Cain’s fault now was his not bringing a sin-offering when his brother brought one; and this neglect and contempt caused his other offering to be rejected. However, God now graciously informs him, that, though he had miscarried, his case was not yet desperate, as the means of faith, from the promise, &c., were in his power, and a victim proper for a sin-offering was lying (rebetz), a word used to express the lying down of a quadruped) at the door of his fold.’

10. Another very important passage is He. 11:4 — ‘By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts; and by it, he, being dead, yet speaketh.’ Here it is argued that the apostle declares ‘faith’ to be the reason why Abel offered a more acceptable sacrifice than Cain. Now, faith has always relation to some revealed communication of God: without some revelation granted, some assurance as to the object of faith, Abel could not have exercised this virtue. The object of this faith cannot be conceived to be any other than the great Deliverer promised in the seed of the woman; and therefore the offering of Abel was the ordained manifestation of his faith in the promise of a Messiah. It is at least beyond the reach of controversy, that Abel’s offering was ‘by faith;’ and as this virtue cannot be exercised without something revealed as the object of it, his offering must have testified his belief in that object, and therefore must have been in obedience to a divine appointment. Hence it is inferred, that sacrifice had its origin in divine institution. Such is the mode of argument pursued by those who ascribe sacrifice to a sacred original. They aver that the most probable ground of the acceptance of Abel’s sacrifice is, that it testified his ‘faith in the Messiah;’ which it could not do, except it were the instituted means of testifying a belief in the promised Deliverer. Cain most have had a general belief that his sacrifice would be approved by the Almighty, or he would not have offered it at all; consequently this general faith could not be that which rendered Abel’s sacrifice acceptable. It must, then, have been a distinctive faith; and if the promise of mercy in the Messiah was revealed to the first pair, it seems the natural conclusion that Abel’s offering was approved, because it was in obedience to that revelation.

11. It is thought, by the opponents of the doctrine here indicated, that the human beginnings of sacrificial worship could not disqualify it for a place in the ordinances of the Levitical law, unless the rite itself was founded in some error of belief or obliquity of practice; that to suppose God would proscribe sacrifices merely on account of their human reason, would be equivalent to the supposition that he must proscribe the essential duties of thankfulness and penitence from which they proceeded; that if superstition had corrupted sacrifice before the institution of the law, that previous corruption would not of necessity bring a stigma upon the whole use of a rite which the wisdom of God might adapt to his purposes; that if sacrifice had degenerated from its simplicity, the first institution of it could make no difference in the propriety of its subsequent adoption; that as the Mosaic religion was preparatory to Christianity, many things would for that reason acquire a fitness and use which they would not otherwise have; and that the typical and symbolic purport of sacrifice renders it a fit instrument of God’s worship beyond the power of all human abuse to disable and discredit its adoption into his law.

12. With respect to the essential doctrine of the gospel, it is argued, that those who have resisted the human origin of sacrifice, in the fear lest they should forfeit the proper doctrine of Christianity connected with this rite, have not sufficiently distinguished its twofold character; that God’s revelation was in the atonement, and man’s discovery in the guilt; that the coincidence which obtains between the act of sacrifice on the part of man, and the method of redemption on the part of God, is not the consequence of God’s adaptation of his method to man’s worship, nor of man’s previous knowledge of God’s design, but of his own constitution of things; that the real atonement of the gospel is rescued from dishonor by a just consideration of the defective nature of sacrifice, so long as it remains the mere creation of human reason; and that, therefore, the legal atonements, inasmuch as they are the legal signs of the Christian one (and that is their true specific character), are far above any collision with the mere human rites, as the Christian sacrifice itself is above all competition with them. Against this it is to be observed, however, that if the divine institution of sacrifice be taken away, the rite thereby forfeits its prophetic character; it becomes simply a branch of the primitive religion; in which reduced idea of it, however it might express the piety of the worshipper, it cannot be reckoned among the typical signatures of Christianity; for though the action of sacrifice was in either case the same, not so the force of it. What God had not ordained, could not, under its institution, merely human, serve afterwards to attest the design, or confirm the truth, or explicate the sense, of any of his special appointments, so far removed from the reach of all human cognizance as that of the evangelical atonement. This is admitted even by Mr. Davison himself; though it is difficult to reconstruct the position with his theory.

13. Some importance is attached to the fact, that no disclosure was made in the primitive times of a connection between the rite of sacrifice and the future expiatory sacrifice of the gospel; but to this it may be replied, that there may be a connection of this kind, without any such disclosure having been then made. The connection between the two could be no less real, though it only became apparent by the reflected light of Christianity. It is, moreover, not necessary to the theory of the divine appointment to contend that the particular relation of that rite to the sacrifice of Christ was made known in the patriarchal ages. It is enough if the typical and representative character of sacrifice was then so far understood as to be generally an exercise of faith in the promise of redemption. ‘There is nothing improbable (says Magee) even in the supposition that that part of the signification of the rite which related to the sacrifice of Christ, might have been, in some degree, made known from the beginning. But not to contend for this (Scripture having furnished no express foundation for the assumption), room for the exercise of faith is equally preserved, on the idea that animal sacrifice was enjoined in the general, as the religious sign of faith in the promise of redemption, without any intimation of the way in which it became a sign.’†

14. Such are the principal arguments on either side of this interesting question. We have merely indicated their character and weight, and refer to the respective works already mentioned, for full and satisfactory discussion of its several parts.

11. Under the Mosaic economy, every thing pertaining to sacrifice was prescribed and regulated with the most minute particularity; and any deviation from the sacred order was punished with great rigor.

1. The first thing relating to this subject has reference to the various kinds of sacrifice offered under the Levitical law. Michaelis, whose division has been adopted by many subsequent writers, divides these sacrifices into three sorts, viz. bloody and unbloody sacrifices, and drink-offerings.‡ But this distinction is defective, inasmuch as it excludes those oblations which in some measure partook of the nature of sacrifices, without being wholly such. We shall adopt the more comprehensive division, therefore, of animal sacrifices, and meat and drink-offerings.

2. There were but 5 kinds of animals accepted as sacrifices by the Mosaic law; viz. bullocks, sheep, goats, turtle-doves, and young pigeons. Of these animals the most careful selection was to be made. Nothing ‘blind, or broken, or maimed, or having a wen or scurvy, or scabbed,’ nor ‘that which was bruised, or crushed, or broken, or cut,’ could lawfully be brought to the altar. Le. 22:22-24. The prohibition also extended to such animals as had any disproportion in their members, whether of excess or defect. Indeed, the Jews consider the blemishes just enumerated as being only a sample of those which disqualified an animal for a sacrificial victim; and Maimonides has reckoned up 50 of this sort, in his De Ratione Sacrificii. Every animal, therefore, before it was brought to the altar, was diligently examined. It must be added, that no animal procured either by the price of a dog, or by whoredom, could be offered to God (De. 23:18); it being impossible that there should be any value in sacrifices procured by such base means. Of those animals destined for the altar, the age also was to be taken into the account. None were to be offered that were not 8 days old (Le. 22:27), and the Jews considered it as absolutely unlawful to offer old cattle. In sacrificing birds, no selection of sex was enjoined; but the victims chosen from cattle consisted sometimes of males, sometimes of females, according to the nature of the sacrifice and the circumstances of the offerer. The peace-offerings of individuals were both males and females. The victims offered for the whole congregation (to whatever class of sacrifices they belonged), all the burnt-offerings, all trespass-offerings, and all sin-offerings for a ruler or high-priest, were to be males; but the sin-offering of a private individual was required to be a female lamb or kid. Le. ch. 4:6

3. Dr. Clarke supposes that some such custom of sealing the victim after it had been selected, prevailed among the Jews, as among the nations contiguous to them.

§ Outram’s Dissertation on Sacrifices, Diss. i. c. 3.

After quoting a passage from Herodotus, in order to show the method of selecting and sealing the white bull sacrificed to Apis in Egypt, he remarks: 'The Jews could not be unacquainted with the rites and ceremonies of the Egyptian worship; and it is possible that such precautions as these were in use among themselves; especially as they were so strictly enjoined to have their sacrifices without spot and without blemish.' In allusion sion to this custom it is, he supposes, that our Lord says of Himself, 'Him hath God the Father sealed.' Jn.6.27. Infinite Justice found Jesus Christ to be without spot or blemish, and therefore sealed, pointed out, and accepted Him as a proper sacrifice and atonement for the sin of the whole world. Collate with this passage He. 7:26,27,28; Ep.5:27; 2 Pe. 3:14; and especially He. 9:13,14. 'For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of a heifer, sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth — how much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the Eternal Spirit offered Himself without spot to God, purge your consciences from dead works? ¹⁷*

III. Having noticed the animals used in sacrifice, we proceed to consider the several kinds of offerings to which they were devoted; beginning with,

Burnt-Offering of the Third.

I. Burnt-offerings. The reason of this name is given in Le. 6:9, and the Hebrew word for them is calut, or sacrifices which ascend in flame or smoke. They were either intended to expiate the evil thoughts of the heart, by the faith of the offerer looking to the Messiah as the great atonement, or to expiate the breach of admittive precepts. The burnt-offering was a very expressive type of the sacrifice of Christ; as nothing less than his complete and full sacrifice could make atonement for the sin of the world. In most other offerings, the priest, and then the offerer, had a share, but in the whole burnt-offering all was given to God. This sacrifice might be offered of any of the 5 kinds of animals above specified; and the manner of offering it was as follows: During the time that the tabernacle stood, the offerer brought his victim to the door of the tabernacle, 'before the Lord' (Le. 1:3); but when the temple was erected, this phrase was interpreted to mean the court of Israel, and especially of the priests. So indispensable was the appearance of the offerer, with his sacrifice, before the Lord, that even women, who were forbidden the court of Israel at all other times, were obliged to enter it when they presented a burnt-offering. The offerer, leaving brought his sacrifice, laid his hands upon its head, and repeated the usual solemn prayer. This was intended as a transfer of sin from himself to the animal, and as a solemn acknowledgment of his own liability to suffer. Le. 1:4. What a striking type of the great atonement is observable in this transaction! The divinely-appointed victim, Christ, bore our sins,

There is a very striking allusion to this sacrificial rite, in 2 Ti. 4:6, where the apostle, seeing his impending fate, and anticipating Timotheus' near approach, says, "I am now ready to be offered"—poured out as a libation, as the blood at the foot of the altar; "and the time of my departure is at hand." The same expressive sacrificial term occurs in his Epistle to the Philippians: "Yea, though I be offered upon the service and sacrifice of your faith, I joy and rejoice with you all" (2:17); in

³ There is a very striking allusion to this sacrificial rite, in 2 Th. 4:6; where the apostle, seeing his impending fate, and intimating its near approach, says, 'I am now ready to be offered'—poured out as a libation, as the blood at the foot of the altar; 'and the time of my departure is at hand.' The same expressive sacrificial term occurs in the Epistle to the Philippians, v. 18: 'And I beseech you, brethren, for the confession of the Philippians as a sacrifice, and his blood as a libation poured forth to follow and consecrate it; for which, on account of his willingness to shed his blood in the cause of Christianity, which they had espoused, he rejoiced and congratulated them all; and, adds he, 'do you rejoice and congratulate me on the same account.' the whole of the carcass, after the fat and inwards had been burnt, belonged to the priest. Le. 6:24-29. We must not forget, while treating of the sin-offering, that our Savior is often spoken of under that character, particularly in Ro. 8:3. 2 Co. 5:21. He. 9:23. Indeed, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, sin-offerings are clearly applied as types of Christ: 'For the bodies of those beasts, whose blood was brought into the sanctuary by the high-priest for sin, were burnt without the camp; wherefore Jesus also, that He might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate.' He. 12: 11,12. (See Magee on the Aton. vol. i.)

Sin Offering of the Congregation.

3. Trespass-offerings were of two kinds; doubtful and undoubted. The former were offered in cases where the consciences of the offerers surmised that they had committed a sin, while their understandings were in doubt; the latter, like most other pictorial sacrifices, were appointed for the purgation of certain corporal impurities, as well as for the expiation of trespasses, properly so called. The cases in which they were offered were 5; viz. for things stolen, unjustly gotten or detained; for sacrilege; for violating the chastity of a bondmaid; for a Nazarite; and for a leper. Le. 6:2-7. Nu. 5: 5-8. Le. 5:16. 19:20-22. Nu. 6:2-21. Le. 14:12. The person who brought the sacrifice placed his hands on the head of the animal, between the horns, and confessed his sins, saying, 'I have sinned, I have done iniquity, I have trespassed, and done thus and thus (specifying the sin of which he had been guilty), and do return by repentance before Thee, and with this I make atonement.' The animal was then considered as vicariously bearing the sins of the persons who presented it. The reader will recollect that our Lord is said (Is. 53:10) to have had his soul made 'an offering for sin'; where the very same word is used as is put for the trespass-offering. It is difficult to define the difference between the two classes of sins for which the two last-mentioned offerings were presented; viz. sins and trespasses. But whatever this difference consisted in, there were several points of difference between the sacrifices respectively designated by these terms. The sex of the victims, and the rites to be performed in the trespass-offerings, were altogether different from those prescribed for the sin-offerings. The former always consisted of rams and he-lambs, which were never used for the latter. The blood of the sin-offering was to be put on the horns of the altar (Le. 4:7,18,23,30), and that of the trespass-offering was to be sprinkled on the sides of the altar. 7.2. Sin-offerings, also, as we have seen, were offered for the whole congregation; but trespass-offerings were only required from individuals. These two kinds of sacrifices had this point of resemblance, that they were considered as legitimately offered, only in compliance with the express command of the law; neither was ever admitted as a votive or voluntary oblation: that was peculiar to peace-offerings and burnt-sacrifices.

4. Peace-offerings comprehended thankofferings, free-will offerings, and offerings made in consequence of vows. Le. 7:12-16. The Hebrew word used for these denotes, as Dr. Clarke remarks, to complete, or make whole; because by them that which was lacking was considered as being made up; and that which was broken — the covenant of God by his creature's transgression — was supposed to be made whole. So that after such an offering, the sincere and conscientious mind had a right to consider that the breach was made up between God and it, and that it might lay confident hold on the covenant of peace. To this the apostle evidently alludes in Ep. 2:11-19 — 'He is our peace (i. e. our peace-offering) who has made both one, and broken down the middle wall; having abolished in his flesh the enmity,' &c. (See the whole passage.) The common offerings in such cases were, either a he or a she calf, a he or a she lamb, or a goat (Le. 3:1,6,12), accompanied by the proper meat-offering. They were to be without blemish for vows and thank-offerings (22:18-22); but a free-will offering might be either lacking or superfluous in its parts, v. 22. Whichever kind of them was brought, the offerer laid his hand upon its head as an acknowledgment of guilt; after which it was killed before the tabernacle of the congregation; its blood was sprinkled on the altar round about; the fat, the kidneys, the caul, and the rump, if it was a lamb, being burnt on the altar (3:1-5); the breast, after it was waved, and the shoulder, after it was heaved, became the property of the priests (7:31-34); and the rest of the victim was eaten by the offerer, under the restrictions laid down in Le. 7:19-21. 22:30. 19:5-8. The peace-offering for the whole congregation was made only once a year — at the feast of pentecost, when two lambs composed the sacrifice. The peace-offerings of individuals were of three kinds; viz. those offered without bread; those offered with bread; and the peace-offerings of the Nazarites, about which there were some peculiarities. See Nu. 6:15-20. Le. 7:31,32.

5. Among the eucharistic oblations may also be placed the firstlings and the tithes. After the preservation of the first-born in Egypt, God declared that, in memory of so singular a benefit, every first-born male, both of man and beast, should thenceforward be devoted to Him. Nu. 3:13. All male firstlings of beasts fit for the altar were to be sacrificed (Ex. 13:15. Nu. 18:17); and all male first-born children were to be redeemed by 5 shekels of money paid to the priests. Nu. 3:47. This law is considered by the Jews as having no reference to the tribe of Levi, because all the males of that tribe were constantly devoted to the service of the sanctuary. The firstling of an ass was to be redeemed by the substitution of a lamb, or, that no one might derive any benefit from the sacrifice, his neck was to be broken. Ex. 13:13. The flesh of every firstling brought to the altar was wholly allotted to the priests. Nu. 18:17,18. But if any firstling happened to have a blemish, it was not to be brought to the altar as a sacrifice, but to be given to the priests; and it was allowed to be eaten any where, not only by the priests themselves, but also by any other persons. De. 15:21,22. To the same order of sacrifices must also be referred those victims selected as the tithe of lambs, kids, and calves. Le. 27:32. The tenth of the herd and of the flock was every year to be devoted to the Lord, as a kind of thank-offering for all the advantages derived from cattle. It was to be solemnly offered to the Lord; if it happened to have any blemish, it might lawfully be eaten any where, but was not to be redeemed with money, nor to be exchanged for any other animal. But whatever was its condition, the whole of the flesh (so Maimonides) belonged to the proprietor, and no part of it to the priests.

IV. The general uses of these sacrifices were, (1) As an acknowledgment of receiving all their good things from the hand of God, and of his right in the whole of that of which they offered Him a part; though to make this act the more significant and expressive, it was a part of almost every thing they had. — (2) To be a means of repentance and humiliation for sin, of the desert of which they were reminded by the suffering and death of the victim substituted in their room, and suffering in their stead. — (3) To typify that promised sacrifice of which the Son of God was to offer in due time, and to assist their faith in Him.* Their political use we have noted.

V. The meat-offerings (mincha).

1. These offerings were composed of wheaten or barley flour; some with, and others without, the addition of wine. They were all to be mixed with oil, and invariably to be connected with some kind of victims, except in the case of the person who had sinned being so poor that he could not purchase two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, for an offering. The victims which God required to be always accompanied with meat-offerings were all the burnt-offerings of the whole congregation, with all those of individuals, and the peace-offerings selected from the flock or the herd; but none taken from birds, except when they were substituted for a quadruped; nor any sin-offerings, except those offered by a purified leper. Nu. 15:2, &c. 28:29. Le. 14:10,31. The following are the portions prescribed for the meat-offerings: — For bullocks, three tenths of an ephah of fine flour mingled with half a hin of oil; for rams, two tenths of an ephah of fine flour, mingled with a third part of a hin of oil; and for goats and female sheep, as well as for lambs and kids, both male and female, only one tenth of an ephah of fine flour, mingled with the fourth of a hin of oil. Nu. ch. 15. These were the general directions; but in Le. 23:10-13, we find that the lamb to be offered on the same day as the sheaf of the first-fruits was to be accompanied with two tenths of an ephah of fine flour; and in ch. 11:10, we find a log ordered for three tenth deals in the meat-offering of the leper; and in v. 21, a log of oil is ordered to but one tenth deal of fine flour, in the case of those lepers who were poor. The meat-offerings unaccompanied with any libations of wine were either for the whole congregation of Israel, or for particular persons. Those of the former kind were three; the omer, or sheaf of first-fruits waved before the Lord, the two loaves ordered on the day of pentecost; and the loaves called the show-bread.

2. The omer of first-fruits was offered on the 16th day of the month Nisan, before the wheat had grown to a full ear, and before which it was not lawful for any person to taste the new corn. Previous to the offering up of the first-fruits, all was unclean; afterwards, all was holy; and to this Paul alludes in Ro. 11:16 — 'If the first-fruit be holy, the lump is also holy.' These first-fruits were considered as giving a public and joyful assurance that the general harvest would soon be gathered in. How beautiful and striking is the same apostle's allusion to the ceremony of presenting this oblation, in 1 Co., in which place he argues and establishes the doctrine of a general resurrection, from the fact of the resurrection of Christ, as the first-fruits of them that slept! 'Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept.' 15:20. 'Christ the first-fruits — afterwards they that are Christ's.' v. 23. By raising Him, the head and representative of Christian believers, from the dead, and conducting Him in glorious triumph, as the first-fruits were publicly conducted through the streets of Jerusalem, from the grave to immortality, God has announced to the whole world, that his power, in like manner, will be displayed in reanimating all the dead, and at the consummation of all things, gathering into his eternal mansion a universal harvest of all the saints.† After the omer of barley had been waved before the Lord, a part of it was consumed on the altar, and the rest given to the priests. Le. 23:15-17.

3. The two loaves offered on the day of pentecost contained a tenth of an ephah each, made of the flour of new wheat, and were a thanksgiving for the bounties of the harvest which had been just gathered in. They were waved before the altar, and given entirely to the priests, it not being lawful to burn on the altar any thing containing leaven. Le. 7:13,14.

4. The show-bread, literally the bread of faces, so called from its position on the sacred table, in the outer sanctuary, where it was 'set in order before the Lord,' or 'before the faces of Jehovah,' was made of fine wheaten flour, two tenths of an ephah being allotted to each cake. The loaves were twelve in number, and were placed on the golden table, in two rows, six in a row, and pure frankincense put upon each row. They were to be removed and replaced by fresh ones every Sabbath-day, when the removed ones were given to the priests, and the frankincense was burnt on the great altar. Le. 24:5-9. It is more difficult to ascertain the use of these, and what they represented, than almost any other emblem in the whole Jewish economy. Dr. Cudworth's opinion seems to be the most rational; viz. that with the other meat and drink offerings, and the furniture of the tabernacle and temple, it was designed to show the Jews that God had in an extraordinary manner taken up his residence among them, these things forming part of his establishment as king of Israel.‡

5. The meat-offerings for particular persons were as follow: — (1) The daily meat-offering of the high-priest; half which was offered in the morning, and the other half at night. Le. 6:20-22. (2) The meat-offering of initiation, which was offered by each priest on his entrance into office, and which was wholly burnt. (3) The sinner's meat-offering, or that substituted by a poor man for a sin-offering. Le. 5:11. (4) The jealousy meat-offering, or the offering brought with the suspected wife. Nu. 5:15. It is worthy of notice, that this and the meat-offering of the first-fruits of the barley-harvest were the only offerings which were of barley: all the other kinds being of wheat. (5) The meat-offering of fine flour unbaked, which was prepared by pouring oil and frankincense upon it. I.e. 2:1-3. (6) The meat-offering made in the oven, which was either unleavened cakes of fine flour mingled with oil, or unleavened wafers anointed with oil. v. 4. (7) The meat-offering baked in a pan, which was fine flour unleavened, mingled with oil, separated in pieces, on each of which was poured oil. v. 5, 6. (8) The meat-offering made in a frying-pan, and which was fine flour mingled with oil. v. 7. (9) The wafers baked in the oven, which are clasped with the cakes above, in No. 6. (10) The offerings of first-fruits by individuals at the feast of pentecost. With all the meat-offerings duly presented, salt was to be used (Le. 2: 13), and, according to the Jews, was to be sprinkled on the offerings when laid on the altar. Salt possesses an agreeable savor, and the quality of preserving food from putrefaction: hence a durable covenant is called 'a covenant of salt.' Nu. 23:13; 2 Ch. 13:5.^f But no heaven, nor honey, was allowed in any offering. The latter was offered to Bacchus, among the heathen; and also to the infernal deities and departed heroes.^g

6. To the offerings that have been specified we must add, (1) The oblations of incense that used to be made in the temple; for though they are not usually classed with the meat-offerings, they must, nevertheless, be numbered with those sacrifices which were to be selected from inanimate things, and to be solemnly burnt in the service of God. The manner of offering this has been already noticed in treating of the service of the temple. We need only add, that it represented the prayers of the people, while the priest, presenting them to God in the temple, prefigured Christ, now in the heavenly sanctuary, commanding to God the prayers of the saints. See Re. 5:3, 33:4. (2) The tithes of all the fruits of the earth, paid by every Israelite, and which Jerome divides into 4 sorts: Such as were paid to the Levites by the people, who were forbidden to eat any of their fruits till this had been paid, on pain of death; such as were paid by the Levites to the priests; such as were reserved for the banquets made within the precincts of the temple, to which the priests and Levites were invited; and such as were paid every 3 years for the support of the poor. See Nu. 13:21. Le. 27:30. De. 14:22, 23. Ne. 13:5, 10, §.

7. The rule prescribed in the law for preparing and presenting meat-offerings was this: They were to be brought to the priest, who carried them to the altar, took a handful from each of them, as an oblation, salted it, and burnt it upon the altar. The remaining part became the property of the priesthood, and was eaten by those whose lot it was to serve. Le. 22:3, 9, 10. 6:14-18. 10: 12, 13.

VI. The drink-offerings were nothing more than a certain quantity of wine, proportioned to the nature of the sacrifice they accompanied. After the sacrifice and the meat-offering were laid on the fire, the drink-offering was taken by the priest, and poured out like the blood, at the foundation of the altar, or around its top.^h

VII. In closing this summary account of the Jewish sacrifices and oblations, we may notice the inducements to pay them, by those liable, and the time when they became due. The inducements to render these sacrifices and oblations, by those who were liable, were twofold — conscience and penalty. If the first prevailed not, the second was enforced, where the offence was known, and generally consisted in whipping. The time when they became due was at the 1st of the 3 great festivals, which occurred next after the time of contracting the obligation. This provision was most beneficial to those who lived at a distance from Jerusalem, and who otherwise would have been compelled to abandon their ordinary occupations, and, at very great expense and inconvenience, appear with their offerings 'in the place which Jehovah had chosen to put his name there'; for their offering could not be sent by the hand of another.ⁱ

VIII. To the incidental remarks already submitted on the typical nature of the Jewish sacrifices, we may add, from Outram, that the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews seems tacitly to compare all the different kinds of victims with the one sacrifice of Christ, as types with their antitype: 'Wherefore, when He cometh into the world, He saith, Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldest not, but a body hast Thou prepared Me: in burnt-offerings and sacrifices for sin Thou hast had no pleasure. Then said I, Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of Me) to do thy will, O God. Above, when He said, Sacrifice and offering, and burnt-offerings, and offerings for sin, Thou wouldest not, neither hadst pleasure therein (which are offered by the law); then said He, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God. He taketh away the first, that He may establish the second. By the which will we are sanctified by the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all.' He. 10:5-10.

The apostle certainly means (and the clause, 'He taketh away the first, that He may establish the second,' ascertains it beyond all doubt) that the sacrifice of Christ succeeded in the room of all the sacrifices which were 'offered by the law'; and hence it was, that when HIS SACRIFICE was accomplished, they all ceased. As the sacrifice of Christ, therefore, succeeded in the room of all the victims that were to be offered according to the law, and removed them from their place, and as it far excelled them all, it seems reasonable to consider them all as types of this sacrifice, and this one sacrifice as the antitype of them all. For the mutual relation of type and antitype is sufficiently conspicuous in any two things of which the latter succeeds by divine appointment in the room of the former, possessing, moreover, that efficacy of which the former had only an image, or a very small degree; especially when there is so great a resemblance between those two things, as between all the Jewish victims and the sacrifice of Christ.^j ⁱ There is no doubt that the heathen borrowed their custom of offering meat and drink-offerings from the Hebrew ritual. The salted meal (meat-offerings) which they added to their victims, and which used also to be accompanied with wine, is thus referred to by Virgil: 'And now the dreadful day was arrived; the preparations to sacrifice me were commenced, and the salted meal was ready.' — Aen. ii. 132. Servius's explanation is, 'Salt and barley, called salted meal, with which they used to sprinkle the forehead of the victim, the sacrificial fire, and the knives.' After the salted meal, it was also customary to pour wine on the head of the victim, which, by that ceremony, was said to be meata or magis aucta, augmented or more increased. This ceremony is thus referred to by Ovid: 'Goat, gnaw the vine; yet its produce will be sufficient to be poured upon thy horns, when thou shalt stand before the altar.' — Fast. I. i. It is likewise introduced as part of the sacrificial process by Virgil: 'Here, first, the priestess places four black bullocks, and pours wine on their foreheads.' — Aen. iv. 60. Dr. Harwood supposes that there is no allusion to this practice in 2 Ti. 4:6. But that is hardly probable, as the Jews did not thus dispose of the drink-offering; besides which, Parkhurst says he can find no example in which the word here used by the apostle signifies to have a libation pointed out upon it, as a victim going to be sacrificed. BIBLICAL HISTORY, GEOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, ARTS, AND DOMESTIC USAGES

CHAPTER I.

HISTORY.

THE Bible is the highest source of historical knowledge, a clew to all other history, and contains, not merely the only authentic, but the only clear and consistent, account of the remotest ages of the world; and that, too, communicated in a manner adapted to subserve the highest moral and religious purposes, inasmuch as it shows us how, in preparing mankind for another world, the universal Parent has dealt with individuals, with families, and with nations, in this: [and, further, in the prophetic parts of this wonderful book, the history of man is carried on to an eternity when time shall be no longer. And thus the Bible becomes the key to all of human history that ever has been or ever will be written.]

SECTION I.

BIBLICAL HISTORIOGRAPHY.

1. It may safely be averred, putting the question of inspiration altogether out of view, that the natural character of the sacred historians ranks them with the first of human beings. In point of grandeur and sublimity of conception, of the power of discrimination, of unaffected simplicity, of ingenuous disinterestedness, of unbending integrity, of successful execution, they are unrivaled; and it is only necessary to compare their productions with the most admired compositions of antiquity, to assign to them, unhesitatingly, the preference. From the enactments of Moses almost all legislation has been drawn, both as to principle and as to form; and where any departure from this grand outline is attempted, the change has been perceptibly for the worse; while the most elegant critic of the heathen world has produced the opening of his narrative, as the most striking specimen of the true sublime which could be presented. If sacred history be tried by the character of its narrators, it wears the marks of undoubted authenticity.

2. Let it be tried by the events narrated; another great criterion of history. What was to the philosopher a subject of speculation, giving birth to numberless and contradictory hypotheses, is to Moses simply a subject of history. The first sentence of his narrative unmasks the hidden and eternal cause, settles the disputes of philosophy, assumes the fact of the creation, declares the Creator, and proceeds to a detail of the circumstances attending the stupendous transaction: 'In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth;' a grandeur of expression not inferior, perhaps, to the celebrated passage so distinguished by Longinus. Around this revealed truth, as a central point, the scattered schemes of philosophy rally, correcting their errors, reconciling their differences, and contributing their researches; science finds the base upon which to place a fulcrum that can raise the world; history discovers the spring of the ever-flowing tide of time; and chronology, the punctum stans — the fixed, determinate, immovable point, whence all her dates are deduced, and to which all divisions of time are to be referred. This great fact being established, the historian proceeds briefly, yet distinctly, to enumerate the leading particulars of this operation; passes on to a consideration of man's primeval state; unfolds the facts attending his degradation, leading to the miseries to which he is exposed, and accounting for the thousand natural shocks that 'flesh is heir to.' The narrative thus instantly connects itself with the scheme chosen for his recovery, into which all other events necessarily resolve themselves; and the grand march of providence is distinctly visible through all the shadows of ages — from the chorus of the sons of God at the birth of nature, to the final shout of the archangel, and the trumpet which shall awaken the dead.

3. Traditions relative to the creation agree with the narrative of Moses in all essential points, and even in form, whatever speculations and fables may disfigure the simple account. Historians, and poets more ancient than historians, drew from this common source. Traditions of the fall are to be traced over all the east, and among the western nations; they traverse the north, and occupy the south; they have penetrated the wilds of America, and are planted in the islands of the Pacific Ocean: in truth, the forms of worship and observances added to these traditions, every where authenticate the Mosaic narrative; and from their universality, which would have been impossible had they not originated in fact, a sanction is given to sacred history which could scarcely have been expected, which is altogether unexceptionable, because it is indirect in its nature, and infinitely diversified in its form.

4. It is no small collateral proof of the truth of sacred history, that it furnishes a clew to many facts which, although known, could not have been understood without its assistance. It serves to correct other historians; and in every instance in which the sacred writings and general history come into contact, it is to them what the chronometer is to the common watch — it measures the same period, but does it with superior precision; it relates the same events, but with greater accuracy. Still further, as the floating traditions of the heathen world bear upon the facts recorded in the Scriptures, so, by a reaction, sacred history develops the hidden import of many an ancient institution, the intention of which was not comprehended by those who lived under it, nor could it be otherwise understood; and gives consistency and reality to the traditions of antiquity. It brings distant occurrences to bear upon each other; it discloses political interests, jarring among themselves, all tending to the harmony of the universe, and the ultimate amelioration of the human race. It supplies, in short, to time, what gravity is to space — the principle which holds and draws every thing together.

5. If we examine the manner of narration, one of the most striking features of sacred history, which, while it demonstrates its authenticity, renders it invaluable, is the fidelity with which it relates occurrences offensive to the existing powers, and not always honorable to the historian himself. What a principle must that have been, which could thus absorb the prejudices of the writer, and induce him, with whatever painful feelings, to give his testimony alike against himself and his people! This faithfulness is especially exhibited in the biography, in which it is indeed difficult to be honest, more than in almost any other species of writing. Abraham, 'the friend of God,' shall be placed before us in all the pusillanimity of his equivocation, as well as in all the strength of his faith; — Balaam, the adversary of Israel, shall be delineated by the Jewish historian in all the intellectual grandeur of his mind; and his sins, and his talents, shall be given in the same clear, unruled, undisguised language. Unquestionably, the great object for which the whole narrative is placed before us, is to impress the claims of truth and virtue on the mind, and to win us to the path of wisdom by exhibiting its rewards. But the difficulties of a wise and virtuous course are not disguised. The total failures of some who have entered upon it; the partial failures of all; Cain, and Esau, and Lot's wife, and Balaam, and Saul, stand in faithful record of a total departure from what most men would have thought the fear of God; while the Scripture history of Noah and of Abraham, of Lot and of David, of Solomon and of Peter, as faithfully exhibits the temptations that have charms for us all, and the failures of God's most favored children. — The whole Bible breathes the same tone of noble frankness. One is constantly reminded of God, who 'CANNOT lie.'

6. There are peculiarities belonging to sacred history, so remote from every thing seen among men, and such an unearthly character is given to some of its relations of apparently ordinary concerns, that the most superficial observer can scarcely fail to distinguish it from every merely human production. Its true and faithful portraiture of our own nature, its appeal to the heart of the reader, alone suffices to establish this observation. There is a knowledge of the human heart, a master-key to its subtlest recesses, which not only surpasses human penetration in its origin, but astonishes while it terrifies the individual whose bosom is laid open to his own inspection; and who finds himself a stranger, where he had thought himself most at home. Perhaps this is a fact more striking than even its impartial delineation of the character of others; and, certainly, infinitely more important to us. Not a lurking passion is suffered to remain undetected in its living pictures. Motives which we should be ashamed to avow, are dragged before our conscience in the history of another; and while his sentence is passed, we feel a personal condemnation. This is, indeed, the true and highest use of history — to speak to the heart through the understanding; to make every character that is brought before us promote the formation and consolidation of our own.*

NOTATIONS OF TIME.

I. Divisions of Time: Days; Weeks; Months; Years.
II. The Computation of Time. III. General Chronology.
IV. Chronological Tables: Hebrew Cycles; Remarkable Eras; Empires, States, and Sovereigns connected with Scripture History; Sacred and Profane History, from the Creation to the Destruction of Jerusalem.

I. To understand the history of any people, we must obtain an acquaintance with their methods of computing time; and this is the more necessary with reference to the Jews, as they adopted two several years, i. e. civil and ecclesiastical.

I. The Hebrews, in common with other nations, distinguished their DAYS into natural and artificial: the former consisted of 24 hours, as the time employed by the earth in making a complete revolution round its axis; and the latter reached from sunrise to sunset. It has been thought that the Jews had formerly two different beginnings of the natural day; one of the sacred, or festival day, which was in the evening; the other of the civil day, which was in the morning. That the sacred day began in the evening, is certain from the command of Moses (Le. 23:32), "From even unto even shall ye celebrate your Sabbaths;" but it is not so certain that the civil day was reckoned from the morning. Jennings conjectures that before the departure out of Egypt, the Jews began all their days, both civil and sacred, with the sun's rising, as the ancient Babylonians, Persians, Syrians, and most of the Eastern nations did; and that, at the time of their emigration, God ordered them to change the beginning, not only of the year and of the week, but likewise of the day, that they might be distinguished from the idolatrous nations, who, in honor of their chief god, the sun, began the day at his rising.† With regard to the natural day, it is evident that it would vary in length with the season of the year. In Palestine, the longest day is about 14 hours 12 minutes; and the shortest, 9 hours 43 minutes. The civil day was at first divided into 3 parts, agreeably to the sensible difference of the sun, viz. morning, noon, and night; then into 4 parts (Ne. 9:3), which could be easily determined by the position of the sun in the horizon.‡ Afterwards it was divided into 12 equal parts, to which our Savior refers in Jn. 11:9. We have no means of ascertaining when this division of the day was first introduced among the Hebrews; the Greeks derived it from the Egyptians, and it is probable that the Jews borrowed it from the same source; but this is uncertain. The earliest mention we have of hours, in the O. T., is in the book of Daniel (4:19); but it is doubtful whether the word there used is not of too general a signification to prove this. The hours of the civil day were computed from 6 o'clock in the morning till 6 in the evening; and the term hour is sometimes used with great latitude, and denotes the space of time occupied by a whole watch. See Mat. 25:13; 26:40; Mk. 14:37; Lu. 22:59, &c. It appears from Jud. 7:19, that the night was originally divided in the same manner as the day, viz. into 3 parts, or watches; but this, perhaps from its inconvenience, was altered; for in the time of our Savior there were 4 watches included in this period of time (Mk. 13:35). EVEN, MIDNIGHT, CUCK-CROWING, and MORNING. The first watch was from 6 till 9; the second, from 9 to midnight; the third, from 12 to 3; and the fourth, from 3 to 6. We read in the law, that the paschal lamb was to be sacrificed "between the evenings" (Ex. 12:6); hence we see that the Jews had two evenings: the former began at the 9th hour, and the latter at the 11th hour. It has been remarked, that "Christ our passover," the antitype of the paschal lamb, expired at the 9th hour, and was taken down from the cross at the 11th hour, or sunset.§

2. The WEEK needs scarcely a remark. The Hebrews had weeks of years, the 7th of which was the sabbatical year; and also weeks of 7 years, the 49th of which was the year of jubilee.]

3. MONTHS. For these the ancient Hebrews had no particular names. They called them in their numerical order, first, second, third, &c. Under Solomon we read of the month Zif (1 K. 6:1), which is the 2d month of the ecclesiastical year, and answers to that afterwards called Jiar. We also hear of the month Bul (ibid.), which answers to Marchesvan; and of the month Ethanun (6:2), which corresponds with Tisri; but the origin of these names is uncertain. In the time of Moses, the months consisted of 30 days each; for he reckons 150 days from the 7th day of the 2d month to the 7th day of the 7th month, which makes an interval of 5 months, of 30 days each. In the time of the Maccabees the Jews followed the custom of the Grecians; i. e. the months were lunar. These lunar months were each of them 29 days, 12 hours, and 44 minutes; but for convenience they had one of 29 days, and the following one 30, and so on alternately: that which had 30 days was called a full and complete month; that which had but 29 days was called incomplete. The new moon was always the beginning of the month, and this day the Hebrews held as a sacred festival.¶

ulated, would soon have been in sad confusion, had they not taken some means to prevent it. This they did by intercalating a month every 3 years, after the 12th month, Adar, and which they called Ve-Adar—the second Adar. By this means their lunar year was made to equal the solar, because in 36 solar months there would be 37 lunar months; and the passover was always celebrated the 1st full moon after the equinox. But this arrangement of the Hebrew calendar, it should be observed, is made on the authority of the Jewish writers, who are not always the best guides, even in the affairs of their own nation. Their notation of the months has been implicitly followed by Christian critics and commentators, almost universally; but we believe it to be incorrect. According to their distribution of the months, the religious festivals could never have been observed at the stated times; the seasons of Palestine, on which they depended, not answering to that purpose.*

4. The civil year commenced with the month Tisri, because it was an old tradition that the world was created at that time. This is believed to be the same with the patriarchal year; and by it the Jews computed all their civil affairs. The sacred or ecclesiastical year commenced with the month Nisan, the 7th of the civil year, which was the time of their departure from Egypt; and all their religious matters were regulated by it. Lamy mentions two other Jewish years; viz. the year of cattle, which commenced with the month Eld, when the beasts were tilled, and the tenth paid to the Levites; and the year of trees, beginning with the month Shebeth, because they paid tithe-fruits of the trees which budded at that time.||

II. After the Babylonish captivity, the Jews complied with such methods of computing time as were used by the nations to whom they were subject—the Chaldeans, the Persians, and Grecians. They probably took the names of their months from the Chaldeans and Persians, and perhaps their manner of dividing the year and months also. But we cannot be sure of this, not knowing exactly the form of the Chaldean months.

1. It has been a custom with the Jews to reckon their years from some remarkable eras in their history, a knowledge of which is indispensable to avoid mistakes in their chronology. From Ge. 7:11, and 8:13, it seems they reckoned from the births of the patriarchs, i. e. of the most eminent characters among them; afterwards from the departure from Egypt (Nu. 33:38. 1 K. 6:1); then from the building of Solomon's temple (2 Ch. 8:1); and also from the reigns of their kings. See the Books of Kings and Chronicles throughout. In later times, the Babylonian captivity furnished them with a new epoch, whence they computed their time. See Ez. 33:21. 40:1. ¶ At the retaking of Babylon by Seleucus, A. A. C. 312, they adopted the era of the Seleucidae, called by them the era of contracts; because after they fell under the government of the Syro-Macedonian kings, they were forced to use it in all their contracts about civil affairs. When they were driven from the East, A. D. 1040, they adopted the era of the creation, which, according to their computation, is in the present year of the Christian era (1838). 5593. In writing, they generally contract this, by omitting the thousands, writing only 593. If to the Jewish year, then, as usually expressed by them, we add 1240, we get the year of the Christian era, as, 593+1240, gives 1833.

2. The Jews, after their dispersion, hav-

The vernal equinox falls between the 20th and 21st of March, according to the course of the solar year; but in the lunar year, the new moon will fall in the month of March, and the full moon in the month of April. So that the Hebrew (which are lunar) months will commonly answer to two of our solar months, the end of one and the beginning of the other. But as 12 lunar months make but 354 days, 8 hours, and 43 minutes, it is evident that the Jewish calendar, by which the sacred festivals were reg-

* Hence Daniel makes use of the compound term evening-morning (4:11); and hence, also, the use of the Greek term Nachthemeron, 2 Co. 11:25. But although this mode of computation began with the Jews, it was not confined to them; for the Phoenicians, Athenians, Numidians, Germans, Gauls, Druids, Bohearians, and Poles, did the same. — See Gruterus de Ver. Rel. I. i. 4, 16. In our own language we may trace the remains of this usage, where we compute by evening, and fortnight. ing no opportunities of regulating their feasts by the appearance of the moon, were obliged to have recourse to astronomical calculations and cycles. They at first employed a cycle of 84 years; but this being found defective, they had recourse to a cycle of 19 years, which had been invented by Meton, the illustrious Athenian philosopher, who flourished A. A. C. 432. The authority of this cycle was established by the rabbi Hillel Hannasi about A. D. 360, and the Jews say it is to be observed till the coming of the Messiah.*

3. The editor of Calmet has shown that in some parts of the East, particularly in Japan, the year ending on a certain day, any portion of the preceding year is taken for a whole year; so that, supposing a child to be born in the last week of December, it would be reckoned one year old on the first of January. If this mode of computation obtained among the Hebrews, which is very likely, it will account for those anachronisms of single years, or parts of years taken as whole ones, which occur in the sacred writings. It removes the difficulties which concern the half years of several princes of Judah and Israel, in which the latter half of the deceased king's last year has hitherto been supposed to be added to the former half of his successor's first year.† And the conjecture is greatly strengthened by observing that the Hebrews really adopted this principle when reckoning by days. Thus, 'three days and three nights,' the time during which our Savior is said to have remained in the tomb, included only a part of the two extreme days.‡

4. The reader will find the complete Jewish calendar, containing the festivals, fasts, &c., in a work already referred to — Calendario Palestino, in which are also inserted the principal events in the Scripture history, in their chronological order.

III. There are other divisions formed of the less obvious consequences of the planetary revolutions, which are called cycles, from the Greek kuklos, a circle, because they contain a circulating period, at the expiration of which certain celestial phenomena return to the point whence they originally set out. The most remarkable are the following: —

1. THE CYCLE OF THE SUN, a revolution of 23 years, in which the days of the months return again to the same days of the week; as does likewise the sun's place to the same signs and degrees of the ecliptic, in the same months, and on the same days of the months, so as not to vary one degree in a century. The leap-years also begin their course over again, with respect to the days of the week on which those of the months fall. The first seven letters of the alphabet — A, B, C, D, E, F, G, have been employed to mark the several days of the week; the first letter standing for the first day of January, and so on: and as one of them must in course stand against Sunday, it is called the Dominical or Sunday letter for the year. As the Julian period of 365 days contains 52 weeks and one day, it is obvious that it must begin and end on the same day of the week (except in the case of leap-year); and, consequently, the next year must commence on the day following.

2. THE CYCLE OF THE MOON, called also the metonic cycle, and the golden number, consists of a revolution of 19 years, or 6910 days, at the end of which the conjunctions, oppositions, and other aspects of the moon, are within an hour and a half of being the same as they were at the commencement of the cycle. It is by this cycle that certain festivals, as Easter, are fixed.

3. THE ROMAN INDUCTION consists of a revolution of 15 years, and was used by the Romans for indicating the times of certain payments of tribute made by the subjects to the government. It is also called the pon- tential induction, because employed by the popes in their bulls.

4. THE CYCLE OF EPACTS need not be explained here, further than to say, that by the epact of any year is understood the age of the moon on the 1st of January of that year; or it is the number of days elapsed since the last new moon.

5. THE CYCLE OF EASTER, PASCHAL CYCLE, OR DIONYSIAN PERIOD, is a revolution of 532 years, found by multiplying the solar cycle, 23, by the lunar cycle, 19; and if the new moons did not gain upon this cycle, Easter-day would always be upon the Sunday next following the full moon after the 21st of March. But in consequence of this anticipation, to which no proper regard was paid before the alteration of the style, the ecclesiastical Easter has frequently been a week different from the true Easter. This cycle, which was invented by Victorinus of Aquitain, A. D. 463, includes every possible variety of Easter.

IV. It may be necessary to say something of the different eras used in computations. 1. By the Usherian year of the world the reader is to understand the chronological computation of Archbishop Usher, who supposed that 4000 years exactly had elapsed from the creation of the world to the birth of Christ. 2. The Alexandrian Era is that chronological computation which was used by the people of Alexandria; who began their reckoning 5502 before the vulgar year of Christ, I. 3. The Antiochian Era is a correction of the preceding, in the 4th century, by Pandorus, an Egyptian monk, and used by the people of Antioch; it differs only from the Alexandrian by subtracting ten years. 4. The Constantinopolitan Era is that still in use in the Greek church, which reckons 5503 before the year I of the Incarnation, according to the Vulgar Era. 5. The Julian Period is a fictitious era, conceived by Joseph Scaliger, to facilitate the reduction of the years of any given epoch to that of another. This period is the result of the Lunar and Solar Cycles, and the Indictions, multiplied by each other. Thus: multiply 19, the Lunar Cycle, by 23, the Solar Cycle, and the product will be 532; multiply this sum by 15, the Cycle of the Indictions, and you will have 7920 years, which constitute the Julian Period. The first year of the Vulgar Era is placed in the 4714th year of the Julian Period; whence it follows, that to find any year of our Lord in this Period, 4713 years must be added to that year; e.g. to find the year of this Period, answering to the year of our Lord 1812, add 4713, and you will have 6525, which is the year of the Julian Period sought. 6. The Era of the Seleucidae, sometimes improperly called the Era of Alexander, commenced 152 years after the death of Alexander the Great, 312 years before the Incarnation, according to the vulgar reckoning, and was properly the first year of the Syro-Hellenistic empire. 7. By the year before the Vulgar Era of Christ, is meant that correct chronological reckoning which showed that the vulgar or common reckoning of the A. D., or year of our Lord, is deficient not less than four years; so that the year 1812 should be, according to strict chronological precision, 1816. 8. The mode of computing by Olympiads derived its origin from the institution of the Olympic games, which were celebrated every four years, for five successive days, at the time of the first full moon, after the summer solstice. They were held on the banks of the river Alpheus, near Olympia, a city of Elis, from which they derived their name. The first Olympiad commenced 776 before the incarnation of our Lord. It need scarcely be added, that each Olympiad consists of four years; hence the first, second, third, or fourth year of any particular Olympiad.

9. Year of the Building of Rome is an important era among the Roman historians: it commenced 753 years before the birth of Christ. 10. The Year of Augustus, or years after the battle of Actium, is the computation of time from the commencement of the Roman Empire, which took place after the battle of Actium, 27 years before our Lord; from this time Augustus became sole governor.

11. The Cæsarian Era of Antioch was a monument which the city of Antioch erected to the honor of Julius Caesar, in commemoration of his victory at Pharsalia: this was obtained 48 years before the commencement of the Christian Era. 12. The Spanish Era: this was kept in commemoration of the entire subjection of Spain, by Augustus Caesar, which took place in the year of Rome 715, or 39 years before the Vulgar Era of Christ. 13. The Julian Era, or, as it is sometimes called, the Era of Julius Caesar: this had for its foundation the reformation of the Roman calendar by Julius Caesar; and the change was made 45 years before the birth of Christ. Other eras might have been noticed; but those mentioned above were judged to be the most important.

V. Considerable difference exists in the chronology of the Hebrew Scriptures, the Samaritan Pentateuch, the Septuagint, and Josephus, the adjustment of which has been attempted, with more or less success, by different learned men: see Jackson's Chronological Antiquities, 3 vols. 4to. 1752; Allen's Chain of Scripture Chronology, 4to. 1659; Bedford's Scripture Chronology, folio, 1730; Hale's Analysis of Chronology, 3 vols. 4to. 1809-1812.

SECTION III.

HISTORICAL MEMORANDA.

As to the Jewish forms of government, patriarchal, democratical, the Hebrew commonwealth, their tributary condition, and kings' maintenance, [see the note at the end of the Pentateuch; where will also be found some account of their criminal law, forms of legal procedure, courts, &c.] It is evident, from its divine source, that the science of jurisprudence among them must have been, in all respects, in the very highest degree of perfection, viewed in relation to the character of the people and the purposes of their social organization.

§ 1.—The Civil Law.

A few notices will here be added of the Jewish civil law.

1. Concerning DEBTS. — In nothing, perhaps, do the Israelitish laws deviate so far from our own, as in regard to matters of debt. We have already remarked, that imprisonment was unknown amongst the Hebrews; and they were equally free from those long and expensive modes of procedure to which we are subjected for the recovery of debts. Their laws in this respect were simple, but efficient. Where a pledge was lodged with a creditor for the payment of a debt, which was not discharged, the creditor was allowed to appropriate the pledge to his own benefit, without any interposition of a magistrate, and to keep it as rightfully as if it had been bought with the sum which had been lent for it. But, besides the pledge, every Israelite had various pieces of property, on which execution for debt might readily be made; as, (1) His hereditary land, the produce of which might be attached till the year of jubilee. — (2) His houses, which, with the sole exception of those of the Levites, might be sold in perpetuity. Le. 25:29,30. — (3) His cattle, household furniture, and ornaments, appear also to have been liable to be taken in execution. See Jb. 24:3. Pr. 22:27. From De. 15:1-11, we see that no debt could be exacted from a poor man in the seventh year; because, the land lying fallow, he had no income whence to pay it. — (4) The person of the debtor might be sold, along with his † Calmet's Bib. Encyc. art. YEAR.

‡ We may further observe, in support of this opinion, that Aben Ezra, speaking of the law for circumcising an infant on the 8th day, says, if the infant was born but one hour before the 1st day was ended, it was counted for one whole day. — Ad. Le. 12:3.

wife and children, if he had any. See Le. 25:39. Jb. 24:9. 2 K. 4:1. Is. 1:1. Ne. ch. 5. We have no intimation in the writings of Moses that suretis was practised among the Hebrews, in cases of debt. In the Proverbs of Solomon, however, there are many admonitions respecting it. Where this warranty was given, the surety was treated with the same severity as if he had been the actual debtor; and if he could not pay, his very bed might be taken from under him. Pr. 22:27. There is a reference to the custom observed in contracting this obligation, in Pr. 17:13 — ‘A man void of understanding striketh hands,’ &c.; and also in 22:26 — ‘Be not thou one of them that strike hands,’ &c. It is to be observed, that the hand was given, not to the creditor, but to the debtor in the creditor’s presence. By this act the surety intimated that he became in a legal sense one with the debtor.

2. OR PLEDGES. — We have above noticed the practice of lending on pledge; but as this was liable to considerable abuse, the following judicial regulations were adopted: — (1) The creditor was not allowed to enter the house of the debtor to fetch the pledge; but was obliged to stand without the door, and wait till it was brought to him. De. 24:10,11. This law was wisely designed to restrain avaricious and unprincipled persons from taking advantage of their poor brethren in choosing their own pledges. (2) The upper garment, which served by night for a blanket (Ex. 22:25,26. De. 24:12,13), and mills, and mill-stones, if taken in pledge, were to be restored to the owner before sunset. The reason of this law was, that these articles were indispensable to the comfortable subsistence of the poor; and for the same reason it is likely that it extended to all necessary utensils. Such a restoration was no loss to the creditor. For he had it in his power at last, by the aid of summary justice, to lay hold of the whole property of the debtor, and if he had none, of his person; and in the event of non-payment, as before stated, to take him for a bond slave.

3. OF USURY OR INTEREST. — In the first and second laws relative to the taking of interest (Ex. 22:25. Le. 25:35-37) mention is made of poor Israelites only, from whom it is expressly prohibited to be taken, not only for money, but also for victuals, and of course for fruits and cora. It was therefore still lawful to lend upon interest to a rich man. But as this was found to give rise to many abuses, and covert violations of the law, it was ultimately rendered unlawful to take interest of any Israelite, whatever his circumstances may have been. De. 22:19,20.

4. OR INJURIES DONE TO THE PROPERTY OF OTHERS. — Although the Hebrew legislator has nowhere enjoined, by a general statute, restitution in the case of injuries committed upon the property of another, he has, nevertheless, made some express ordinances on this subject, from the analogy of which we may conclude that this was the tenor of his law. See Le. 24:18. Ex. 21:23, 21,32,35,36. 22:5.*

§ 2.— Modes of Punishment, and Treatment of Prisoners.

The purpose of inflicting punishment is expressed by Moses to be, the determent of others from the commission of crime. His language is, ‘That others may hear and fear, and commit no more any such evil.’ De. 17:13. 19:20.† The punishments among the Jews were either capital or inferior. Some of them were expressly ordained by Moses; others were introduced from the surrounding nations, by whom they were successively subduced, at various periods of their history. Of these the only distinction we shall make is into inferior and capital.

1. The inferior punishments were, restitution for theft, in certain proportions. Ex. 22:1-4. Deprivation of the delinquent’s beard. 2 S. 10:4. Destroying their houses. Ex. 6:11. Da. 2:5. 3:29. Imprisonment in a dungeon (Jer. 38:6) — aggravated by fetters (Jud. 16:21) — by a wooden yoke round the neck (Jer. 27:2. 23:13) — by the stocks (Pr. 7:22. Jer. 20:2) — by hard labor, &c. Jud. 16:21. 1 K. 22:27. Confinement in the cities of refuge till the death of the high-priest. Nu. 35:25-28. Whipping, with a scourge of 3 cords, so as to give the culprit 40, save one. De. 25:2,3. 2 Co. 11:24,25. Cutting off the hands and feet. Jud. 16:7. 2 S. 4:12. Putting out the eyes. Jud. 16:21.‡ Sealing up the eyes; which is alluded to in Is. 4:18, where it is said, that God hath shut up the eyes of idolaters, that they cannot see; whence we infer that it was a judicial punishment. Fighting with wild beasts, which was sometimes not mortal (I Co. 15:32), though it generally was so. Slavery till the sabbatical year, or till compensation was made for theft. Ex. 21:2. Sale of children for their father’s debts. 2 K. 4:1. Mat. 18:25. Tidio, or like for like, either literally (Ex. 21:23-25), or by compensation with money.|| To these punishments we must add three others, which are generally, and not improperly, classed among ecclesiastical punishments; but the Hebrew form of government being theocratic, they necessarily partook of a civil as well as of an ecclesiastical nature.

(1) The Nedā, or separation, was inflicted on him who had despised the admonition given in private by the minister or leading man in the synagogue, or had been guilty of refusing to pay any debt to which he had been found liable, or had been guilty of certain offences, which have been collected out of the Talmud by Dr. Lightfoot ¶ and Dr. Owen. The time of its continuance was commonly 30 days; but if the person neglected to apply for a remission at the end of that time, he became virtually liable to the next higher degree of censure, although it was not always inflicted. During the continuance of this sentence, he was not prevented from hearing the law, or even from teaching it, if a master in Israel, provided he kept 4 paces distant from other persons. Nay, he might even go into the temple to attend divine service, under the same restrictions. If he died while under this sentence, they threw a stone upon his bier, to signify that he deserved stoning. This degree of excommunication is what is meant in the N. T. by casting out of the synagogue.||

(2) The second degree of excommunication was called Cherem, or ‘cutting off,’ to which Paul alludes, when he speaks of giving one over to Satan. 1 Co. 5:5. It was an authoritative and public censure, pronounced by the synagogue, and lasted for 30 days. With persons under this malediction it was not lawful so much as to eat.

(3) But the highest degree of separation was the Shemetha; so called from a word which signifies to exclude, expel, or cast out; meaning that the persons on whom it was pronounced were cast out from the covenant of promise, and the commonwealth of Israel; and that they should be accounted by the Jews as heathen men and publicans. Some, however, interpret it as equivalent to Maranatha — the Lord cometh, i. e. to execute vengeance; or, There is death, i. e. an excommunication to death. It was inflicted on those who despised the cherem, and was by the greater part of the Jews esteemed total and final; the person who fell under it being left to the judgment of God, without hope of reconciliation with the church. It included an utter exclusion from the congregation, confiscation of property, and exposure to death by the visible interposition of God. Hence it is called in the Targum, ‘the curse and execration of God;’ and by the Talmudists, ‘the anathema of the God of Israel.’ This punishment is referred to in 1 Co. 5:11. 16:22. Ezr. 10:7,8. And it is thought by some that there is a reference to it in 1 Co. 11:30, where the apostle tells the Corinthians, that in consequence of their improper observance of the Lord’s supper, ‘many were weak and sickly among them, and many slept,’ or died by the visitation of Heaven. And perhaps it is to this visible judgment of God, in the apostolic age, against egregious offenders, rather than to the unpardonable sin against the Holy Ghost, that the apostle John also refers in his First Epistle (5:16), when he says, ‘If any man see his brother sin a sin which is not unto death, he shall ask, and God shall give him life for them that sin not unto death. But there is a sin unto death; I do not say that he should pray for it.’ He might pray for offenders in general, and even for the souls of those who were under this visible judgment; but he might not pray for their restoration to health, since God was more glorified, and men more awed, by its continuance.‡‡

(4) To the inferior punishments already enumerated, Michaelis adds the sin and trespass-offerings, in consideration of which punishments were either entirely remitted, or capital punishments commuted for others less severe. Such offerings were, therefore, in themselves a kind of punishment. — First, as fines, and, secondly, as an exposure to shame, in a public acknowledgment of guilt, which probably bore some resemblance to our ecclesiastical penance. They were to be offered in the following cases: (1) For every unintentional transgression of the Levitical law. Even if it was a sin of commission, a sin-offering being made, the legal punishment was therewith remitted; which in the case of wilful transgression was nothing less than extirpation. Le. 4:2. 5:1,4-7. (2) For every rush oath which was not kept. This was not for the inconsideration, however, but for the neglect. Le. 5:4. (3) For concealing any thing against a guilty person, on his trial, and where the witness was sworn to depose to all he knew. Le. 5:1. (4) For incurring a debt to the sanctuary; i. e. not conscientiously paying the tithes. In addition to the trespass-offering in this case, the delinquent must make up his deficiencies, with 20 per cent. over and above. Le. 5:14,15. (5) The same was the rule, where a person denied any thing given him in trust, or any thing lost, which he had found, or any promise he had made; or where he had acquired any property dishonestly, and had his conscience awakened on account of it — even where it was a theft, of which he had once cleared himself by oath, but was now moved by the impulse of his conscience to make voluntary restitution, and wished to get rid of the guilt. Le. 6:1-7. By the offering made on such an occasion, the preceding crime was wholly cancelled; and because the delinquent would otherwise have had to make restitution, from two to five fold, he now gave 20 per cent. over and above the amount of his theft. (6) In the case of adultery committed with a slave, an offering was appointed (Le. 19:20-22), which did not, however, wholly cancel the punishment, but mitigated it from death, which was the established punishment of adultery, to that of stripes. That such measures as these must have had a very great effect in prompting to the restitution of property unjustly acquired, and to the retraction of false oaths, is quite obvious. But in cases of crimes, of which the good of the community expressly required that the legal punishment should be put in execution, no offering could be accepted.|||

2. The capital punishments were —

(1) Stomia, the most general punishment denounced in the law against capital criminals. It was performed in two ways — stones were thrown on the guilty person till he was killed, in which the witnesses always threw the first stones (De. 17:17);—or the criminal was carried to a steep place 12 or 14 feet in height, whence one of the two witnesses threw him headlong, and the other rolled a large stone upon his body. To the latter method there is supposed to be an allusion in Mat. 21:44—‘Whosoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder;’ for he that was thus stoned was first flung upon a stone, and then a stone was dashed upon him.† The Jews generally stoned criminals outside of the city; but in some cases, as blasphemers, idolaters, or adulterers, they stoned them wherever they were found. Thus, when they brought to Jesus a woman taken in adultery (Jn. 8:7), He said to her accusers, ‘Let him who is without sin cast the first stone at her.’ And the Jews, pretending He blasphemed, took up stones to stone Him, even in the temple, v. 59, 10:31. On such occasions they dispensed with the usual formalities, and followed the transports of their passion. This they called ‘the judgment of zeal.’‡ There were 19 offences which subjected to this punishment, according to the rabbins; only 6 or 7 of which are specified in the law. See Le. 20:27, 24:14. De. 13:10, 17:5, 21: 21, 22:21, 24.

(2) Strangling, which was effected by two persons with a handkerchief, for the following offences—adultery, striking of parents, man-stealing, elders notoriously rebellious against the law, false prophets, and those who prognosticated future events in the name of false gods.

(3) Slaying with the sword, which was the punishment affixed to the two following offences—the voluntary manslayer, and the inhabitants of a city who had fallen into idolatry. De. 13:13–16. 1 S. 15:33, 2 S. 4:7. 2 K. 10:7.

(4) Drowning, with a weight suspended from the neck. Mat. 18:6.

(5) Sawing asunder. It is said that Isaiah was subjected to this horrible death; and Paul alludes to it in He. 11:37.

(6) Braying in a mortar. Pr. 27:22. This punishment is still resorted to by the Turks.§

(7) Crucifixion. This punishment was introduced among the Jews by the Romans, who had borrowed it from the Greeks. It obtained among the Egyptians, Persians, and Carthaginians. As this is the punishment to which our blessed Lord was subjected, we may be allowed to notice it more at length than we have any of the former punishments mentioned. Dr. Harwood has written very largely upon it, and from his work we have borrowed the following particulars:—Crucifixion is one of the most cruel and excruciating deaths which the art of ingeniously tormenting and extinguishing life ever devised. The person doomed to this dire end was distended on a cross; had great nails driven through his hands and feet, the most exquisitely tender and sensible parts of the human frame; and he was left slowly to consume and die in this lingering and most miserable manner. There are instances of crucified persons living in this exquisite torture several days. The rites of sepulture were denied them. Their dead bodies were generally left on the crosses on which they were first suspended, and became a prey to every ravenous beast and carnivorous bird. It was generally a servile punishment, and chiefly inflicted on vile, worthless, and incorrigible slaves. In reference to this, the apostle, in describing the condescension of our Savior, and his submission to this most opprobrious death, represents Him as taking upon Him the form of a SERVANT, and becoming obedient to death, even the death of the cross. Phil. 3:

7,8. It was universally reputed the most shameful and ignominious death to which a wretch could be exposed. In such an exit were comprised every idea and circumstance of odium, disgrace, and public scandal. Hence the apostle magnifies and extols the benevolence and magnanimity which our blessed Lord displayed, who for the joy set Before Him endured the cross, despising the shame (He. 12:2), regarding, with a generous disdain and contempt, every circumstance of public indignity and infamy with which such a death was loaded. It was from the idea they connected with such a death, that the Greeks treated the apostles with the last contempt and pity, for publicly embarking in the cause of a person who had been brought to this reproachful and dishonorable death by his own countrymen. The preaching of the cross was to them foolishness (1 Co. 1:23); the promulgation of a system of religion that had been taught by a person who, by a national act, had publicly suffered the punishment and death of the most useless and abandoned slave, was, in their ideas, the last infatuation; and the preaching Christ crucified—publishing in the world a religion whose Founder suffered on a cross—appeared the last absurdity and madness. The same inherent scandal and ignominy had crucifixion in the estimation of the Jews. They, indeed, annexed more complicated wretchedness to it; for they esteemed the miscreant who was adjudged to such an end, not only to be abandoned of men, but forsaken of God. ‘He that is hanged is accursed of God.’ De. 21:23. Hence Paul, representing to the Galatians the grace and benevolence of Jesus, who released us from that curse to which the law of Moses devoted us, by being made a curse for us, by submitting to be treated for our sakes as an execrable malefactor, to show the horror of such a death as Christ voluntarily endured, adds, ‘It is written in the law, Cursed is every one that is hanged on a tree!’ 3:13. And from this express declaration of the law of Moses, concerning persons thus executed, we account for that aversion the Jews discover against Christianity, and perceive the reason of what Paul asserts, that their ‘preaching of Christ crucified was to the Jews a stumbling-block.’ 1 Co. 1:23.|| The punishment of the cross caused them to stumble at the very gate of Christianity. The several circumstances related by the four evangelists, as accompanying the crucifixion of Christ, were conformable to the Roman custom in such executions, and not only reflect beauty and lustre upon these passages, but happily corroborate and confirm the narrative of the sacred penmen. Thus, when Pilate had pronounced the sentence of condemnation, and publicly adjudged Him to be crucified, he gave orders that He should be scourged. Mat. 27:20. Mk. 15:15. Among the Romans, this was always inflicted previously to crucifixion. After they had inflicted this customary whipping, the evangelists inform us that they obliged our Lord to carry to the place of execution the cross, or at least the transverse beam of it, on which He was to be suspended. Lacerated, therefore, with the stripes and bruises He had received—faint with the loss of blood—his spirits exhausted by the cruel insults and blows that were given Him, when they invested Him with robes of mock royalty—and oppressed with the incumbent weight of his cross;—in this condition our Savior was urged along the road. Fatigued and spent with the treatment He had received, our Lord could not support his cross. The soldiers, therefore, who attended Him, compelled one Simon, a Cyrenian, who was coming from the country to Jerusalem, and happened then to be passing, to bear it after Him. The circumstance here mentioned of our Lord bearing his cross, was agreeable to the Roman custom. Slaves and malefactors were compelled to carry the whole or part of the fatal gibbet on which they were destined to die; and this constituted a principal part of the shame and ignominy of such a death. ‘Cross-bearer’ was a term of the greatest reproach among the Romans. All along the road to the place of execution, the unhappy criminal was loaded with every wanton cruelty. He was pushed, thrown down, stimulated with goads, and impelled forward by every act of insolence and inhumanity that wretchedness is heir to.¶ There is great reason to think that our blessed Redeemer, in his way to Calvary, experienced every abuse of this nature. Might not the scourging that was inflicted—the blows He had received from the soldiers, when in derision they paid Him homage—and the abuse He suffered in his way to Calvary, greatly contribute to accelerate his death, and occasion that speedy exit, at which one of the evangelists tells us, ‘Pilate marvelled?’ When the malefactor had carried his cross to the place of execution, a hole was dug in the earth, in which it was to be fixed—the criminal was stripped—a stupefying potion was given him,—the cross was laid on the ground—he was distended upon it—and four soldiers, two on each side, were at the same time employed in driving four large nails through his hands and feet. After they had deeply fixed and riveted these nails in the wood, they elevated the cross with the sufferer upon it; and in order to infix it the more firmly and securely in the earth, they let it violently fall into the cavity they had prepared to receive it. This vehement precipitation of the cross must have occasioned a most dreadful convulsive shock, and agitated the whole frame of the malefactor in a dire and most excruciating manner. These several particulars were observed in the crucifixion of our Lord. Upon his arrival at Calvary, He was stripped—the medicated cup was offered to Him—He was fastened to the cross; and while they were employed in piercing his hands and his feet, it is probable that He offered to heaven that most benevolent and affecting prayer for his murderers, ‘Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!’ In conformity with the Roman custom, a title or inscription, by Pilate’s order, was fixed above the head of Jesus, written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, specifying what it was that had brought Him to this end. After the cross was erected, a party of soldiers were appointed to keep guard, and to attend at the place of execution, till the criminal breathed his last. So it was in the case of our Lord. Mat. 27:54. While they were thus attending Him, it is said our Savior complained of thirst. This is a natural circumstance. The exquisitely tender and sensible extremities of the body being thus perforated, the person languishing and faint with loss of blood, and lingering under such acute and excruciating torture, must necessarily kindle and inflame a vehement and excessive thirst. One of the guards, hearing his request, hastened and took a sponge, and filled it from a vessel that stood by, that was full of vinegar. The usual drink of the Roman soldiers was vinegar and water.¶ After receiving this, Jesus cried with a loud voice, ‘IT IS FINISHED!’—the divine plan and scheme of human redemption is completed; after which his head sunk upon his bosom, and He gave up the ghost. Mat. 27:50. The last circumstance relative to the crucifixion of our Lord which demands notice, was the petition of the Jews to Pilate, that the death of the sufferers might be accelerated. There is an express prohibition in the law, that the bodies of those who were hanged should remain all night upon the tree. De. 21:23. The next day, therefore, after the crucifixion, being, as one of the evangelists says, a high day (Jn. 19:31), a number of leading men among the Jews waited on Pilate in a body, to desire that he would hasten the death of the malefactors hanging on their crosses. Pilate, therefore, despatched his orders to the soldiers on duty, who broke the legs of the two criminals who were crucified along with Christ. But, when they came to Jesus, finding He had already breathed his last, they thought this violence unnecessary; but one of them pierced his side with a spear, whose point appears to have penetrated into the pericardium of the heart; for John, who says that he was an eye-witness of this, declares that there issued from the wound a mixture of blood and water. This wound, had He not been dead, must necessarily have proved fatal. This circumstance John saw; and he that saw it bare record, and his record is true; and he knoweth that he saith true, that ye might believe, Jn. 19:35. He thus attested it from a conviction of the great importance of the event, and conscious that on this single fact rested the whole fabric of the Christian religion.¹ The rites of sepulture were commonly denied to such as were crucified. The bodies of the malefactors were generally devoured by wolves, dogs, and other animals; or, if the crosses were higher than usual, they either became a prey to the birds, or putrefied and fell to pieces. Among the Hebrews, as before remarked, the body was not suffered to remain on the cross all night; but they did not permit them to be placed in the tombs of their families, till their flesh had been first consumed in the public sepulchres. It was for this reason, perhaps, that Joseph desired leave from Pilate to lay the body of Jesus in his own tomb; that it might not be thrown, undistinguished, among the criminals in the public burial-place, which adjoined the place of crucifixion. From this circumstance we also learn, that the Roman governors had the power of dispensing with this part of the ignominious sentence, by delivering the body to the friends of the deceased. The punishment of crucifixion was so common among the Romans, that by a very usual figure, pains, afflictions, troubles, &c., were called crosses. Hence our Savior says, that his disciple must take up his cross and follow Him. Mat. 16:24. The cross is the sign of ignominy and suffering; yet it is the badge and glory of the Christian. Christ is the way we are to follow; and there is no way of attaining that glory and happiness which is promised in the gospel, but by his cross.²

* Few men could become so hardened as to bear false witness against their neighbor, when they knew they would be obliged to inflict the punishment of death themselves.

Such were the chief capital punishments among the Jews, in various periods of their history. But we must not dismiss this subject, without noticing that species of punishment which consisted in,

(3) Posthumous insults, and was designed to brand with infamy those who were its subjects. Michaelis notices three punishments of this description:—1. Burning. I.e. 20:14, 21:9. The Jewish rabbins have supposed, and in this they have been followed by some Christian commentators, that the punishment here spoken of was inflicted on the criminal while alive; by pouring molten lead down his throat. No such sanguinary law, however, appears among the enactments of Moses. That burning was a posthumous punishment, inflicted on the lifeless corpse of the criminal, is evident from Jos. 7:15, 25. In the former v. it is ordained that the person who had committed the crime of sacrifice, and who was yet undiscovered, should be burnt with fire; and in the latter, we find that the execution of the sentence upon him consisted, in his being first stoned, and then burnt. 2. Hanging. De. 21:22. Jos. 10:16. This was considered as a mark of the greatest infamy; because, by the explanation of Moses himself, a person hanged was held as 'accursed of God,' and for this reason, that his death did not sufficiently atone for his crime; and, therefore, the law considered him as a person who carried the curse of God with him into the other world, and was punishable even there. 3. Heaping stones upon the bodies of criminals who had been already put to death, or upon their remains when consumed by fire; in order to serve as a perpetual monument of their infamy, in having there suffered any such ignominious punishment. See Jos. 7:25, 26, 8:29, 2 S. 13:17.³ This custom was prevalent among the ancient Arabs, and obtains even in the present day.⁴

3. Of the treatment of prisoners we have necessarily said something, in noticing the punishments to which they were subjected. [As the prisoner was generally punished at once, and before the judge, prisons, properly so called, were long unknown, except to Egypt and Babylon; but these were principally used for state prisoners; and their treatment was, as now mostly, in the East, barbarous and neglectful in the extreme. Noisome dungeons were the common means of confinement, but the prisoner, as to food, clothing, attendance, security, &c., was much at the mercy of his keeper; who was generally a military, sometimes a civil officer.] The Roman method of fettering and confining criminals was singular. One end of a chain, that was of a commendable length, was fixed about the right arm of the prisoner, and the other end was fastened to the left of a soldier. Coop. Ac. ch. 2, 2 Tl. 1:16, 18. Ac. 21:33, 12:6, 18, 19, 16:27. From these texts it appears too, that chains on the right and left hand, attached to two soldiers, were sometimes used.

3d CLASS.—The Political Law.

The magistrate is the keeper of the precepts of both tables, and in have respect in human society; therefore the Political Laws of the Israelites are referred to both the tables, and are to be reduced to the several precepts of the Moral Law, viz.

It is said that the pillar of Absalom, which stands in the valley of Jehoshaphat, is hewed round with stones, thrown at it by the Turks, as an expression of their indignation at his crime.

LAWS REFERRED TO THE FIRST TABLE, NAMELY,

I. To the First and Second Commandments, viz.

	Exodus, chap.	Leviticus, ch. p.	Numbers, chap.	Deuteronom. chap.
Of idolatry and covetousness	22.	29.	—	—
Of abolishing idolatry	23, 24.	—	33.	7, 17.
Of diviners and false prophets	22.	19, 20.	—	13.
Of covenants with other gods	23, 34.	—	—	7.

II. To the Third Commandment, viz.

	Exodus, chap.	Leviticus, ch. p.	Numbers, chap.	Deuteronom. chap.
Of blasphemers	—	24.	15.	—
Of breaking the Sabbath	31, 35.	—	15.	—

POLITICAL LAWS REFERRED TO THE SECOND TABLE, NAMELY,

I. To the Fifth Commandment, viz.

	Exodus, chap.	Leviticus, ch. p.	Numbers, chap.	Deuteronom. chap.
Of magistrates, and their authority	18, 30.	—	11.	1, 10, 17, 23.
Of the power of fathers	21.	20.	—	21.

II. To the Sixth Commandment, viz.

	Exodus, chap.	Leviticus, ch. p.	Numbers, chap.	Deuteronom. chap.
Of capital punishments in general	—	—	21, 24.	—
Of wilful murder	21.	24.	35.	19.
Of manslaughter and refuge	21.	—	35.	19, 21, 22.
Of human injury	21.	24.	—	25.
Of punishment, not capital	—	—	—	25.
Of the law of war	—	—	20, 23.	—

III. To the Seventh Commandment, viz.

	Exodus, chap.	Leviticus, ch. p.	Numbers, chap.	Deuteronom. chap.
Of unlawful marriages	—	19, 20.	—	7, 22.
Of circumcision	—	19.	—	23.

§ 4.—Military Affairs.

The whole Hebrew Nation had to be called to Arms: Exemptions from Military Service — Strength of the Israelitish Armies — Military Officers — Order of Battle and of Encampment — Treatment of Enemies — Division of the Spoil — Arms — Chariots — Qualifications of a Warrior — Return of a Conquering Army — Reward of the Victors.

1. The maxim of ancient states, Quod civis, tot milites, — whosoever would be defended, must defend, — as Michaelis remarks, so fully established in the Mosaic code, that we find every man of 20 years old and upwards distinguished by this epithetical characteristic, that he goes forth to war. Nu. 13, 43, 262.* It is hardly to be supposed, however, that the services of a whole nation would ever be required for the purpose of bearing arms. Hence, out of those who were thus qualified to serve in the militia, Moses generally orders the selection of a certain number, suitable to the service required. Ex. 17, 2, 10, &c. Nu. 31:1-6. There are two memorable instances on record, however, where the whole people took the field. Jud. 20:11. 1 S. 11:7.

2. The following exemptions from military service were allowed by the Mosaic law: — (1) Whoever had built a house, and had not yet occupied it, was at liberty to return, lest, falling in battle, another should enjoy the fruits of his labor. De. 20:5. (2) Whoever had planted a vineyard or olive-yard, and had not yet eaten of its produce freely, was exempt for the same reason. De. 20:6. This statute exempted the establisher of a vineyard or olive-yard for five whole years. For if a tree bore fruit the 1st year, it could not be used for food before the 5th year of its growth. During the first 3 years, it could not be eaten at all; and in the 4th year, it was consecrated to God, and could only be eaten at the sacred feasts. Le. 19:23-25. (3) Whoever had betrothed a wife, but had not yet consummated marriage, was likewise exempted, lest he should fall in battle, and another take his bride. De. 20:7. (4) Every new-married man was, during the first year after marriage, freed from military service, and all other personal burdens. (5) Whoever was fearful and faint-hearted was allowed to retire, that he might not infect others with cowardice. De. 20:8. The four former immunities, independent of their manifest equity, were attended with two very great political benefits, in promoting, first, marriages, and, secondly, the culture of the soil, which are never more necessary than in the time of war. The latter ground of exemption, however, was not quite so honorable.

It must have cost a coward a great struggle to avail himself of it; and no doubt many, rather than do so, would repress their fears, and, of course, fight so much the better.†

3. The Israelitish armies being thus levied on the nation, en masse, it is easy to see how they were able to bring such large numbers into the field. Thus they mustered 400,000 footmen to revenge the perfidy and cruelty of the Benjamites. Jud. 20:17. When Saul marched against the Ammonites, he had 330,000 (1 S. 11:3), and when he went to destroy Amalek, he had 210,000. (15:4.) It was not till a later period in their history, however, that the Israelitish armies assumed a regular, warlike character, and became, as a whole, properly effective. They were called out from their agricultural occupations, according to the exigency of the times, each one bringing his own arms and provisions; and after the termination of the war, which was seldom more than short skirmishes with the surrounding nations, they were disbanded, and returned to their homes. 1 S. 11:13: The earliest instance on record of any military force being kept in time of peace, is in the reign of Saul. 1 S. 13:1, 2. This force was evidently augmented during the reigns of the subsequent kings; for in Jehoshaphat's reign the military force in Judah was 780,000, and in Benjamin 360,000, making a total of 1,160,000, besides those in the fenced cities to garrison them. 2 Ch. 17:14-18.

4. The officers in the Israelitish armies were, (1) The generalissimo, or commander-in-chief; called, also, the captain of the Lord's host, such as Joshua under Moses, Abner under Saul, Joab under David, and Beniah under Solomon. (2) The princes of the tribes, or of the fathers, or of the families of Israel, who were at the head of their respective tribes. (3) Princes of a thousand, or tribunes, captains of a hundred, heads of fifty men, third-men, whose functions are unknown, and decurions, or chiefs of ten men. (4) Scribes, or master-masters, who kept exact registers of all who bore arms in their districts. (5) Inspectors, or provosts, who had authority to command the troops under their inspection, and to punish delinquents. It was quite common for the kings to go to war in person, and in the earlier times they fought on foot. After Solomon had introduced cavalry into his armies, they headed their troops in chariots. See the Kings and Chronicles throughout.

5. We have no certain information of the precise manner in which the Israelitish armies were drawn up for battle. The Jewish writers state that the whole army was ranged into one solid line, 20 or 30 deep. In the front of these were placed the light infantry, viz. the archers, slingers, and spear-men, who commenced the onset with a war-like shout, and with shower of arrows and stones directed against the enemy's front. It is probable that the cavalry was disposed in large squadrons on the two wings. Before the battle commenced, the following ceremonies were observed: — (1) The priest approached the army, and said, 'Hear, O Israel; ye approach this day into battle against your enemies; let not your hearts faint; fear not, and do not tremble, neither be ye terrified because of them; for the Lord your God is He that goeth with you, to fight for you against your enemies, and to save you.' (2) The officers then proclaimed the exemptions from military service which have been enumerated above, and then, (3) The whole who remained were led forward to the battle, the method of which was directed as circumstances permitted. Before the invention of fire-arms, fenced cities were of the utmost importance, and on them the greatest dependence was placed. When the Israelites were about to besiege a city, they either drew lines of circumvallation, to prevent escape, or hewed down trees, and built forts against them round about (2 K. 25:1, 2 S. 17:20, 18, 29, Jer. 6:6); or planted battering-rams and other engines of destruction (Jer. 6:6, Ez. 4:2, 21:22); or endeavored to enter them by burning the gates, and cutting down the wooden towers. Ez. 26:9.

* The melancholy circumstances attending the military execution of the inhabitants of Jahesh-Gilead, simply because they did not join the Israelitish armies, as related in Jud. 21:8-13, show with what rigor the law was, in this respect, put in force.

6. Of the order observed in the encampment of the armies, we have no precise information. The castrametum in the wilderness, the plan of which was laid down by God Himself (Nu. 2), consisted of three principal divisions: The first, which was the most powerful, occupied the centre; this was the tabernacle, or the throne of God. The second, which was composed of the priests and Levites, surrounded this in a quadrangular form. And the third consisted of the remaining tribes, who pitched around, each under his own banner, at a distance of about a mile from the tabernacle. The diagram [note and cut, Nu. 1:4-17, 3:1] affords a good idea of this camp.

The admirable order of this encampment drew from Balaam the following exclamation: 'How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel! As the valleys are they spread forth, as gardens by the river's side, as the trees of lign-aloes † Michaelis on the Laws of Moses, vol. iii. pp. 26-37.

§ On some occasions, one part of the army foraged for the rest. Jud. 20:

10. And it was sometimes the case that part of the nation remained at home, to provide provisions for those who marched against the enemy. See 1 S. 17:13, 17; and Josephus, Jewish Wars, b. ii. ch. 20.

which the Lord hath planted, and as cedar-trees beside the waters." Nu. 21:2-6. But it is not likely that there were any regularly-formed camps among the Hebrews, similar to those of the Romans and other warlike nations. [The cut of a modern Bedouin encampment in the wilderness of Sinai, may assist us in getting an idea of the forms and arrangement of the Hebrew tents; for similar wants perpetuate similar manners, especially when poverty prevents choice, and the indolence natural to a warm climate indispensable to invention.] In 1 S. 26:7, we read that the spear of Saul was stuck at his head while he slept. This was equivalent to the place of the general's tent.⁷ His armor-bearer and principal officers slept around him, and the rest of the army, in their several divisions, in a circle without. This was probably the general manner of their encampment.

7. It is impossible to avoid noticing, in reading the historical books of the O. T., the barbarities which were mutually practised in the wars carried on between the Israelites and the adjoining nations. Some were decapitated (1 S. 31:9); others had their noses and ears cut off (Ez. 23:25), or their hands and feet (2 S. 4:12). Some were put under saws and harrows of iron, and made to pass through the brick-kiln (2 S. 12:31); mothers were destroyed with their children (Est. 3:13); infants were dashed against the stones (2 K. 8:12, Ps. 137:9; Is. 13:16-18); women with child were ripped up (2 K. 15:16; Ho. 13:16; Am. 1:13); and persons of rank reduced to the most degrading slavery (Is. 47:2).

8. With regard to the spoil taken in war, Moses distinctly recognized the right of the people to it; and the following regulations may be collected out of his writings, relative to its distribution. 1. The spoil in persons and cattle did not belong to the individuals who took it, but was collected, reckoned, and distributed in the following proportions:—(1) One half to those who went to the field, out of which they had to give every five hundredth individual to the priests. Nu. 32:21-29. (2) The other half went to the rest of the Israelites, with the deduction of every fiftieth individual for the Levites, v. 30. 2. Things inanimate belonged to the individual who seized them, v. 13-51. David enacted a wise and equitable law relative to the division of spoil in the army; giving equally to those who fought, and those who remained with the stuff or baggage. 1 S. 30: 24-25.

9. The arms of the Jewish warriors were adapted to the exigencies of the occasion. Some of them wore complete armor, consisting of a helmet of brass (1 S. 17:5), an habergeon, cuirass, or breastplate of brass, a defense for the back, a girdle for the loins, and greaves of brass for the legs and feet (1 S. 17:5), with a sword for the right hand, and a shield or buckler for the left. [Cuts, end of Jer. &c.] Hence the beautiful allusion to all these in St. Paul's description of the Christian soldier (Ep. 6:13-17), where nothing is left undefended but the back; to teach us that Christ hates a coward and an apostate; that as long as we turn our backs, we do it at our hazard.⁸ But although some of the soldiers were thus equipped, the greater part wore their ordinary clothing, and were arranged in companies according to their armor. Thus one part had swords and bucklers; another, spears and javelins; a third, battle-axes (Jer. 51: 20); a fourth, slings (Jud. 20:16; 2 K. 3:25); and a fifth, bows (1 S. 31:3; 1 Ch. 5:13; 12:2). There are several highly-expressive and beautiful metaphors in the N. T. which are derived from various parts of the Roman army. See Ro. 13:12; 2 Co. 6:7, &c.

10. In so mountainous a country as Judea, cavalry could be of no great service, and therefore in the more early periods of their history the Hebrews did not adopt them. Alsafoun is the first of whom we read making use of them (2 S. 15:1); and they appear to have been of no further service to him than to facilitate his flight (13:9, &c.). Solomon, indeed, sent to Egypt for a considerable number of horses, and a proportionate number of chariots (1 K. 10:26, &c.); but it seems they were more for splendor than actual service; and hence Rabshakeh, when he marched against Jerusalem, taunted Hezekiah with the remark, that if he should lend him 2000 horses, none of his subjects were capable of riding them (2 K. 18:23). And yet that the Jewish monarchs sometimes employed chariots in their armies is evident from several passages in the books of Kings, Chronicles, &c. Those used by the Canaanites are called 'chariots of iron' (Jud. 1:19), because their poles, wheels, and axles, were armed with sharp scythes.

11. The qualifications of a Hebrew warrior were so very different from those which are considered essential in modern times, that we are at loss, without a knowledge of this circumstance, to understand the propriety of some of the commandments bestowed upon them in the O. T. writings. The discipline of modern tactics was unknown in ancient times, when the meanest soldier had an opportunity of distinguishing himself by his strength and agility. His bodily strength, if great, enabled him to bear down his opponent; and when that was wanting, his dexterity in the use of arms, his pretended flight and sudden return, were all employed to deceive and defeat his adversary; whilst the closeness of the combat rendered the disarming or death of his antagonist the only means of preserving himself. Bodily strength, therefore, complete presence of mind, experience in the art of war, and swiftness as a roe, when swiftness was necessary, either to pursue after or avoid the foe, were indispensable ingredients in an ancient warrior; whilst his eye acquired an animation, his countenance an expression, his voice a variety of cadence, and his whole frame a degree of athletic force, which are in vain sought for in the mechanical mass of a modern army. Nor should we forget that the valor of the Jews had often peculiar motives to strengthen it, viz. the motives of religion; for they frequently went to the field under the immediate direction of Jehovah, and with the positive assurance of success.⁹ [Gymnastic exercises appear to have been usual. See Fleury.] It is well known, that for the purpose of keeping the military disengaged from the cares and distractions of secular life, the Romans prohibited marriage to their soldiery. To this the apostle refers, 2 Ti. 2:4.

12. The return of the conquering army has ever been an occasion of the most enthusiastic rejoicing. The circumstances attending the return of Jephthah (Jud. 11:34), the victory of David over Goliath, and the defeat of the Philistines (1 S. 18:6,7), as also that of Judith over the Assyrians (Judith 16: 1-17), are well known to every reader of the Bible. On a similar occasion was that § 5.—Tribute and Money.

I. Under Moses.—II. After the Captivity.—III. The Publicans.

1. As the law of Moses was the only body of law enacted by God, the King of Israel, for the government both of church and state, and as the priests were appointed to dispense it, they are properly to be considered the ministers of state, as well as of religion; and therefore the tithes, and the portion of sacrifices which the law assigned for their maintenance, were in the nature of taxes payable for the support of the government. Besides these, we read of no other stated taxes, appointed by the law, except a poll-tax of half a shekel, which, when the people were numbered in the wilderness, was levied upon every man from 20 years old and upwards; and it is said to be designed for 'a ransom, or atonement for his soul,' and to be appointed for the service of the tabernacle of the congregation. Ex. 30:12-16. This tax, however, appears only to have been resorted to as circumstances required, until the later periods of the Jewish history, when it became a stated annual payment, and was demanded of our Savior. Mat. 17:21.

2. After the captivity, the Jews were tributary, first to the Persians (Ez. 4:13, 7:21), and then to the Greeks; from the latter of whom they were freed by the Maccabees. 1 Mac. 10:29, 30, 11:35, 36, &c. When Pompey conquered Judea (about ante A. D. 60), the Jews became tributary to the Romans; and in the reign of Augustus (A. D. 3), Judea was reduced into a Roman province, and the people were laid under a direct tax to the state, according to a census held by P. Sulpicius Quirinus, while Coponius was procurator of Judea. See Lu. 22, Ac. 5:37. To this tribute the Jews submitted with the utmost reluctance; and it gave rise to several tumults and insurrections. Our Savior expressly enjoined upon them the obligation to pay it, in which He was followed by his inspired apostles. Mat. 22:17-21. Ro. 13:3. 1 Pe. 2:13.

3. The collectors of the Roman taxes in Judea are well known to every reader of the N. T. under the appellation of publicans. Of these there appear to have been two kinds—the collectors of the taxes and the receivers-general. Of the latter order was Zacheus, who is called a 'chief publican.' Lu. 19:2. From the extortion and rapacity which was too generally practised by the inferior order of these officers, added to the odium which attached to such an employment in the estimation of the Jews, they were held in the utmost contempt; so that a 'publican,' and a 'sinner,' or a notoriously profligate character, were synonymous terms in the time of our Savior. Nor were they more respected by the heathen themselves. For Theocritus, being once asked which was the most cruel of all beasts, replied, that among the beasts of the wilderness, they were the bear and the lion; among the beasts of the city, they were the publican and the parasite. The Pharisees would hold no sort of communication with the publicans; which may explain Mat. 18:17—'Let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican.' It is even said they would not allow them to enter the temple or synagogues, to partake of the public prayers, fill offices of judicature, or give testimony in a court of justice. Neither would they receive their presents at the temple, any more than the price of blood, of prostitution, or of any thing of the like nature.

4. The original form of the precious metals, as media of exchange, appears to have been in the state of bullion. This was weighed in the balance, and was either increased or diminished till the parties were satisfied. It was in favor of these metals that they could be divided and subdivided, without injuring their value. They were, therefore, a convenient symbol of commodities. But whilst they continued in the form of bullion, they were liable to some inconveniences; for it was troublesome to weigh them at every transaction, and they might be adulterated. Hence the invention of bars of a certain size, and of a determinate purity, ascertained by some mark generally known. So early as the days of Abraham, we read of weighing pieces of silver, which were current money with the merchant, or of the legal purity. Ge. 23:16. And when Jacob bought the parcel of ground from Hamor (Ge. 33:19), it would appear that the hundred pieces which he gave had a determinate mark upon them, for they are called 'hundred keshitah' in the original. Now, keshitah signifies lamb; yet the animal so called could not have been given; for we are told, in Ac. 7:16, that the price was in money. Might not these 100 pieces, then, have been so called, because the figure of a lamb was impressed upon them, to ascertain their purity? The most convenient improvement in the form and value of precious metals, as media of exchange, was that of coinage; [and this, among the Egyptians, was in the shape of rings.] It ascertained their fineness and value at first sight, whilst, by their variety, they could easily be accommodated to every transaction.

SECTION IV.

JEWISH AND CHRISTIAN WRITINGS.

I. Besides the Chaldee Targums already described, the following are the most important of the Jewish writings which tend to illustrate the Scriptures:

1. The Works of Philo Judaeus, a noble Jew of Alexandria, who flourished about A. D. 40, which contain several curious treatises in explication of various parts of the Hebrew Scriptures, and greatly illustrate the sentiments, language, and phraseology of the N. T.

2. The Writings of Flavius Josephus, a learned Jew of sacerdotal extraction and royal descent, who was born A. D. 37, and was alive in A. D. 96, but it is not known when he died. The first twelve books of his Jewish Antiquities are a regular paraphrase and comment on the civil and ecclesiastical history of the Jews, and the previous records contained in the Bible, from the foundation of the world to the time of the Maccabees; and the remaining books are the very best commentary on the Gospels and Acts; while his accurate and minute detail of the events of his own time, particularly of the Jewish wars, and the siege and destruction of Jerusalem, affords us the

‡ A translation of Plutarch's minute description of the triumphal procession of Paulus Aemilius, who took Perseus, king of Macedonia, prisoner, and put a final period to that ancient empire, may be seen in Kenneth's Antiquities of Rome, p. 228, &c. [An engraving of a Roman triumph is to be found in the last ed. of Adam's Roman Antiq.]

§ The original is, leading them in triumph.

|| The original here, also, is leadeſt us about in triumph. 'The Greek word, which we render caueſt us to triumph, properly signifies to triumph over, or to lead in triumph, as our translators themselves have rightly rendered it in another place—Col. 2:15. And so the apostle's true meaning is plainly this: Now, thanks be to God, who always triumpheth over us in Christ; leading us about in triumph, as it were, in solemn procession. This yields a most congruous and beautiful sense of his words. And in order to display the force of this fine sentiment, in its full compass and extent, let it be observed, that when St. Paul represents himself and others as being led about in triumph, like so many captives, by the prevailing power and efficacy of gospel grace and truth, his words naturally imply and suggest three things worthy of particular notice and attention; viz. a contest, a victory, and an open show of this victory.—'While God was leading about such men in triumph, He made them very serviceable and successful in promoting Christian knowledge in every place wherever they came.'—Beckell's Discourses, pp. 111, 142, 151.

§§ That this was the tribute demanded of our Lord is evident, as Jennings remarks, from the reason alleged by Him why He might have been excused from paying it (v. 25, 26), and which would not hold good were it a tribute paid to the Roman emperor, as Salmagius and others have thought.

best means of perceiving the fulfilment of many of our Savior's prophecies.

3. The Apocryphal Books, the productions of Alexandrian Jews, and their descendants, are all curious, and some of them extremely valuable. As a collection of very ancient Jewish works anterior to Christianity, as documents of history, and as lessons of prudence and morality, and often of piety, they are highly deserving of notice; but as elucidating the phraseology of the N. T., they claim the frequent perusal of scholars and theological students.

4. The Talmud, which literally signifies doctrine or learning, is a digest of the peculiar tenets of the Jews with respect to religion, morals, and many subjects of jurisprudence. It consists of two parts, — the Mishna and the Gemara. The Mishna, the second, or oral law of the Jews, consists of various traditions explanatory of the Law of Moses, which were first committed to writing by Rabbi Judah Hakkaddosh, or the Holy, probably about A. D. 150. The Gemara, i. e. completion or perfection, is a commentary on the Mishna, of which there are two — the Gemara of Jerusalem, which was compiled by Rabbi Jochanan, president of the celebrated academy in Palestine during forty years, about A. D. 300; and the Gemara of Babylon, which was composed by Rabbi Asa, president of the school of Sora, near Babylon, some time in the 5th century. The Mishna, when accompanied by the Gemara of Jerusalem, is called the Jerusalem Talmud, and is but little esteemed by the Jews; and when it is joined to the Gemara of Babylon subjoined, it is denominated the Babylonian Talmud, which they hold in the highest estimation. Though abounding with absurd superstitions, and many ridiculous and improbable fictions, the Talmuds afford many happy elucidations of Scripture, especially relative to the manners and customs of the Jews.

5. The Masorah, i. e. tradition, is a collection of criticisms on the sacred text by a set of men, hence called Masorites, whose profession it was to write out copies of the Hebrew Scriptures, to criticize upon them, and to teach the true readings; and who continued from the time of Ezra and the men of the great synagogue, to that of Ben Asher and Ben Naphtali. They marked the number of the greater and smaller sections, chapters, verses, words, and letters, in each book, placing the amount at the end of each in numeral letters, or some symbolical word which comprised them; noted the verses in which something appeared to be omitted, the words which they believed to be changed, the superfluous letters, the repetitions of the same verses, the different readings of the redundant or defective words, the number of times the same word is found at the beginning, middle, and end of a verse, the different significations of the same word, the agreement or conjunction of one word with another, and what letters are pronounced, inverted, and hung perpendicularly, with the number of each; and also reckoned which is the middle letter of the Pentateuch, the middle verse of each book, and how many times each letter of the alphabet occurred in the whole Hebrew Scriptures. To some this has appeared trifling and superstitious; while others have seen it in a different point of view; and applauded that pious zeal and industry which they exerted in so many tedious and vexatious researches, in order to preserve the integrity and honor of the Word of God, by putting a stop to the licentiousness, rashness, or carelessness of transcribers and critics.

To the same class of men are generally attributed the marginal notes or corrections in the Hebrew Bible, called the Kerot, i. e. read; which are referred to in the text by a circle placed above a word, or letter, which is called Kethib, or written. The system of punctuation in the Hebrew Bibles has also, but apparently without sufficient evidence, been ascribed to the earlier Masorites; which has been characterized as a continual gloss on the sacred writings, the vowel points, and the prosaic and metrical accents, giving a definite meaning to every word and sentence to which they are affixed, which, in their simple state, are capable of various senses.

6. The Cabbala, i. e. reception, anciently denoted all the interpretations of Scripture which the Jews pretended to have received by tradition from Moses and Ezra; but it is now restricted to signify a mysterious kind of science, comprising mystical interpretations of Scripture, and metaphysical speculations concerning the Deity and other beings, said to have been handed down by a secret tradition from the earliest ages. The Cabbalists, not satisfied to confine their speculations to the metaphors, allegories, and symbolical expressions in the sacred Scriptures, pretended to extract, by the rules of their art, mysteries from points and accents, from various combinations, changes, abbreviations, and from the form, positions, and numerical value of certain words and letters; and thus, while they passed for the profoundest critics and theologians, they indulged in the most extravagant conceits of imagination, and converted many parts of the Word of God into anagrams and conundrums. There are many works of this kind extant, of which the Rabbith, Medrashim, and the book Zohar, a Cabalistic commentary on the five books of Moses, are among the most celebrated.

7. The Commentary on Daniel by Rabbi Susias Gaon, called Rashag from the initials of his name, written about A. D. 920, who also translated the Scriptures into Arabic, as before stated.

8. The Commentary on the entire Bible, by Rabbi Solomon Jarchi, or Isaac, called also Rashi, a native of Troyes, in Champagne, who flourished about A. D. 1140. Though deservedly held in high estimation by the Jews, it is so obscure in some places as to require a large comment to make it intelligible.

9. The Commentaries of Rabbi Abraham Aben Ezra, a justly-celebrated Spanish Jew, who flourished about 1160. They are written in an elegant style, though his love of brevity sometimes renders them obscure; and are deservedly esteemed by both Jews and Christians.

10. The Moreh Nevochim, or Teacher of the Perplexed, a celebrated work of Rabbi Moses ben Maimon, also called Rambam, and commonly Maimonides, who flourished about A. D. 1160. It is a learned, useful, and valuable work, deservedly held in the highest repute; containing a very excellent explanation and illustration of the most difficult words and things in the sacred writings, especially with respect to phrases, metaphors, parables, symbols, allegories, laws, and customs. His abridgment of the Talmud is also highly esteemed, being deemed more valuable than the original.

11. The Comment of Rabbi David Kimchi, also called Radak, a native of Spain, who flourished about 1220. It is a very excellent and valuable work, particularly that on the prophet Isaiah.

12. The Short Notes or Observations on the Pentateuch, principally cabalistic, by Rabbi Jacob Bonit Hattarim, who flourished about A. D. 1300.

13. The Commentaries of Rabbi Leri ben Gershom, also called Rabdag, a Spanish Jew and physician, who died A. D. 1370. His writings on the Scriptures are much esteemed, especially his comment on the Pentateuch.

14. The extensive Commentaries of Rabbi Isaac Abarbanel, or Abravanel, a Portuguese Jew, who was born A. D. 1437, and died in 1503. Notwithstanding his inveterate enmity against Christianity, they are highly esteemed both by Christians and Jews.

15. The Scholia on the entire O. T., by Rabbi Solomon Abenmelech, a native of Spain, who flourished in the 16th century.

16. Select Notes or Observations on the Books of Samuel, by Rabbinoos Isaiyah. The Commentaries of these Rabbins, with the Masorah and Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, and the Jerusalem Targum, are inserted in the Biblio Rabbinica of Bomberg, and also that of Buxtorf. They are of great service in illustrating the rites and ceremonies of the Mosaic Law; and are of great use to Christians in their controversies with the Jews.*

17. The following are the apostolic and primitive fathers, and doctors of the Christian church, whose works either illustrate or confirm the sacred writings.

1. Barnabas, the apostle, and fellow-laborer of St. Paul (Ac. 13:2, 3, 46, 47, 14: 14, 16, 19:4-7), the author of an Epistle which was held in the greatest esteem, and which is still extant: it contains many citations from the O. T., and the exact words of several texts of the N. T. It is, however, considered by several writers to be a spurious production, as well as the Gospels attributed to him. It was first published by Abp. Usher in Greek and Latin, Oxford, 1613, and afterwards translated by Abp. Wake, in his Genuine Epistles of the Apostolic Fathers, published by S. Bagster, Lond. 1817.

2. Clemens Romanus, or Clement of Rome, said to have been a fellow-laborer of St. Paul, and bishop of Rome, A. D. 91, who died in the 3d year of Trajan, A. D. 109. He wrote a much admired Epistle to the name of the church of Rome, to the Corinthians, to quiet the dissensions that prevailed there, which is still extant; and contains many passages which exhibit the words of Christ as they stand in the Gospels, and citations from most of the Epistles. The last edition of this Epistle is that of Wotton, Cantab. 1718.

3. Hermas, also a contemporary of St. Paul, by whom he is mentioned in the Epistle to the Romans (16:1), wrote a work, in three Books, called the Pastor or Shepherd, which was highly esteemed by the early fathers. It was originally written in Greek, though now extant only in a Latin version; and it contains numerous allusions to the N. T.

4. Irenaeus, who was bishop of Antioch, A. D. 70, and suffered martyrdom A. D. 107, has left several Epistles which are still extant, in which he has distinctly quoted the Gospels of Matthew and John, and cited, or alluded to, the Acts and most of the Epistles; the best edition of which is that published at Oxford, 1703.

5. Polyarpas, the disciple of St. John, by whom he was appointed bp. of Smyrna, who suffered martyrdom at that place about A. D. 167. Of the various writings which he is recorded to have left, only his Epistle to the Philippians remains, the best edition of which is that of Oxford, 1703, where it is annexed to the works of Ignatius. It is simple and modest, replete with useful precepts and rules of life, and contains nearly forty allusions to the books of the N. T.

6. Papias, bp. of Hierapolis, in Asia, whose pell-mell life is placed between A. D. 110 and 116. He was well acquainted with Polyarpas and John the presbyter; and, in the few historical fragments which remain, he bears express testimony to the Gospels of Matthew and Mark, quotes the First Epistle of Peter and the First Epistle of John, and alludes to the Acts and Revelation.

7. Justin Martyr, who was born at Shechem, or Neapolis, in Palestine, about A. D. 80, a Platonic philosopher, was converted to Christianity A. D. 133, flourished chiefly from 110, and suffered martyrdom in 165 or 167. He wrote several pieces, of which his two Apologies for the Christians, and his Dialogue with Trypho the Jew, are all that are preserved. They are written in a plain and unadorned style, and contain numerous quotations from, as well as allusions to, the four Gospels, the Acts, the Epistle to the Romans, First Epistle to the Corinthians, the Epistles to the Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, and Colossians, the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians, the Epistle of Peter, and the Revelation. The best edition of his works is that of Paris, 1656; of his Apologies, 2 vols. 8vo, 1700, 1703; and of his Dialogue, Jebb's, Lond. 1722.

3. Irenaeus, a native of Greece, a disciple of Polycarp, and bp. of Lyons about A. D. 170. Of the various works which he wrote, his five Books against heresies, in Latin, are all that remain; in which we have his testimony, in one form or other, to every one of the books of the N. T. except the Epistle of Philemon, the 3d Epistle of John, and the Epistle of Jude. Fragments of his writings, in Greek, which have been preserved, prove that his style was simple, though clear and often animated. The best edition of his works is that of Grabe, Oxon. 1702.

9. Tatian, who is said to have been the follower or pupil of Justin Martyr, flourished about the year 172. He composed a Harmony of the Gospels, which he called, Of the four; and his Oration or Discourse against the Gentiles, which is said to have been the most useful of his writings, contains several quotations from, and allusions to, the Gospels. The best edition of his works is that of Worth, Oxon. 1700.

10. Athenagoras, a Christian philosopher, and a native of Athens, in the age of Aurelius, is the most polished and elegant writer of Christian antiquity, and died about A. D. 177. He wrote an Apology for the Christians, and a Treatise on the Resurrection, in which he has indisputably quoted the Gospels of Matthew and John, the Epistle to the Romans, and the two Epistles to the Corinthians. The best edition of his works is that of Dechir, Oxon. 1706.

11. Theophilus, bp. of Antioch, about A. D. 190, in his three Books to Autolyces, has evident allusions to the Gospels of Matthew and John, the Epistle to the Romans, and the First Epistle to Timothy. The best edition is that of Wolf, Hamb. 1724.

12. Tertullian, a presbyter of the church of Carthage, who was born in the year 160, and died about the year 220. He was converted from paganism to Christianity, of which he became an able advocate by his writings, which show that he possessed a lively imagination, impetuous eloquence, elevated style, and strength of reasoning. The most celebrated and esteemed of his numerous writings are his Apology for the Christians, and his Prescriptions. They are filled with long quotations by name, and with long extracts from all the Books of the N. T., except the Epistle of James, the Second Epistle of Peter, and the Second and Third Epistles of John. The best edition of his works is that of Semler, Hal. 1770; and of his Apology, that of Havercamp, Lug. Bat. 1718.

13. Clemens Alexandrinus, or Clement of Alexandria, the preceptor of Origen, who flourished about the year 206, and died in 220. In his works, which are various, elegant, and full of erudition, he gives an account of the order in which the four Gospels were written, and frequently and amply quotes almost all the books of the N. T. The best edition is that of Potter, Oxon. 1715.

14. Origen, a native of Alexandria, where he chiefly resided, was born A. D. 185, and suffered martyrdom in the 69th year of his age, A. D. 254. He was not more distinguished by his learning and eloquence, and the sublimity of his genius, than by the easiness of his manner, his humility, modesty, and unaffected piety. Besides the celebrated Hexapla, which first gave the hint for the formation of polyglot Bibles, he wrote an able answer to the treatise of Celcius, an Epicurean philosopher, against the Christians; Scholia, or short notes explanatory of difficult passages of Scripture; and Commentaries and Homilies on the whole of the Bible. The great fault of this eminent man was that of allegorizing the Scriptures to excess, in using fanciful and mystical interpretations on the sacred text, on almost every occasion. The best edition of his works is that of the Benedictine monks, 4 vols. folio, Paris, 1733-59.

15. Julius Africanus, who flourished about A. D. 222, wrote a chronicle, which was universally esteemed, in which he reckons 5500 years from the creation to the age of Julius Caesar, nothing of which remains but what Eusebius has preserved. In a letter to Origen, he proved the history of Susannah to be supposititious; and, in another to Aristides, still extant, he endeavours to reconcile the apparent contradictions in the genealogy of Christ, as given by Matthew and Luke.

16. Hippolytus, who flourished about A. D. 130, wrote many things on the Scriptures, in which there are several references to most of the books of the N. T. His works have been edited by Fabricius, Hamb. 1716.

17. Ammonius, who opened a school of Platonic philosophy at Alexandria, A. D. 232, which was attended by Origen and Plotinus, composed a Harmony of the Gospels. His treatise Hippi Opitior was published by Valekenaer, Lug. Bat. 1739.

18. Dionysius Alexandrinus, bp. of Alexandria, and a pupil of Origen, flourished about the year 247, and has numerous testimonies to the N. T. in his writings.

19. Cyprian, who was bp. of Carthage, A. D. 213, and suffered martyrdom A. D. 253, wrote 21 letters, and several treatises, in which we have most copious quotations from nearly all the books of the N. T. The best editions of his works are that of Fell, Oxon. 1632, and that reprinted at Amsterdam, 1700.

20. Gregory Thaumaturgus, a disciple of Origen, was bp. of Neo-caesarea, A. D. 240, and died in the year 266. Of his works are extant his gratulatory address to Origen, an epistle, and several treatises in Greek, in which there are numerous testimonies to the N. T. The best edition is that of Paris, 1622.

21. Arnobius, a philosopher and teacher of rhetoric at Sicea, in Africa, being converted to Christianity, composed, about the year 300, his celebrated treatise, Adversus Gentes, in which he exposed the absurdity of irreligion, and ridiculed the heathen gods. It is a work of extensive erudition, and proves his acquaintance with the N. T. The best edition is the quarto, printed at Lug. Bat. 1651.

22. Lactantius, the pupil of Arnobius, who died A. D. 325, besides his works De Ira Divini and De Dei Operibus, composed his elegant treatise of the Divine Institutions, in 7 books—an elaborate vindication of the Christian religion, in which he proves its truth, refutes objections, and attacks the illusions and absurdities of paganism. The best editions of his works are, that of Sparke, Oxon. 1681, that of Bonman, Lips. 1739, and that of Du Fresnoy, Paris, 1713.

23. Cyrillus Hierosolymitanus. Cyril, bp. of Jerusalem, was born A. D. 315, and died A. D. 366. Of his writings, composed in Greek, there remain 23 catacheses, and a letter to the emperor Constantine, the best edition of which is that of Milles, Oxon. 1703.

24. Athanasius, who was bp. of Alexandria A. D. 326, and died A. D. 373, is celebrated for his sufferings, and his determinate opposition to Arius and his doctrine. His writings, which were numerous, and some of which have perished, contain a defence of the doctrine of the Trinity, the divinity of the Word and the Holy Spirit, and an apology to Constantine. The creed which bears his name is supposed by some not to be his composition. His works were published by the Benedictines, Paris, 1693.

25. Epiphanius, bp. of Salamis, who was born A. D. 320, and died A. D. 403. He was active in refuting the writings of Origen; but his compositions are more valuable for the fragments they preserve, than for their own intrinsic merit. They were published by Dionysius Petavius, Paris, 1622.

26. Eusebius, bp. of Cesarea, where he is supposed to have been born A. D. 270, and flourished about the year 325, was in great favor with the emperor Constantine, and was concerned in the disputes of Arius and Athanasius. He distinguished himself by his learned and numerous writings, most of which are lost; the most celebrated of which were his Ecclesiastical History, Evangelical Preparation, Evangelical Demonstration, and Chronicle. The best edition of his Præparatio and Demonstratio Evangelica is by Vigerus, Rothom. 1628; and of his Ecclesiastical History, by Reading, Cantab. 1720.

27. Gregory Nazianzen, surnamed the Dixine, was born A. D. 323, and died A. D. 393; and was bp. of Constantinople, which he resigned on its being disputed. His writings rival those of the most celebrated orators of Greece, in eloquence, sublimity, and variety; and his sermons, though more adapted for philosophers than common hearers, are replete with seriousness and devotion. The best edition of his works is that of the Benedictines, Paris, 1778.

28. Basil the Great, bp. of Scelencia, was born in Cappadocia, A. D. 328, and died A. D. 379. He refuted the tenets of the Arians with great warmth, but with great ability and eloquence. He was an elegant writer; and Erasmus places him among the greatest orators of antiquity. His works were published by the Benedictines, Paris, 1721.

29. Juvencus, a Spaniard, and one of the first Christian poets, who flourished about A. D. 329, wrote the Evangelical History in heroic verse, which has fallen into oblivion.

30. Hieronymus, or Jerome, who was born in Pannonia, about A. D. 330, and died in 420, besides his celebrated version of the Vulgate, was the author of Commentaries on the Prophets, Ecclesiastes, Matthew, and the Epistles of Paul to the Galatians, Ephesians, Titus, and Philemon, of a History of Ecclesiastical Writers, of various treatises on different subjects, and of a number of elegant and useful Epistles. Of his works, which are replete with lively animation, sublimity, and profound erudition, the best edition is that of D. Vallarsius, Verona, 1731-1742.

31. Gregory Nyssen, the author of the Nicene creed, who was born in Cappadocia, A. D. 331, and died in the year 396, wrote Commentaries on Scripture, moral discourses, sermons, dogmatical treatises, and panegyrics on saints; the best edition of which is that of Morell, Paris, 1615.

32. Ambrosius, abp. of Milan, who was born A. D. 310, and died A. D. 397, distinguished himself by his writings, especially against the Arians. His three books De Officiis, and eight hymns on the creation, are still extant; the best edition of which is that of the Benedictines, Paris, 1686.

33. John Chrysostom, bp. of Constantinople, who was born A. D. 344, and died A. D. 407, is well known, and justly celebrated for his learning, skill, and eloquence, in his elegant homilies on the sacred writings. His works were nobly and correctly edited by Saville, Eton, 1613; and again by Montfaucon, with a Latin version, Paris, 1718-1738.

34. Hilarius Pietavensis. Hilary, bp. of Poitiers, in France, who flourished A. D. 350, and died A. D. 372, wrote several treatises, the most celebrated of which is that on the Trinity, in twelve books, and Commentaries on the Psalms and on the Gospel of St. Matthew, which are said to consist more of what he borrowed from Origen, than of the results of his own studies. His works were printed by the Benedictines, Paris, 1693; and again at Verona, 1730.

35. Ephraim Syrus, or the Syrian, deacon of Edessa, who might rather be said to have mourned than flourished, about A. D. 360, and who died in 379, has written some very valuable expositions of various parts of Scripture, which may be found in his works, Syriac and Greek, published by Assemann, Rom. 1737, &c.

36. Augustine, bp. of Hippo, in Africa, who was born A. D. 354, and died A. D. 430, wrote a variety of Treatises on the Scriptures, and particular Commentaries on the Psalms, which rather display his piety and indefatigable application, sublime genius, and the acuteness of his wit, than the solidity and accuracy of his judgment, or the extent of his learning. The best edition of his numerous works is that of the Benedictines, Antw. 1700-1703.

37. Nomus, who flourished A. D. 410, wrote (besides an account of his embassy to Ethiopia, among the Saracens and other Eastern nations, and also Dionysius, a wonderful collection of heathen mythology and erudition), a Paraphrase of the Gospel of St. John, in Greek hexameters, edited by Hein-sius, Lug. Bat. 1627.

38. Cyrillus Alexandrinus, Cyril, patriarch of Alexandria, A. D. 412, and who died A. D. 444; the best edition of whose writings, which are chiefly controversial, is that of Paris, 1638.

39. Theodore, bp. of Cyropolis, in Syria, flourished A. D. 425; and though he chiefly follows Chrysostom in his Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles, he has added many new and striking observations of his own. The best edition of his works is that of Schulz and Noesselt, Hal. 1769-1774.

40. Isidorus Pelusiota, or Isidore of Pelusium, a disciple of Chrysostom, flourished A. D. 431; of whose Epistles 2012 remain, written in Greek with conciseness and elegance, the best edition of which is that of Paris, 1638.

41. Euthalinus, supposed to have been bp. of Sulea, in Egypt, flourished about A. D. 458, and wrote a critical work on the Acts of the Apostles.

42. Dionysius Areopagita, or the Areopagite, falsely so called, flourished about A. D. 490; the best edition of whose works is that of Antwerp, 1634.

43. The Opus Imperfatum, an ancient unfinished Commentary on St. Matthew's Gospel, written about A. D. 500.

44. Gregory the Great, bp. of Rome, flourished A. D. 590, and wrote Commentaries which are greatly esteemed, especially by the Catholics, which were edited by the Benedictines, Paris, 1703.

45. Maximus, a native of Constantinople, who died about 652; whose works were edited by Combes, Paris, 1675.

46. Venerable Bede, born at Wearmouth, in Durham, A. D. 673, wrote Comments, or rather composed catena on the principal books of the Old and New Testaments, from the writings of the fathers, in which he interspersed but few original remarks. His works were printed at Colonna, 1633.

47. Alcuinus Flaccus, the countryman of Bede, flourished about 730, and compiled a commentary on some parts of the Scriptures, which are to be found in the 1st volume of Fröben's edition of his works.

48. Rabanus Maurus, abp. of Menth, who studied under Alcuin at Tours, flourished about A. D. 800, and was one of the most voluminous commentators since Origen. Besides his numerous commentaries, there is a glossary of his on the whole Bible, in MS., in the Imperial Library at Vienna.

49. Wulfridus Strabus, or Strabo, who died A. D. 846, in the 43d year of his age, composed a work on the Old and New Testament, entitled Glossae Ordinariae, which is properly a catena, or collection of comments of the Greek and Latin fathers, prior to his time; in which he endeavors to show the literal, historical, and moral sense of the inspired writers. The best edition of this valuable work is that of Antwerp, 1634.

50. Ecumenius, bp. of Tricea, in Thessaly, flourished in the middle of the 10th century, and wrote, in Greek, commentaries on the Acts of the Apostles, and the whole of the Epistles. His work is a judicious compilation from Origen, Chrysostom, and other fathers; the best edition of which is that of Paris, 1631.

51. Theophylact, metropolitan of Bulgaria, flourished about A. D. 1070, and wrote scholia on the principal books of Scripture, abridged from Chrysostom. His comment on the Gospels, Acts, and the Epistles of St. Paul, is particularly valuable. The best ed. of his works is that of Venice, 1754-1763.

52. Euthymius Zigabeus, a monk of Constantinople, in the early part of the 12th century, wrote Commentaries on different parts of Scripture, the whole of which have not been printed. His principal work, a Commentary on the four Gospels, was published by Matthai at Leipsic, 1792, and his Commentary on the Psalms was published with the works of Theophylact. The hitherto inedited Greek text is diligently revised from two MSS. in the library of the Holy Synod at Moscow, written in the time of the author.

53. Thomas Aquinas, a celebrated scholastic doctor of the 13th century, compiled a catena on the four Gospels, from upwards of 80 Greek and Latin fathers, whose words he chiefly gives, and quotes the Greek fathers from Latin versions. His comment long held a distinguished place in the Western church; and is to be found in the 4th and 5th volumes of his works, Venice, 1755.

54. Nicholas de Lyra, or Lyronus, so called from the place of his nativity, a small town of Normandy, is reputed to have been a Jew by descent, but having embraced Christianity, he entered the religious society of Friars Minor at Verneuil. He flourished in 1300, and wrote compendious Comments on the whole Bible; in which he availed himself of his intimate knowledge of Hebrew to select the best comments of the most learned Rabbins, particularly Jarchi. His notes are allowed to be very judicious, though occasionally intermingled with the subtleties of the schoolmen; and he principally attends to the literal sense, with which he shows a greater acquaintance than any preceding commentator. He frequently reprobates many of the reigning abuses of the church; and it is supposed that Martin Luther borrowed from him much of that light which brought about the reformation.*

CHAPTER II.

HISTORICAL AND PHYSICAL GEOGRAPHY.

How is it possible that we should trace the wanderings of Abraham, that great patriarch, and the various toils and travels of Jacob, and the seed of Israel, in successive ages, without some geographical knowledge of those countries? How can our meditations follow the apostles in their laborious journeys through Europe and Asia, their voyages, their perils, their shipwrecks, and the fatigues they endured for the sake of the gospel, unless we are instructed by descriptions, maps, and tables?†

§ 1.—Various Names of the Country.

1. THE LAND OF CANAAN.—This name is derived from the descendants of Canaan, grandson of Noah, its earliest inhabitants. These were either destroyed, expelled, or rendered tributaries by the Israelites, in conformity with the prediction of Noah, Ge. 9:25. It should be remarked, however, that under this name the whole of the land was not comprehended, but only that part of it which lay W. of Jordan. See Nu. 35:11, 33:51. Jos. 22:11, &c.

2. THE LAND OF ISRAEL was a name given to it after its conquest by Joshua, and its division among the tribes (see 1 S. 13:19. 2 K. 6:23, &c.); and comprehended the whole of the territory possessed by the 12 tribes, on each side of Jordan. See 2 K. 11:25. 1 Ch. 13:2.

3. THE LAND OF GOD, not in that sense in which the entire world is said to be the Lord's, but in a peculiar sense. See 1 E. 25:23. Ps. 85:1. Ho. 9:3. 1 Jo. 16:32. He was the Sovereign, and granted the use of his territories to the children of Israel. He brought them in with a strong arm, expelling its former inhabitants for their impieties. His sovereignty was acknowledged by his people, in the presentation of their first-fruits, and in the consecration of the sabbatic years. Besides this, He fixed his habitation here, saying, ‘This is my rest forever:—here will I dwell; for I have desired it.’ Ps. 132:11. His temple, his priests, and his worship, consecrated the favored land.

4. THE LAND OF PROMISE.—So called (He. 11:9) from the promise made to Abraham, that it should be given to his seed as their inheritance. Ge. 12:7, &c. This did not include the region on the East of the Jordan, that not having formed part of the promise,

5. THE HOLY LAND.—So called by the Jews, because it was the chosen and consecrated spot in which the one true God was acknowledged and worshipped; and by Christians, because it was the scene of the manifestation and mediatorial work of the Messiah. The Jews entertained very high notions of the exclusive sanctity of their own land, esteeming its very dust to be holy, and every other part of the world to be profane and polluted. Hence they were accustomed, on their arrival in Judea, from any of the places without its limits, to rub off the dust from their shoes, lest their inheritance should be defiled. Lightfoot thinks there is allusion to this in Mat. 10:11.

6. THE LAND, AND THE EARTH.—The Holy Land is frequently spoken of under these terms (see Ru. 1:1. Jer. 1:20. 22:29. Lam. 1:25, &c.), by way of eminence or distinction; or, perhaps, out of contempt to the Gentile nations, whom the Jews considered as nothing—a people who had no being—who were yet to be created. See Ps. 99:31. 102:13. Ho. 1:10, &c. §

7. JUDIA; a name that originally distinguished the southern part of the land, occupied by the tribe of Judah; but which, after the return from the captivity, appears to have been given to the whole country.

8. PALESTINE was a name derived from the Philistines, who had settled on the eastern coast of the Mediterranean Sea, and with whom the Israelites were frequently at war.*

9. By profane writers, the Holy Land has been variously termed SYRIA, SYRIA-PALESTINE, CÆLO-SYRIA, IDUMEA, and PHENICIA.†

§ 2.—Situation and Limits.

1. The Jews affirm that the Holy Land is situated in exactly the centre of the world; be this as it may, it is situate in the centre of the three continents that were anciently inhabited, and therefore most wisely chosen to be the depository of the oracles of God. The Africans could not go out of Suez, their only passage between the Red Sea and the Mediterranean, to enter into Arabia, without making Palestine in their way. The Arabians, coming out of their deserts, met the river Jordan. The Europeans, when at the end of their longest courses on the Mediterranean, arrived in Greater Asia, upon the confines of Palestine. And the Persians, and other Eastern nations, could not pass the Euphrates, and visit the provinces of the west and the south, without coming into the countries near Syria and Palestine.‡ [And history informs us that all the powerful nations of antiquity, except the Chinese, have met in Palestine: the same may be said of modern, and, perhaps, future times.]

2. In the map, this country presents the appearance of a narrow slip, extending along the eastern coast of the Mediterranean; from which, to the river Jordan, the utmost width does not exceed 50 miles. It is situate in the 5th climate, between the 31st and 34th degrees of N. latitude; having the Mediterranean Sea on the W.; Lebanon and Syria on the N.; Arabia Deserta, and the land of the Ammonites, Moabites, and Midianites, on the E.; the river of Egypt (the Sihor, Jos. 13:3. Jer. 2:18), the desert of Zin, the S. shore of the Dead Sea, and the river Arnon, on the S.; and Egypt, on the S. W. Near the N. boundary stood the city of Dan, and near the S. extremity, Beer-sheba; whence in the sacred writings the expression, ‘from Dan to Beer-sheba,’ is used to denote the whole length of the country. Its extreme length was about 190 miles, and its width about 80. The boundaries of the land are most accurately described by Moses, in Nu. 34:1–15.

3. But the real boundary of the Holy Land, on the W. side, did not continue so distinct and simple in the succeeding periods as the law would have made it, because the Israelites desisted from expelling the Philistines and the Canaanites; David having first fully executed what the lawgiver commanded on this head.§

4. The kingdom of this prince and his son Solomon, however, extended far beyond these limits. In a N. E. direction it was bounded only by the river Euphrates, and included a considerable part of Syria. It is stated that Solomon had dominion over all the region on the W. side of the Euphrates, from Thiphash (or Thapsacus), on that river, in lat. 35° 20', to Azzal, or Gaza. ‘Tadmor in the wilderness’ (Palmyra), which the Jewish monarch is said (2 Ch. 8:4) to have built (i. e. either founded or fortified), is considerably to the N. E. of Damascus, being only a day’s journey from the Euphrates; and Hamath, the Epiphania of the Greeks (still called Hamah), in the territory belonging to which city Solomon had several ‘store cities,’ is seated on the Orontes, in

lat. 34° 45' N. On the E. and S. E. the kingdom of Solomon was extended by the conquest of the country of Moab, of the Ammonites, and of Edom; and tracts which were either inhabited or pastured by the Israelites, lay still further E. Maon, which belonged to the tribe of Judah, and was situated in or near the desert of Paran (Jos. 15:55. 1 S. 23:24. 252), is described by Abulfeda as the farthest city of Syria toward Arabia, being two days’ journey beyond Zoar.||

5. Within this district, such were the advantages of the soil and climate, added to the peculiar modes of cultivation adopted, that there existed, in the happiest periods of the Jewish nation, an immense population.¶ The men able to bear arms in the time of Moses somewhat exceeded 600,000; including the Levites, nearly 620,000. If, according to the usual principle of calculation, we admit the whole people, women and children included, to have been 4 times as many, we shall then have nearly 2,500,000 souls for the amount of the population. Allowing something further on account of polygamy and slavery, Michaelis concludes that the number of people Moses had to carry into Palestine could not have been less than 3,000,000. In the reign of David, when the kingdom was so much extended, the population, women and children included, amounted to 5,000,000, to which we must add the tributary Canaanites, and other conquered nations.*

§ 3.—Inhabitants of the Country.

When the land of Canaan was first promised to the seed of Abraham (Ge. 10:15–18), the people who inhabited it were, the Sidonians, on the N. W., afterwards famous for commerce; the Hittites, on the S. W., near Hebron; the Jebusites at Jebus, afterwards Jerusalem; the Amorites, between the Hittites and the Dead Sea; the Gergashites, near the Sea of Tiberias; the Hivites, at Hermon; the Arkites, at Arka, opposite the N. extremity of Lebanon; the Sinites, S. of the Arkites; the Arvadites, at Arvad, in the island Aradus, and its neighborhood; the Zemarites, S. of the Arvadites; and the Hamathites, at Hamath, in the N. extremity of the land.

The following are the principal divisions to which this country has been subject:—

1. JOSHUA, upon the conquest of the land, divided it into 12 portions, which were distributed among the 12 tribes, by lot, according to their families; so that in this division every tribe and every family received their lot and share by themselves, distinct from all the other tribes. In this division among the tribes, the northern parts were assigned to the tribes of Asher, Naphtali, Zebulun, and Issachar; the middle parts to that of Ephraim, and the half-tribe of Manasseh; the southern parts to those of Judah, Dan, Benjamin, and Simeon; and the country beyond Jordan, to those of Reuben, Gad, and the other half-tribe of Manasseh. The relative situation of the tribes will be seen by consulting a map of Judea.||| [See this map in vol. I. p. 605.] The tribe of Levi, who would make a 13th, being selected for the immediate service of God, possessed no lands, but was dispersed among the other tribes. Forty-eight cities, thence called Levitical cities, were appropriated to the residence of this tribe (Nu. 35:7), with the tenth and first-fruits of the estates of their brethren.

* Hales makes it Sauerit, Pali-schan, ‘shepherd land;’ † were the obscure Pelasgi, and worshippers of Baal or Bel, generally, that ancient (Cuthite?) race, called wandering masons, &c., who seem early to have possessed extensive power, fragments of which have alone come within the domain of authentic history; while fable recounts their exploits as giants, and existing Cyclopean structures all over the world attest their rude force? Capt. Wilford notes two migrations from India, in ancient times; one of a sacred race, another, afterwards, of the Pali or Shepherds. See Hales’s Chron. vol. IV. pp. 425, 427, &c. Eo.

‡ Le Pluche, Truth of the Gospel demonstrated, vol. I. p. 99.

§ The conquest of Canaan by the Israelites has often furnished a ground of complaint to the impugners of revelation. For a satisfactory vindication of the cities assigned to the Levites, the Kohathites received 23, the Gershonites 13, and the Merarites 12. Some writers have supposed that all the Levitical cities were asyla, or cities of refuge. But this is a mistake; for among the cities given to the Levites (Nu. 35:6), only 6 are appointed to be cities of refuge, whether the inadvertent manslayer might flee, and find an asylum from his pursuers, and be secreted from the effects of private revenge, till cleared or condemned by a legal process. And it is observable that the Israelites are commanded to ‘prepare the way,’ i. e. to make the road good, ‘that every slayer may fly thither’ without impediment, and with all expedition. De. 19:3. The rabbins inform us, among other circumstances, that at every cross-road was set up an inscription—‘Refuge, Refuge.’ It was, probably, in allusion to this circumstance that John the Baptist is described as ‘the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight.’—He was the Messiah’s forerunner, and in that character was to remove the obstacles to men’s flying to Him as their Asylum, and obtaining the salvation of God.||

2. SOLOMON was the next who made a considerable division of the land, separating it into 12 provinces, or districts, and placing each under a peculiar officer: the names of these, and also of the cantons over which they presided, will be found in I K. 4:7–19. [See a map of these divisions in the frontispiece to vol. II.]

3. REHOBOAM’s accession to the throne was soon followed by the revolt of the ten tribes, who erected themselves into a separate kingdom, under Jeroboam, and were distinguished as the kingdom of Israel; while the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, continuing faithful to Rehoboam, formed the kingdom of Judah. [See the map, frontisp. to vol. II.] The latter kingdom contained all the southern parts of the land, consisting of the allotments of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, and so much of the territories of Dan and Simeon as were intermixed with that of Judah. The royal city, during the continuance of this kingdom, was Jerusalem, in the tribe of Benjamin. The former kingdom contained all the middle and northern parts of the land, with the country beyond Jordan, consisting of the rest of the tribes; its capital was Samaria, in the tribe of Ephraim, situated about 30 miles N. of Jerusalem. This division ceased on the subdivision of the kingdom of Israel by Shalmaneser, king of Assyria (B. C. 723), after it had flourished 250 years. [See the map of the several captivities, frontispiece to vol. III.]

4. The ROMANS were in possession of the land during the times of the N. T. history, when we find several great divisions. Thus the whole space between the Mediterranean and the river Jordan had three; viz. JUDEA, on the south; SAMARIA, in the middle; and GALILEE, on the north; and the space between Jordan and the heights of Gilead had two; viz. PERSEA and IDUMEA. [See the map, vol. IV. p. 1.]

(1) JUDEA, which was the southernmost division, and comprehended the original portions of the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, Simeon, and Dan. The following is the account which Josephus has given of this part of the country: ‘The S. parts, if they be measured lengthwise, are bound by a village adjoining the confines of Arabia, called by the Jews who dwell there, Jordan; and its northern limit, where it joins Samaria, ria, is the village Annath, also called Boreos: its breadth, however, is extended from the river Jordan to Joppa, on the shore of the Mediterranean. The city of Jerusalem is situated in the very middle, on which account some have, with sagacity enough, called that city the 'navel' of the country. Nor is Judea destitute of such delicacies as come from the sea, since its maritime places extend as far as Ptolemais. It was divided into 11 portions, of which the royal city of Jerusalem was the chief, and presided over the neighboring country, as the head over the body. As for the other cities, which were inferior to it, they presided over their several toparchies. Gophna was the second of them; Acerabba the next; after them Thamma, Lydda, Emmaus, Pella, Idumea, Engedi, Herodum, and Jericho; and after these came Jamnia and Joppa, as presiding over the neighboring people.^{*} From the Mishna we learn, that this division was considered under four aspects, viz. the W., which lay along the Mediterranean, and in which was the land of the Philistines; the mountainous or pastoral district; the plain, which lay farther E., and inclined towards Jordan; and the vale or flat, which bordered on the banks of that river. The whole of this division was often denominated the south country; because it lay to the S. of Samaria, and was, as before stated, the most S. division of the Holy Land. Hasselquist has described the soil and appearance of this part of the land with much accuracy (Travels, pp. 126, 127), to whom the reader is referred.

(2) SAMARIA was the middle division of the country on this side Jordan. It began at Aanath and Acerabba (a day's journey N. of Jerusalem), and extended to Ginea, in the Great Plain. The following is Josephus's description of it: 'It is entirely of the same nature as Judea, for both countries are made up of hills and valleys, are moist enough for agriculture, and are very fertile. They have abundance of trees, and are full of autumnal fruit, both that which grows wild, and that which is the effect of cultivation. They are naturally watered by many streams, but derive their chief moisture from rain-water, preserved in reservoirs during the dry season, of which they have no want; and as for those streams which they have, their waters are exceeding sweet. By reason also of the excellent grass which they have, their cattle yield more milk than those in other places; and what is the greatest sign of excellency and abundance, they each of them are very full of people.'[†] Mr. Buckingham, who visited this spot in 1816, says: 'The description given of the face of the country, its soil and productions, as resembling that of Judea, is so far true, that both are composed of abrupt and rugged hills, and differ essentially from the plains of Galilee. But while in Judea the hills are mostly as bare as the imagination can paint them, and a few of the narrow valleys only are fertile; in Samaria, the very summits of the eminences are as well clothed as the sides of them. These, with the luxuriant valleys which they enclose, present scenes of unbroken verdure in almost every point of view, which are delightfully variegated by the picturesque forms of the hills and vales themselves, enriched by the occasional sight of wood and water, in clusters of olive and other trees, and rills and torrents running among them.'[‡] From the life of Josephus we learn that the length of Samaria, from N. to S., was 3 days' journey; for he states, 'that it is absolutely necessary for those who would go quickly to Jerusalem (from Galilee) to pass through that country; for in that road they might in 3 days' time go from Galilee to Jerusalem.'[§] We see also from this, that there was a natural as well as a moral reason for the evangelist saying of Christ (Jn. 4:1), that 'He must needs go through Samaria' to Jerusalem. This province comprehended the original possessions of Ephraim and Manasseh.

(3) GALILEE was the most N. division of Palestine, and contained the inheritances of Issachar, Zebulon, Naphtali, Asher, and part of that belonging to the E. half-tribe of Manasseh. It was one of the most extensive provinces of the Holy Land; and is divided by Josephus into the Upper and the Lower Galilee. The Upper Galilee abounded in mountains, and was eminently understood by the term 'Galilee of the Gentiles,' or 'Galilee of the Nations,' as the mountainous nature of the country enabled those who possessed the fastnesses to defend themselves against invaders. Strabo enumerates among its inhabitants, Egyptians, Arabians, and Phoenicians.^{||} It extended principally beyond Jordan, inclining toward the Trachonitis, Libanus, and Batanea. In proof of this, Calmet has noticed, among other things, that Judas Gaulonitis is called the Galilean (Ac. 5:37), and we know that Gaulon was beyond Jordan. So also was Bethsaida; but the disciples who were of this city were called Galileans. The testimony of Josephus is to the same effect, who assigns the limits of the entire Galilee thus: 'It is terminated W. by Ptolemais and Carmel (which do not belong to Galilee); on the S. by the country of Samaria and Sebopolis, on the river Jordan; on the east by the cantons of Hippus, Gadara, and Gaulon; on the N. by the confines of the Tyrians.'[¶] The Lower Galilee contains the plain of Esdrælon, which is nearly 50 miles in length, and 20 in breadth. It is described by Dr. Clarke as one vast meadow, covered with the richest pasture, enclosed on all sides by the mountains, and not having a single house or a tree within its extent. Josephus describes Galilee as very populous, containing 204 cities and towns, the least of which contained 15,000 inhabitants. The district of Galilee, as Dr. Wells remarks, was most honored with our Savior's presence. It was here that He was conceived; it was hither that Joseph and Mary returned with Him, then a child, out of Egypt; it was here He settled, and lived with his reputed father, and the blessed Virgin, his mother, till He began to be about 30 years of age, and was baptized of John; it was hither He returned after his baptism, and temptation by the devil; and, after his entrance upon his public ministry, though He frequently visited the other provinces, yet it was here that his dwelling-place was, whence He was called 'a Galilean'; and, lastly, it was here our Lord made his first appearance to the 11 disciples after his resurrection. To all which may be added, that the most considerable part, if not all, of his apostles, were of this country; whence they are all styled by the angels, 'men of Galilee.' Ac. 1:11.*

5. The divisions E. of the Jordan were, Perea on the N., and Idumea on the S.

(1) PEREA, properly so called, had its limits thus: Philadelphia, east; the Jordan, west; Macheron, south; and Pella, north.^{||} But under the appellation of Perea is sometimes included the whole country E. of the Jordan, (except the extreme south), comprising the cantons of Perea on the south; Batanea and Gaulonitis, in the middle; and Abilene, Iurea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis, on the north.[¶] The whole of this district was a fruitful country, abounding with pines, olive-trees, palm-trees, and other plants, which grew in the fields in great plenty and perfection; and even in the excessive hot seasons it was well watered and refreshed with springs and torrents from the mountains. The following is the language in which it is described by Mr. Buckingham: 'We had no sooner passed the summit of the second range (of hills beyond the Jordan), going down on its L. side by a very gentle descent, than we found ourselves on plains of nearly as high a level as the summits of the hills themselves, and certainly 300 feet, at least, above the streams of the Jordan. The character of the country, too, was quite different from any thing I had seen in Palestine, from my first landing at Soor to the present moment. We were now in a land of extraordinary richness, abounding with the most beautiful prospects, clothed with thick forests, varied with verdant slopes, and possessing extensive plains of a fine red soil, now covered with thistles as the best proof of its fertility, and yielding in nothing to the celebrated plains of Zebulon and Esdrælon, in Galilee and Samaria. We continued our way to the N. E. through a country the beauty of which so surprised us that we often asked each other what were our sensations; as if to ascertain the reality of what we saw, and persuade each other, by mutual confessions of our delight, that the picture before us was not an optical illusion. The landscape alone, which varied at every turn, and gave us new beauties from every different point of view, was, of itself, worth all the pains of an excursion to the eastward of Jordan to obtain a sight of; and the park-like scenes that sometimes softened the romantic wildness of the general character as a whole, reminded us of similar spots in less neglected lands.'^{||} Of the district of Batanea the same traveller thus speaks: 'We continued our way over this elevated tract, continuing to behold, with surprise and admiration, a beautiful country on all sides of us; its plains covered with a fertile soil, its hills clothed with forests, at every new turn presenting the most magnificent landscapes that could be imagined. Among the trees the oak was frequently seen, and we know that this territory produced them of old. In enumerating the sources whence the supplies of Tyre were drawn in the time of her great wealth and naval splendor, the prophet says, "Of the oaks of Bashan have they made thine oars." Ez. 27:6. Some learned commentators, indeed, believing that no oaks grew in these supposed desert regions, have translated this word by alders, to prevent the appearance of inaccuracy in the inspired writer. The expression of the "fat bulls of Bashan," which occurs more than once in the Scriptures, seemed to us equally inconsistent, as applied to the beasts of a country generally thought to be a desert, in common with the whole tract which is laid down in our modern maps as such, between the Jordan and Euphrates; || but we could now fully comprehend, not only that the bulls of this luxuriant country might be proverbially fat, but that its possessors, too, might be a race renowned for strength and comeliness of person.'[¶]

(2) IDUMEA.—This province composed the extreme S. part of the land, and also a small part of Arabia. During the captivity at Babylon, it seems to have been possessed by the neighboring Idumeans. Being conquered by the victorious arms of the Macabees, these people embraced Judaism, and thus became incorporated into the body of the Jewish nation. The tract inhabited by § 5.—The Face of the Country.

'Under a wise and salutary government, the produce of the Holy Land would exceed all calculation: its perennial harvest, the salubrity of its air, its limpid springs, its rivers, lakes, and matchless plains, its hills and vales; all these, added to the serenity of its climate, prove this land to be, indeed, a field which the Lord hath blessed. God hath given it of the dew of heaven, and the fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine.'[†] The limestone rocks and valleys are even now to be seen entirely covered with plantations of figs, vines, and olive-trees; scarcely a single spot seems to be neglected! The hills, from their bases to their upmost summits, are entirely covered with gardens, and in a high state of agricultural perfection. Even the sides of the most barren mountains are rendered fertile by being divided into terraces, like steps rising one above another. In many parts of the land the scenery is peculiarly grand. Lofty mountains give an outline of the most magnificent character; flowing beds of secondary hills soften the romantic wildness of the picture; gentle slopes, clothed with wood, give a rich variety of tints, hardly to be imitated by the pencil; deep valleys, filled with murmuring streams and verdant meadows, offer all the luxuriance of cultivation; and herds and flocks give life and animation to scenes as grand, as beautiful, and as highly picturesque, as the genius or taste of a Claude could either invent or desire.'

1. RIVERS, LAKES, and SEAS.—

1. The Jordan, or river of Dim, rises under the lofty peaks of the Anti-libanæus. The lake of Phiala, so called as resembling a bowl, whence it takes its rise, is about 15 miles N. E. of Cesarea. Philip the tetrarch, having thrown a quantity of chaff into the spring of Phiala, which issued out at Panium, a subterraneous passage between the two springs was thereby discovered, and Phiala ascertained to be the true source of Jordan.[‡]

(1) At its embouchure, the stream is deep and rapid, rolling a volume of waters from 2 to 300 feet in width, with a current so violent that an expert swimmer finds it impracticable to cross it. Dr. Shaw describes it, indeed, as not more than 30 yards broad; and Mandrell, as only about 20 yards over;

means of comparing the division of Palestine amongst the 12 tribes, with that adopted by the Romans during the first 3 centuries of the Christian era, and with that adopted by the Turks at the present day.

act course of the river. 'The valley of the Jordan, or El Ghor, which may be said to begin at the N. extremity of the lake of Tiberias, has near Bysan [Bethshan, or Seythopolis] a direction of N. by E. and S. by W. Its breadth is about 2 hours. The great number of rivulets which descend from the mountains on both sides, and form numerous pools of stagnant water, produce in many places a pleasing verdure, and a luxuriant growth of wild herbage and grass; but the greater part of the ground is a parched desert, of which a few spots only are cultivated by the Bedouins. In the neighborhood of Bysan, the soil is entirely of marl; there are very few trees; but wherever there is water, high reeds are found. The river Jordan, issuing from the lake of Tiberias, flows for about 3 hours near the W. hills, and then turns towards the Eastern, on which side it continues its course for several hours. The river flows in a valley of about a quarter of an hour in breadth, which is considerably lower than the rest of the plain of the Ghor: this low valley is covered with high trees of a luxuriant verdure, which afford a striking contrast with the sandy slopes that border it on both sides. The river where we passed it was about 30 paces broad, and about 3 feet deep: this, it must be recollect, was in the midst of summer. In the winter, it inundates the plain in the bottom of the narrow valley, but never rises to the level of the upper plain of the Ghor, which is at least 40 feet above the level of the river. The river is fordable in many places during summer, but the few spots where it may be crossed in the rainy season are known only to the Arabs.'[¶] It abounds with fish.

2. The lake of Tiberius, or sea of Galilee, was called, in more early times, the sea of Chinnereth, from a city of that name seated on it, belonging to the children of Naphthali (Jos. 19:35); and the edge of this sea on the other side Jordan, E., was made the W. boundary of the portion of Gad, who occupied all the cities of Gilead, and half the land of the children of Ammon. Jos. 13: 21-27. Gennesareth is considered by Calmet and Buckingham to have been the original name of this sea of Chinnereth, gradually corrupted; Galilee was the name given to it from its situation on the E. borders of that division of Palestine; and Tiberias, which is its most modern name, must have been bestowed on it after the building of the city bearing the same name by Herod. It is computed to be about 18 miles in length, and from 5 to 6 in breadth.^{} The description which Josephus has left us of this beautiful sheet of water is, like all the other pictures drawn by him, admirably faithful in the detail of local features. 'Now, this lake of Gennesareth is so called from the country adjoining to it. Its breadth is 40 furlongs, and its length 140; its waters are sweet, and very agreeable for drinking, for they are finer than the thick waters of other fens; the lake is also pure, and on every side ends directly at the shores, and at the sand; and it is also of a temperate nature when you draw it up, and of a more gentle nature than river or fountain water, and yet always cooler than one could expect in so diffuse a place as this is. Now, when this water is kept in the open air, it is as cold as that now which the country people are accustomed to make by night in summer. There are several kinds of fish in it, different both to the taste and sight from those elsewhere.'^{††} Mr. Clarke speaks of the uncommon grandeur of the memorable scenery of this spot. He describes the lake as being longer and finer than any of the Cumberland and Westmoreland lakes, although, perhaps, inferior to Loch Lomond. It does not possess the vastness of the lake of Geneva, although it much resembles it in certain points of view.

In picture-like beauty he states it to come nearest to the lake of Locomo in Italy, although it is destitute of any thing similar to the islands by which that majestic piece of water is adorned.* Viewing it from Tel Droom, Mr. Buckingham says, ' Its appearance is still grand. The barren aspect of the mountains on each side, and the total absence of wood, give, however, a cast of dulness to the picture; which is increased to melancholy by the dead east of its waters, and the silence which reigns throughout its whole extent, where not a boat or vessel of any kind is to be found. The waters of this lake, lying in a deep basin, surrounded on all sides with lofty hills, excepting only the narrow entrance and outlets of the Jordan at each extreme, are protected from long-continued tempests; and, like the Dead Sea, with which they communicate, are never violently agitated for any length of time. The same local features, however, render it occasionally subject to whirlwinds, squalls, and sudden gusts from the hollow of the mountains, which, as in every other similar basin, are of short duration, and the most furious gust is instantly succeeded by a calm. A storm of this description is evidently alluded to by the evangelist, where he says, ' There came down a storm of wind on the lake, and they were filled with water, and were in jeopardy—then He arose, and rebuked the wind and the raging of the water; and they ceased, and there was a calm.' Lu. 8:23-24. It was the old opinion, that the waters of the Jordan passed through the lake without mingling with it; and Pococke thought he noticed the stream to be of a different color. The fact is, that the water of the lake is clear, while that of the Jordan is muddy, and, of course, the strong current, in passing through the former, imparts to it a tinge of its own color.

3. The Dead Sea, or Lake Asphaltites, variously called in Scripture the Sea of the Plain, the Salt Sea, and the East Sea (De. 31:17. 149. Nu. 31:3. Jos. 15:5. Ez. 47:13. Jo. 2:20), is surrounded by high hills on three sides, some of them exhibiting frightful precipices, and on the N. it is bounded by the plain of Jericho, through which the Jordan flows into it. The Kedron, Arnon, and Zerka rush down the hills in torrents, and, along with other streams, discharge themselves into the lake. Its real size is not satisfactorily ascertained, ancient and modern writers materially disagreeing in their statements. Josephus affirms it to be 72 miles long, and 18 broad. Diodorus states it at 62 miles long, and $\frac{1}{2}$ broad. But the calculation of Pliny is much greater; for he says it is 100 miles long, and 25 wide, in the broadest part. Maundrell and Dr. Clarke agree with Josephus, and Pococke decides with Diodorus; whereas Mr. Bancks confidently affirms, that its utmost extent does not exceed 30 miles. Yet, as the editor of the Modern Traveller has judiciously remarked, the ancients were well acquainted with this sea. Josephus, Julius Africanus, and Pausanias, describe it from their own ocular evidence. Are we to conclude that the lake has contracted its dimensions, so as to be only half its ancient length? Supposing any change to have taken place in the depth of its basin, in the lapse of ages, during which the bituminous stores contained in the subterranean chambers of the abyss have been in a process of decomposition, this is not impossible. For as the whole of the plain is a flat, on a level with the sea, it is extremely probable that the waters anciently covered that whole extent; and a comparatively slight subsidence of the sea would convert the shallow into a marshy, and at length arid, plain. The waters of the Dead Sea are clear and limpid, but their specific gravity exceeds that of all other water known. Josephus and Tacitus say that no fish can live in them; and we are without satisfactory evidence that the lake contains any living thing. The mud is black, thick, and foul, and no plant vegetates in the water, which is reputed to have a petrifying quality. Neither do plants grow in the immediate vicinity of the lake, where everything is dull, cheerless, and inanimate; whence it is supposed to have derived the name of the Dead Sea. The water is extremely acrid, and the earth surrounding it is deeply impregnated with the same qualities, too predominant to admit of vegetable life; and even the air is saturated with them. Great quantities of asphaltum and sulphur are found on the edges of the lake, as well as a kind of stone or coal, which on attrition exhales an intolerable odor, and burns like bitumen: this is used by the inhabitants of the country for paving churches, mosques, and other places of public resort. As the lake is at certain seasons covered with a thick, dark mist, which is dissipated with the rays of the sun, some writers have alleged that black and sulphureous exhalations are constantly issuing from the water. Numerous swallows skim along the surface, and thence take up the water necessary to build their nests. An uncommon love of exaggeration is testified in all the older narratives, and in some of modern date, of the nature and properties of the water.¶

(1) The circumstance of this lake constantly receiving the waters of the Jordan, which Shaw computes to be about 6,000,000 tons daily, without overflowing its banks, although there is no visible outlet, induced Reland, Pococke, and other writers, to suppose that it must throw off its superfluous waters by some subterraneous channel. Dr. Hally has shown that the effect of evaporation in a hot climate will satisfactorily account for the phenomenon. The specific gravity of the water is found to be very great. Pococke, Van Egmont, Heyman, and Captain Mangles, affirm, that it is sufficiently buoyant to sustain persons, who could not swim, on its surface. And the question of its specific gravity has been set at rest by the chemical analysis of the waters made by Dr. Maret, whence it was found to be 1.211, that of fresh water being 1000.||

(2) The Dead Sea was produced by the exercise of divine wrath; and the scriptural account is explicit, that 'the Lord rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrha brimstone and fire from heaven' (Ge. 19:24), which may be safely interpreted as implying a shower of inflamed sulphur or nitre.

(3) The map in Bureckhardt's Travels in Syria, shows that the valley extends from the source of the Jordan to the Dead Sea, and then, encompassing that lake on its W. and E. sides, is continued from its S. extremity to the Elanitic Gulf of the Red Sea. This southern Ghor, or valley, is supposed by Mr. Leake to have been the ancient course of the Jordan, before the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrha, when the basin containing the Dead Sea was probably formed; and, consequently, that instead of its waters being evaporated, as they are now, when they emptied themselves into the Elanitic Gulf.¶ The direction of the valley, and the immense volume of water contained in the Jordan, render this conjecture extremely probable.

4. The Arnon is noticed here chiefly for the purpose of correcting an error relative to its course, which has been copied from D'Anville into most of our maps of Palestine. This river takes its rise at a short distance to the N. E. of Katrane, N. of Kerek (the ancient Karak Moaba), runs in a N. W.

direction (not a S. W. or W. direction, as generally but erroneously represented in maps) into the Dead Sea; passing by Ar, and consequently turning towards the valley in the plains of Moab, and to the top of Pisgah, which looketh towards Jeshimon.[†] Nu. 21:14-20. It now divides the province of Bedka from that of Kerek, as it formerly divided the small kingdoms of the Moabites and Amorites.

II. MOUNTAINS.

1. Lebanon, called by the Greeks and Latins Libanus, is a long chain of limestone mountains, extending from the neighborhood of Sidon westward, to that of Damascus eastward, and forming the northern boundary of the Holy Land. It consists of 2 principal ranges, and forms a kind of horse-shoe in its length, beginning 3 or 4 leagues from the Mediterranean, above Smyrna, and running from N. towards Sidon; from thence bending from W. to E. towards Damascus, and returning from the S., northward, from the strait of Damasens, as far as Laodicea. The W. part of this chain is properly Libanus; the other part, eastward, extends from S. to N., and is by the Greeks called Anti-Lebanon, because it is over against the other. Lebanon is composed of 4 enclosures of mountains, which rise one on the other. The first is very rich in grain and fruits; the second is barren, abounding in thorns, rocks, and flints; the third, though higher than this, enjoys a perpetual spring, the trees always green, and the orchards filled with fruit; the fourth is so high that it is constantly covered with snow, and is uninhabitable in consequence of the extreme cold. The most elevated summit of one of these ridges was called by the Hebrews Hermion; by the Sidonians, Sirion; and by the Amorites, Shein. De. 3:29. Volney says, 'Scarcely do we depart from Larneea in Cyprus, which is 30 furlongs distant, before we discover its summit, capped with snow. Now, since it is well known that snow, in this latitude, requires an elevation of 15 or 1600 fathoms, we may conclude that to be the height of Lebanon, and that it is consequently much lower than the Alps, or even the Pyrenees.'†† Its stately cedars are now considerably reduced, and verging fast to utter extinction. In less than half a century more, probably not one of these sylvan monuments will be standing.‡‡

2. Carmel is a range of hills, extending 6 or 8 miles, nearly N. and S., coming from the plain of Esdraeon, and ending in the promontory or cape which forms the bay of Acre. Its greatest height does not exceed 1500 feet.§§ It has on the E. a fine plain, watered by the Kishon; and on the W. a narrower plain, descending to the sea. The summits of the hills abound with oaks and other trees; and a few wild vines and olive-trees may still be found [some stumps of which are very large], indicating its ancient state of cultivation, to which an allusion occurs in Am. 1:2, where it is denounced, as a punishment upon Israel, that 'the top of Carmel shall wither.' On its top Elijah sacrificed, and Amos says of it, 'If they hide themselves in the top of Carmel, I will search and take them out thence.' Am. 9:3. Put as the height of the mountain will not altogether account for the expression 'hide themselves,' here is probably allusion to its numerous caves, natural and artificial, which seem to have been places of refuge in the time of Elijah [and caves have been inhabited and hollowed here by anchorites in modern times]. 'The excellency of Carmel' (Is. 35:2), if this district be alluded to, may denote either the vineyards and olive-grounds that once clothed the sides of the mountains, or the rich pastures afforded by the range of hills; and which rendered it

3. Tabor is a large hill, rather than a mountain, rising in the plain of Esdrælon, in Galilee, about $3\frac{1}{2}$ hours distant from Tiberias. Its shape is that of a truncated cone, and, according to Bureckhardt, it is entirely calcareous. Pococke says, 'It is one of the finest hills I ever beheld, being a rich soil that produces excellent herbage, and is most beautifully adorned with groves and clumps of trees.' [Cut, p. 50, vol. ii.] The ascent is so easy, that we rode up the N. side by a winding road. Some authors mention it as being about 4 miles high, others as about 2; the latter may be true, as to the winding ascent up the hill; but Mr. Buckingham is of opinion that its real height cannot exceed 2000 feet. The top of it, which is not half a mile long, and near a quarter of a mile broad, is encompassed by a wall, which Josephus built in 40 days: there was also a wall along the middle of it, which divided the S. part, on which the city stood, from the N. part, which is lower, and is called the meidan, or place, being probably used for exercises when there was a city here, which Josephus mentions by the name of Artaburion. Within the outer wall, on the N. side, are several deep fosses, out of which it is probable the stones were dug to build the walls; and these fosses seem to have answered the end of cisterns, to preserve the rain water, and were also some defence to the city. There are likewise a great number of cisterns under ground, for preserving the rain water. To the S., where the ascent was more easy, there are fosses cut on the outside, to render the access to the walls more difficult. Some of the gates also of the city remain; as one to the W., and a smaller one to the S. Antiochus, king of Syria, took the fortress on the top of this hill. Vespasian, also, got possession of it; and after that, Josephus fortified it with strong walls.[§]

(1) During the greater part of the summer, Tabor is covered in the morning with thick clouds, which disperse towards mid-day; and in the night dews fall very copiously. In the wooded parts of the mountain are wild boars, ounces,^{||} and great numbers of red partridges.[¶] Hasselquist enumerates among the productions of this mountain, the oak, the carob-tree, the turpentine-tree, the holly, the myrtle, the ivy, oats, onion, artichoke, rue, sage, poppy, wormwood, &c.; and Van Egmont states, that its verdure is beautiful, being every where decorated with small oak-trees, and the ground universally enamelled with a variety of plants and flowers, except on the south side, where it is not so fully covered with verdure. The prospects from the summit of Tabor are very extensive, and are also singularly beautiful. 'We had on the N. W.' says Mr. Buckingham, 'a view of the Mediterranean Sea, whose blue surface filled up an open space left by a downward bend in the outline of the W. hills; to the W. N. a smaller portion of its waters were seen; and on the W. again, the slender line of its distant horizon was just perceptible over the range of land near the sea-coast. From the W. to the S., the plain of Esdrælon extended over a large space, being bounded on the S. by the range of hills generally considered to be Hermon, whose dews are poetically celebrated (Ps. 133:3), and having, in the same direction, nearer the foot of Tabor, the springs of Am-d-Sherar, which send a perceptible stream through its centre, and form the brook Kishon of antiquity. Ps. 83:9. From the S. E. to the E. is the plain of Galilee, being almost a continuation of Esdrælon, and, like it, appearing to be highly cultivated, being now ploughed for seed throughout. Beneath the range of this supposed Hermon, is seated Endor, famed for the wife who raised the ghost of Samuel (1 S. 28); and Nain, equally celebrated as the place at which Jesus raised the only son of a widow from death to life, and restored him to his afflicted parent. Lu. 7:11-15. The range which bounds the E. view is thought to be the mountains of Gilboa, where Saul, setting an example of self-destruction to his armor-bearer and his three sons, fell on his own sword, rather than fall into the hands of the uncircumcised Philistines, by whom he was defeated. 1 S. ch. 31. The sea of Tiberias, or the lake of Gennesaret, famed as the seat of many miracles, is seen at the N. E., filling the hollow of a deep valley, and contrasting its light-blue waters with the dark-brown shades of the barren hills by which it is hemmed around. Here, too, the steep is pointed out, down which the herd of swine, who were possessed by the legion of devils, ran headlong into the sea. Lu. 8:33. In the same direction, below, on the plain of Galilee, and about an hour's distance from Mount Tabor, there is a cluster of buildings, used as a bazaar for cattle; somewhat further on, is a rising ground, from which it is said Christ delivered the Sermon on the Mount; and the whole view in this quarter is bounded by the high range of Gebel-el-Teli, or the mountain of snow. The city of Naphtah, supposed to be the ancient Bethulia, a city said to be seen far and near, and thought to be alluded to in the apophthegm, 'a city set on a hill cannot be hid' (Mat. 5:11), is also pointed out in this direction. To the N. were the stony hills over which we had journeyed thither; and these completed this truly grand and interesting panoramic view.^{}

(2) Since the time of Jerome, this mountain has been considered as the scene of the transfiguration; and there are three altars, which are said to mark the site of the three tabernacles proposed to be erected by Peter, when he beheld the Savior's glory; as also a grot, where they say Christ charged his disciples not to tell the transactions they had witnessed till after He should be glorified. This story, however, is devoid of probability; for the journey which the Savior is said to have taken for the purpose of exhibiting his glory to the disciples, places the scene of transfiguration much farther N.^{††}

4. The mountains of Israel, or Ephraim, were situated in the very centre of the Holy Land, and opposite to the mountains of Judah. The soil of both is fertile, excepting these ridges of the mountains of Israel that look toward the region of the Jordan, which are both rugged and difficult of ascent; and the chain extending from the mount of Olives, near Jerusalem, to the plain of Jericho. The whole of this road is considered to be the most dangerous in Palestine; the very aspect of the scenery, indeed, is sufficient, on the one hand, to tempt to robbery and murder; and, on the other, to inspire a dread of it in those who have to pass this way. The bold, projecting mass of rocks; the dark shadows, in which every thing lies buried below; the towering height of the cliffs above; and the forbidding desolation which every where reigns around, — present a picture which is quite in harmony throughout all its parts. With what propriety did our Savior choose this spot as the scene of that delightful tale of compassion recorded by Luke, 10:30-34! One must be amid these wild and gloomy solitudes, surrounded by an armed band, and feel the impatience of the traveller who rushes on to catch a new view at every pass and turn; one must be alarmed at the very stamp of the horses' hoofs resounding through the cavernous rocks, and at the savage shouts of the footmen, scarcely less loud than the echoing thunder produced by the discharge of their pieces in the valleys;^{‡‡} one must witness all this upon the spot, before the full force and beauty of the admirable story of the good Samaritan can be perceived. Here, pillage, wounds, and death, would be accompanied with double terror, from the frightful aspect of every thing around. Here, the unfeeling act of passing by a fellow-creature in distress, as the priest and Levite are said to have done, strikes one with horror, as an act too inhuman. And here, too, the compassion of the good Samaritan is doubly virtuous, from the purity of the motive which must have led to it, in a spot where no eyes were fixed on him to draw forth the performance of any duty, and from the bravery which was necessary to admit of a man's exposing himself, by such delay, to the risk of a similar fate to that from which he was endeavoring to rescue a fellow-creature.^{§§} The most elevated summit of this ridge, which appears to be the same that was anciently called the rock of Rimon (Jud. 20: 45-47), is at present known by the name of Quarantania, and is supposed to have been the scene of our Savior's temptation. The mountains of Ebal and Gerizim are situated, the former to the N. and the latter to the S., of Siehem or Napulose, whose streets run parallel to the latter mountain, which overlooks the town.^{¶¶} The cave of Abdullah, mentioned in 1 S. 22:12, is in the mountains of Judah.

5. The mountains of Gilead are on the E. side of the Jordan, and extend from Hermon, S., to Arabia Petrea. The N. part of this chain, known by the name of Bashan, was celebrated for its stately oaks, and numerous herds of cattle. The scenery of this elevated tract is described as being extremely beautiful.^{|||} [Cut, p. 721, vol. i.] In the S. parts of these mountains were the Abarim, or passes, the most eminent of which were Pisgah and Nebo, which form a continued chain, and command a view of the whole land of Canaan. Nu. 27:12, 13.

III. VALLEYS, PLAINS, AND DESERTS.

1. The valley of Hinnom, lying at the foot of Mount Meriah, and rendered memorable by the idolatries and inhuman worship there paid to Moloch. See 2 K. 23:10, 2 Ch. 23:3. To render the valley truly desatable, the bodies of those executed for flagitious crimes, and of animals that died of disease, were cast into it; and, that the pestilential vapors which filled the air might not endanger the surrounding country, fires were almost constantly kept burning there.

* Modern Traveller, Palestine, p. 39.

[†] Mr. Buckingham says, a quarter of a mile in its greatest length.

[‡] The last-named traveller considers this as the most ancient part. In the book of Judges, where the story of Deborah is related (ch. 4), Barak is commanded to draw toward Mount Tabor; and afterwards it is said, that he went up there with 10,000 men, accompanied by the prophetess, v. 10. Again, it is repeated, that they who were encamped with Heber the Kenite, in the plain of Zaanaim, showed Sisera that Barak, the son of Ahinoam, was gone up to Mount Tabor, v. 12. And, lastly, it is said, that when Sisera gathered all his hosts together, with his 900 chariots of iron, to the river Kishon, Barak went down from Mount Tabor, and 10,000 men after him, v. 14. From this one might infer, that the summit was even then used as a military post; for there is no other part of the mountain on which half the number could stand. It was even then, perhaps, walled and fortified as belonging to Barak: and as its natural position would always preserve its consequence, so these walls and fortifications would be strengthened by each new possessor. — Buckingham's Travels, pp. 104, 105.

^{‡‡} It is usual, in travelling this solitary pass, to be attended by a number of armed men, who keep up a continued shout and firing, sent forth from hill to hill, which is reechoed through all the valleys.

^{§§} Buckingham's Travels, p. 292, &c.

^{|||} These two mountains are only separated by a valley of about 200 paces wide, in which stands the town of Siehem. Both mountains are much alike in length, height, and form. Their altitude is described by Mr. Buckingham as not exceeding 700 or 800 feet from the level of the valley. But if they resemble each other in these particulars, they are in others very dissimilar; for Ebal is barren, but Gerizim is beautiful and fruitful. The Jews and Samaritans have great disputes concerning the one on which the blessings were to be pronounced. De. 27: 10, 30, 31.

^{¶¶} See p. 170, ante.

On the S. side of the valley, near where it meets with the valley of Jehoshaphat, is shown the spot of ground formerly called the potter's field, but afterwards Acaldean, or the field of blood. Mat. 27:3.

2. The valley of Jehoshaphat, also called the valley of Kedron, lies between the foot of Mount Moriah, as a continuation of Zion, on the E., where the temple of Solomon stood, and on which the E. front of the city walls lead along. It is about $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile in width, and has on its eastern side the mount of Olives, and the brook Kedron running through it in winter with great impetuosity. The traveller is here shown the well of Nephemiah, where the prophet is said to have restored the fire of the altar after the Babylonian captivity. There are also a great number of grave-stones, with inscriptions in Hebrew characters; and, among the rest, two interesting antiquities, reputed to be the tomb of Zacharias and the pillar of Absalom. See 2 S. 13:18.* Independently of the celebrity of this valley as the scene of other important and interesting events, the prophet Joel has chosen it for the place of a pleading between God and the enemies of his people. Jo. 3:1,2. By many Jews and Mahometans, this passage is applied to the general resurrection. Hence the former consider it as the highest honor to obtain a place for their bones to be deposited in the valley of Jehoshaphat, and the latter have left a stone jutting out of the wall of the city, for the accommodation of their prophet, who, they say, is to sit on it, and call the whole world from below to judgment.

3. The valley of Siddim is the once fruitful spot upon which formerly stood the five cities of the plain. Ge. 13:10,11. After their destruction, it was turned into the Salt Sea

(Ge. 14:3), or, as it is called by the Arabs, Bahar Lot, or sea of Lot.

4. The valley of Mamre, situated about 2 miles from Hebron, S., is celebrated in sacred history for Abraham's entertaining three angels under an oak, Ge. ch. 18. It was a fertile and pleasant place.

5. The valley of Elah, or the Terebinthine vale, is in the S. W. of Canaan, and about 3 miles from Bethlehem, on the road to Joppa. It is renowned as the field of the victory of David over the uncircumcised champion of the Philistines, who had defied the armies of the living God. 1 S. ch. 17. ‘Nothing has ever occurred,’ says Dr. Clarke,[†] to alter the appearance of the country. The very brook whence David chose his “five smooth stones” has been noticed by many a thirsty pilgrim, journeying from Jaffa to Jerusalem, all of whom must pass it in their way. The ruins of goadly edifices attest the religious veneration entertained in later periods for the hallowed spot; but even these are now become so insignificant, that they are scarcely discernible; and nothing can be observed to interrupt the native dignity of this memorable scene.[‡]

6. The Plain is a tract which extends from Gaza to Joppa, and forms part of the plain of the Mediterranean, which reaches from the brook Bezer to Mount Carmel, on the shore of the Mediterranean, whence it takes its name. The part lying between Joppa and Carmel was called Sharon.

7. The plain of Esdrælon, the Great Plain, or the Vale of Israel, we have already spoken of, as being of vast extent, and having on its northern side the abruptly rising Pabor. It has been a chosen place for encampment in every contest carried on in the country, from the days of Nabuchodonosor, king of the Assyrians, in the history of whose war with Arphaxad it is mentioned as ‘the great plain of Esdrælon’ (Judith 1:8), until the disastrous march of Napoleon Bonaparte from Egypt into Syria, Jews, Gentiles, Saracens, Christians, Frenchmen, Egyptians, Persians, Druses, Turks, and Arabs, warriors out of every nation which is under heaven, have pitched their tents in the plain of Esdrælon, and have beheld the various banners of their nations wet with the dews of Tabor and of Hermon.[§]

8. The region round about Jordan extended from the sea of Tiberias to the Dead Sea, on each side of the Jordan. Of this district the plain of Jericho forms a part. Josephus says its length is 230 furlongs, and its breadth 120; being divided in the midst by Jordan. It is much burned up in the summer-time; and, in consequence of the extraordinary heat, contains very unwholesome air. It is all destitute of water, excepting the river of Jordan.^{||}

9. The wilderness of Judea began near Jericho, and extended along the shores of the Jordan and the Dead Sea, to the mountains of Edom. It is necessary to state, that the Hebrews gave the name of desert or wilderness to all parts that were not cultivated, or thickly inhabited; because we find many parts of this region very far from being wilderness. Here John the Baptist was educated, and began to proclaim the approach of the Messiah’s reign. Mat. 3:1.

10. The Desert, so frequently mentioned during the 40 years’ wanderings of the Israelites, extended from the E. side of the Red Sea to the confines of the land of Canaan, and is known as part of the vast desert of Arabia.

§ 6.—Atmosphere and other Phenomena.

1. From the description already given of the geographical situation and local features of Judea, it will be obvious that there must be much variation in the climate, in different parts of the land. The country running along the sea-coast must have its temperature cooled by its proximity to a large body of water; the valley of the Jordan, surrounded by high and barren mountains, must be excessively hot; while the country on the ridges of mountains, on either side the Jordan, will be frequently exposed to a chilling air. The day and night in these climates are directly opposite to each other; for, while the former is excessively hot, the latter is intensely cold. See Ge. 31:10. This is occasioned by the copious precipitation of vapor which follows the setting of a vertical sun; and so abundant are these dews, that we are informed by travellers that they have been frequently wetted to the skin by them. There is a fine and touching allusion to the early evaporation of the dew, under the warmth of the rising sun, in Ho. 6:4. The rains in Judea are very different from what they are among us. they are unknown, coming down generally at stated times in spring and autumn, called the former and the latter rain. De. 11.11. Ho. 6:3. Jo. 2:33. It not unfrequently happens that they rush down in such torrents as to destroy soil, grain, houses, flocks, and herds. Mat. 7:25-27. Nor are snow and hail unknown in Judea. In winter, the dew often assumes the appearance of hoar-frost; and on eminences the snow is sometimes seen to lie for a considerable time. The hail is sometimes exceedingly large, falling in such masses as to destroy fields of corn, and trees, and endanger the lives of animals. Bruce saw hailstones in Abyssinia as large as a nutmeg,* and Moses speaks of the 'very grievous hail,' which destroyed the cattle of the Egyptians. Ex. 9:18, &c.

2. In respect to the winds, though their general character is calm and temperate, yet are they subject to occasional visitations of cold and storm. As in other countries, they were classed by the four quarters whence they came; viz. east, west, north, and south. Hence the general name for them in Scripture is the four winds: and when they are named individually, they are distinguished by their peculiar qualities. Thus, the east wind is particularly tempestuous and dangerous in the Mediterranean. Ps. 43:7. Isaiah also alludes to it, ch. 27:3. Such a storm is well known to modern mariners by the name of 'a Levanter,' the Levant [or 'Rising,' i. e. of the sun], meaning that country which lies at the E. end of the Mediterranean; and what makes it interesting to the Christian scholar is, that this very wind is the Euroclydon, or stormy N. E. wind, which was so fatal to the ship in which Paul and his companions were, when sailing to Rome. Ac. 27:14. The E. wind is also accounted, both in Egypt and Judea [and, Robert adds, India] very hurtful to vegetation, as being the cause of blight (Ge. 41:6. Ez. 17:10. 19:12. Ho. 13:15), because of its cold and drying quality; carrying off the insensible perspiration from the extremities of plants more rapidly than it could be supplied by the general ascent of the sap, and thereby withering them in a short time. In the summer, however, its leading feature was very different, being very dry and hot; and it was from that quarter, as well as from the S., that they had the suffocating hotwind and the samiel. See Jon. 4:8. The west wind, coming from the Mediterranean, is called in Ex. 10:19 (Heb.) 'a wind from the sea.' It was for this reason that a cloud from the W. betokened a shower (Lu. 12:51); and after a drought, in the days of Elijah, a cloud like a man's hand, rising from the sea, was the sign of a hurricane of wind and rain. 1 K. 18:44-45. It would appear that thunder and lightning came also in the direction of the E. and W.; for our Savior alludes to it in Mat. 24:27, when He says, 'As the lightning cometh out of the E., and shineth even unto the W., so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be.' The north wind was cold and dry. Hence Solomon says, 'It driveth away rain' (Pr. 25:23); and Job tells us, that 'cold and fair weather are from the N.' 37:29-32. In Eccles. 4:17,20, the N. storm and whirlwind are described as terrible; and, even without the whirlwind, we are told, that 'when the cold N. wind bloweth, and the water is congealed into ice, it abideth upon every gathering together of water, and clotheth the water as with a breastplate.' The south wind came from Arabia, and commonly brought heat (Jb. 37:17. Lu. 12:55); but it also brought whirlwinds. Jb. 1:19. 27:9. Is. 21:1. Zeb. 9:14. And from that quarter, as well as from the E., came the hot winds and the samiel. It would appear, from our translation, that the spouse thought the N. and S. winds of advantage to her garden, for she says (Song 4:16): 'Awake, O north wind, and come, thou south; blow upon my garden, that the spicery thereof may flow out.'† The fact is, that the south winds in Judea are moderate or destructive, according to the season.‡

3. Tornadoes, or whirlwinds, are also referred to in Scripture, and have been often fatal to travellers, by overwhelming them in columns of moving sand. The hot wind of the desert, which, when it continues for any length of time, is destructive of life, is not unknown in Judea; and it is probable that by such a 'blast,' Semmachus's army was destroyed, 2 K. 19:7. The Arabic version has 'a hot, pestilential wind.' It is in allusion to this phenomenon, that our Savior is said to be 'as a hiding-place from the wind.' Is. 32:2. But the most fatal blast to which the inhabitants of Eastern countries are subject, is known by the name of the simum or samiel. Travellers there describe it: After the air has been unusually heated for several days, the sky suddenly loses its common serenity, and becomes dark and gloomy; while the sun assumes a violet color. The approach of the wind is rapid, and is indicated by a redness in the air; and when so near as to become visible, it resembles a sheet of purple-colored smoke, about 20 yards in breadth, and 12 feet above the surface of the earth, moving in a direct line. [Cut, p. 45.] The only means of preservation from it is to lie flat, with the face upon the ground, till it is past; though it sometimes happens that persons are destroyed before they have had time to do this. Thevenot mentions one of these winds, which, in 1655, suffocated 1,000 persons; and another in 1663, which suffocated 20,000 in one night. [See Robinson's Cabinet.]

4. There is another singular appearance in the atmosphere of Judea, and other Eastern countries, called the mirage, or sevah, to which allusion is made in Is. 35:7, and by Jeremiah, when, in pouring forth his complaint to God, for mercies deferred, he says, 'Wilt Thou altogether unto me as waters that be not seen' (Jer. 15:18, marg.), i. e. which have no reality, as the Sept. render. [See this phenomenon explained, at the end of Is. 35].

5. From Ps. 121:6, it has been inferred that the coup de soleil, or stroke of the sun, was not unknown in Judea; indeed, there is manifest mention of it in Judith 3:2,3; and it is probable that there is an allusion to it in Is. 49:10; and Ke. 7:16, where, in describing the happiness of the saints, the inspired writers say, 'The sun shall not light on them, nor any heat.'

6. We cannot close this section, however, without observing, the Israelites considered that most uncertain of all things, the weather, as under the immediate superintendence, care, and administration of the CREATOR. Mat. 5:45. Ac. 11:17. Jer. 52:1. Ps. 135:7. 147:16-18. Na. 1:5,6. But notwithstanding this, the husbandman was not to be dismayed: he was to forsake his sins, to put his trust in God, to do his own part, and to leave the event with God. Ec. 11:4. 1 Co. 3:7.

7. From this summary sketch the reader will be in some measure prepared to appreciate the fidelity with which Moses describes Canaan to his people, as 'a land flowing with milk and honey'; 'a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths, that spring out of valleys and hills; a land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig-trees, and pomegranates; a land of olive; a land wherein they should eat bread without scarceness,' and where they should 'not lack any good thing.' De. 8:7-9.

CHAPTER III.

PHILOSOPHY AND THE PRACTICAL SCIENCES.

Errors relative to the learning of the Hebrews — Teachers of Religion — Philosophy of the Hebrews — Wise Men, or Teachers — State of the Sciences among the Hebrews.

1. DIFFERENT writers have been guilty of great exaggeration, in opposite ways, in their estimates of the state of science amongst the ancient Hebrews. While some, in the spirit of Apollonius, have pronounced them to be 'the most stupid barbarians, and the only people who never produced a single invention,' others have exhibited them as profoundly learned in all philosophy, and as equal in the extent and diversity of their knowledge to the wise men of Greece and Rome. A better or more certain judgment concerning the wisdom of the ancient Hebrews cannot be formed, as Dr. Enfield suggests,§ than from the monuments which they themselves, or their descendants, have left in the sacred Scriptures. Much greater credit, particularly in this instance, is due to domestic than to foreign testimony. For the Jewish historians had their information concerning the ancient state of their nation, from records preserved with the utmost care by their ancestors; whereas other writers, in speaking of a people who had little intercourse with their neighbours, for want of a better guide than vague report, must necessarily have given a precipitate, and often an erroneous, judgment.

2. We learn from the Scriptures, that amongst the ancient Hebrews there were many eminent men, who made use of the clear light of divine truth as their guide in the conduct of life. In practical and moral wisdom, it cannot be doubted that they held a place of high distinction. Their wisdom, however, must not be confounded with philosophy, in the strict acceptation of the term. Blessed with a divine revelation, they have transmitted to posterity rays of sacred truth, which have been spread through the world; and they have hence obtained an immortal name in an order of higher dignity than that of philosophers. Under the direction of genuine principles of religion, they pursued the plain path of simple virtue, without being led astray by vain curiosity into fruitless speculations. Among the Hebrews, we are therefore to look for prudent statesmen, upright judges, and priests learned in the law; but not for philosophers, in the limited sense in which we understand that term.||

3. Traces of philosophy, strictly so called, i. e. the system of prevailing moral opinions, may be found in the book of Job, in the 37th, 39th, and 73rd psalms; also in the books of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes; but chiefly in the apocryphal book of Wisdom, and the Writings of the Son of Sirach. During the captivity, the Jews acquired many new notions, particularly from the Chaldeans, and appropriated them, as occasion offered, to their own purposes. They at length became acquainted with the philosophy of the Greeks, which makes its appearance abundantly in the book of Wisdom. After the captivity, the language in which the sacred books were written was no longer vernacular. Hence arose the need of interpreters, in order to make the people understand what was read. These interpreters learned the Hebrew language at the schools. The teachers of these schools, who, for the two generations preceding the birth of Christ, had maintained some acquaintance with the Greek philosophy, were not satisfied with a simple interpretation of the Hebrew idiom,

* Shaw's Abridgment, p. 176. [A son of the Ed. saw them much larger in the Mediterranean.]

as it stood, but shaped the interpretation so as to render it conformable to their philosophy. Thus arose contentions, which gave occasion for the various sects of Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes. In the time of our Savior, divisions had arisen among the Pharisees themselves. No less than 18 nice questions, if we may believe the Jewish rabbins, were contested at that period between the schools of Hillel and of Shammai.

4. Ancient, learned men among the Hebrews were denominated chachmeim, as among the Greeks they were called sophoi; i.e. wise men. In the time of Christ, the common appellation for men of that description was grammatikos, in the Hebrew sopher, a scribe. They were addressed by the honorary title of rabbi; great, or master. The Jews, in imitation of the Greeks, had their seven wise men, who were rabbouni. Gamaliel was one of the number. They called themselves the children of wisdom; an expression which corresponds very nearly to the Greek philosophos. Mat. 11:19. Luk. 7:35. The heads of sects were called fathers. Mat. 12:27. 23:1-9. Their disciples were denominated sons, or children. The Jewish teachers, at least some of them, had private lecture-rooms, but they also taught and disputed in synagogues, in temples, and, in fact, wherever they could find an audience. The method of these teachers was the same with that which prevailed among the Greeks. Any disciple who chose might propose questions, upon which it was the duty of the teachers to remark and give their opinions. Luk. 2:46. The teachers were not invested with their functions by any formal act of the church, or of the civil authority; they were self-constituted. They received no other salary than some voluntary present from the disciples, which was called 'an honorary,' tine, HONORARIUM. 1 Ti. 5:17. They acquired a subsistence, in the main, by the exercise of some art or handicraft. That they took a higher seat than their auditors, although it was probably the case, does not follow, as is sometimes supposed, from Lu. 2:46. According to the Talmudists, they were bound to hold no conversation with women, and to refuse to sit at table with the lower classes of the people. Ju. 1:27. Mat. 9:11. The subjects on which they taught were numerous, commonly intricate, and of no great consequence; of which there are abundant examples in the Talmud.*

5. Upon the authority of Philo, and other Jewish writers, it has been asserted by Clemens Alexandrinus, Justin Martyr, and other of the Christian fathers, that Moses reached the summit of human learning; and he is represented as having been a perfect master of astronomy, geometry, music, medicine, occult philosophy, and, in short, of the whole circle of the arts and sciences, which were at that time known; [and indeed he had the best education Egypt, with all her 'wisdom,' or Arabia, the land of Ish, could give.] Similar claims are made for Solomon and Daniel, and, in a lower degree, for several of the Hebrew judges and prophets. The proofs adduced for these claims, however, are fallacious and unsatisfactory, resolving themselves either into the mere opinions of some of the fathers, and especially of Philo the Jew, or into facts and circumstances that will not bear out the conclusion.† It is admitted that the Hebrews became renowned for their intellectual culture in the time of David, and especially of Solomon, who is said to have surpassed all others in wisdom (see 1 K. 5:9-14); but their literature was limited chiefly to ethics, religion, the history of their nation, and natural history. After this time, the Hebrews made little progress in science and literature.‡ The elements of arithmetic, mathematics, geography, and astronomy, formed the boundaries of their scientific knowledge.

SECTION I. ARITHMETIC, MATHEMATICS, AND ASTROLOGY.

1. The more simple methods of arithmetic calculation are spoken of in the Pentateuch, as if they were well known. The merchants of that early period must, for their own convenience, have been possessed of some method of operating by numbers, [and the cut upon the colored page shows a kind of abacus, similar to one in use in China, and now in the Editor's possession.] And that they were able to do it, to some considerable extent, may be argued from the fact, that they had separate words, viz. רְכָבָה, reckoning; חִזֵּבָה, a reckoning, or finished computation (Le. 25:2); kas, to count, to make a contrasted account (Ex. 12:4); and mene, a distribution or division (Ge. 13:16); besides one Greek word, arithmos, number. May these probably express the fundamental rules of arithmetic?§

2. By mathematics we understand geometry, mensuration, navigation, &c. As far as a knowledge of them was absolutely required by the condition and employments of the people, we may well suppose that knowledge to have actually existed; although no express mention is made of them. [A map seems to have been made by Joshua's order. Jos. 18:9.]

3. Of the astronomical knowledge of the Hebrews, and the biblical references to the science, we have already treated in ch. i.

SECTION II. GEOGRAPHY.

1. The accuracy with which the division of the land of promise amongst the 12 tribes is described shows that at least the writer had made some attainments in geographical science. See Jos. ch. 13. It is not to be pretended, however, that the Hebrews possessed any very enlarged or accurate knowledge of the earth and its various countries. Their institutions were designedly calculated to discourage an intercourse with strangers. The brilliant commercial enterprises in which Solomon engaged were discontinued by his successors, and even the fleets of that prince were navigated by the servants of the king of Tyre. This restricted intercourse with foreign nations rendered it, of course, impossible to acquire any enlarged or correct knowledge of the earth; and we do not find in the prophetic writings any trace of geographical information much exceeding that which was possessed by Moses, who has left us a precious record of the manner in which the knowledge of the earth was enlarged by the dispersion of the human species. See Ge. 10; Comp. Is. 49:12.

Towards the E. Moses seems to have known nothing of India, though this is mentioned by the prophets, [and even China, Is. 49:12. See the note there.] Towards the N. the geographical knowledge of the Hebrews never extended beyond the Caucasus; and in the N. E. it was confined within equally narrow limits. The Chaldeans, who appear to have descended from the farther shores of the Caspian Sea, are described by Jeremiah as coming from the ends of the N. and the sides of the earth. With Egypt and Arabia the early Hebrews were well acquainted; but towards the W. their knowledge hardly reached so far as the shores of Greece.¶

II. The cosmological ideas scattered through the Scriptures are few in number, and of extreme simplicity. In the prophetic writings, many traces may be found of an opinion that 'heaven,' or 'the mount of the Lord,' was in the N.; Is. ch. 11. The earth was evidently considered to be a plain, surrounded, perhaps, by the ocean, which was again enclosed by the clouds of heaven. Such are the opinions expressed by Job, the sublimest of all poets:—' He hath compassed the waters with bounds, until (in the places where) the day and night come to an end.' And again he says:—' Whereupon are the foundations of the earth fastened? or who laid the corner-stone thereof? or who shut up the sea with doors (boundaries) when it brake forth, as if it had issued out of the womb? when I made the cloud the garment thereof?' ch. 26, 33. The general illusions which occur in Scripture to the earth and its creation are not more remarkable for the sublime language in which they are conveyed, than for their perfect freedom from fanciful and subtle speculations. At the same time, it may be thought probable that Is. 10:22, and Jb. 22:14, hint at the globular form of our world.

SECTION III. NATURAL HISTORY.

The opening chapter of Genesis at once introduces us to the various topics comprehended under the title of this section; and that, too, in an orderly and scientific manner:—ASTROGRAPHY, METEOROLOGY, GEOLOGY, BOTANY, ZOOGRAPHY—the heavens, the air, and the earth; but as the latter is that in which we are more immediately interested, the sacred historian has supplied a larger measure of information relative to this than to either of the former. Thus we have,

I. Geology. II. Botany. III. Zoography. Ge. 1:1-10.—v. 11,12.—v. 20,26.

Here are the three kingdoms of nature—animal, vegetable, and mineral—opened up to our contemplation. How extended is the range; how teeming with important instruction, and with the materials of devout meditation!

The Mosaic arrangement is simple, but systematic; rising from inert matter to vegetation, from this to animal life, and thence to intellectual being!

Each branch of the division is further disposed into triads, thus:—

Geology.

Earth—Air—Water.

Botany.

Grass—Shrubs—Trees.

Zoography.

Aquatics—Terrestrials—Rationals.

The two former being again divided thus:—

Aquatics.

Animaleæ—Aphibilia—Birds.

Terrestrials.

Domestic Animals—Wild Beasts—Reptiles.

What a beautiful gradation! Connecting links are seen throughout the whole orders and classes of being. Among a certain description of stones, some are fibrous, and have laminae, or a kind of leaves; as slate, talc, lyophilites, or stony marine plants, the ancyanthus, or stony flower of mines. These lead us from the mineral to the vegetable kingdom. The plant which appears to occupy the lowest part of vegetable gradation is the truffle. Next come the numerous species of mushrooms and mosses, between which mould and paste seem to form the connecting medium. All these plants are imperfect, and properly constitute only the limits of the vegetable kingdom. The polypus seems to unite the vegetable and the animal kingdom. From its outward appearance, this singular production might be taken for nothing more than a mere plant, were it not seen to perform real animal functions. Worms, which are at the commencement of the animal kingdom, lead us to insects and shell-fish; between which, or, rather, next to them, are found reptiles, which, by means of the water-snake, are united to fish. The flying-fish leads us to flows. The ostrich, whose feet much resemble those of the goat, and which runs rather than flies, appears to connect birds with quadrupeds. Such is the harmony and gradation of nature in its varied, and, at first sight, incongruous parts!

That most sublime and magnificent of all poems, ancient or modern, the book of Job, proves that the study of natural history, and especially the history of the animal kingdom, was cultivated at a very early period of the world, with a considerable degree of minute attention, in regard to various kinds and species; and the detailed references to the habits and manners of other animals that lie scattered through almost every part of the Hebrew Scriptures, and especially through the books of Psalms and prophecies, with the distinct historical notice which is given of the scientific acquaintance of Solomon with this attractive study (1 K. 4:33), show, not only that it was attended to at a very early period, but that it was a very favorite and fashionable pursuit for many ages throughout Egypt, Syria, and Arabia.

§ 1.—Astrography and Meteorology.

I. Astrography:—Sciences of Biblical Information—Knowledge of Astronomy possessed by the ancient Hebrews—Astrology:—II. Meteorology:—Its Objects—The Seasons of the Hebrews.

I.—1. By employing the plural word shemim, heavens, it is believed that Moses meant to include in his description of the creation the whole of the solar system; but this is by no means certain, from the mere use of the plural substantive. In the Heb. Scriptures, a great latitude of meaning is given to the word. In Jb. 35:11, it is used to denote the air or atmosphere; in Ps. 33:6, it expresses the atmosphere or planetary vortex; and in Da. 4:26, it denotes the Deity Himself. The ancient Hebrews believed that there were three heavens; the aerial, in which the birds, &c., fly; the firmament, or expanse; and 'the heaven of heavens,' or 'the third heaven,' the peculiar dwelling-place of Jehovah and the blessed in eternity. By the word rekia, which the English trs. have rendered, following the Vulgate, firmament, the Hebrews described the whole atmosphere, or the whole of the planetary vortex, in which the בְּרֹכֶת, the עַמְּבָד, and the נְמָגֵן, the whole of the heavenly bodies exist: the stars are spoken of in the Scriptores as being infinite in number; and there are several beautiful allusions to them in Is. 40:26. Nu. 21:17. Jb. 25:5. Ps. 143:3, et al. In Ju. 13, there is an allusion to the apparently irregular motion of the planets; and when it is known that the Hebrews called their teachers stars, the comparison of Jude seems very appropriate.

2. Whether the Hebrews understood the theory of lunar eclipses is doubtful; it seems they did not, inasmuch as they always speak of these phenomena in terms which intimate a belief of their being effects of the extraordinary power and wrath of God. See Is. 13:10. Ez. 23:7,8. Jo. 2:10. 3:15, et al. On the circumstances of the sun and moon 'standing still,' at the command of Joshua, as related in the book bearing his name (10:12), and the shadow on the sun-dial of Ahaz, mentioned in 2 K. ch. 20, and Is. ch. 35, we must refer to the commentators. Dr. Adam Clarke has contributed much and satisfactorily towards explaining the relations in accordance with natural science, and vindicating the sacred writers against the charge of ignorance that has been often urged. In 2 K. 23:5, and Jl. 33:32, the planets, נְהִירָה, or constellations, are mentioned; and in Jl. 9:9. 38:31, and Am. 5:3, some of them are called by name; whence it is evident that the science of astronomy was not wholly uncultivated amongst the ancient Hebrews, as is also, and indeed more clearly, demonstrable from the construction of their calendars, and the regulation of their fasts, festivals, &c.

3. Astrology, or the science of reading the stars, was sedulously cultivated in the East, and especially in Chaldea (Is. 47:13. Jer. 50:35. Da. 1:20. 2:2,12, &c.); so that at length a Chaldean became synonymous with 'an astrologer.' This superstition was prohibited by the law (Le. 20:27. De. 18:10), although the Hebrews did not preserve themselves free from its guilt, as is evident from the prophets.

II. It is very questionable whether the Hebrews understood enough of the science of meteorology to be able to explain the principles by which these were regulated or modified. The seasons, however, of the natural year are early indicated: 'While the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease.' Ge. 8:22.

1. Zera, or seed-time, which comprehended, according to our computation of time, from the beginning of Oct. to the end of Nov.* was the period during which the former rains fell.† It seems that, about the autumnal equinox, these rains commenced, falling for 2 or 3 days in heavy showers, after which there was an interval of 2 or 3 weeks, when the real former rain set in. It was during this interval of time that the Hebrews ploughed their land, and sowed their wheat and barley.‡

2. Koroph, the stripping season, or winter, extended from the beginning of Dec. to the end of Jan. During this period, the westerly winds generally blow, which bring heavy rains, especially during the night. The cold is piercing on the elevated parts of the land, and sometimes fatal to those not inured to the climate. David has finely described this season of the year, Ps. 147:16, 17. And yet there are intervals when the sky is clear, and it is so hot that travellers with difficulty prosecute their journey. De la Roque relates that he was greatly affected by the heat of the sun, when travelling near Tyre, on the 29th Jan.§ During this season, the inhabitants of Palestine, and the adjoining countries, continue to sow their corn and pulse.

3. Kur, the cold season, embraced April and March. During the early part of this season, there are some intense colds; and Shaw states, that it is the usual time at Jerusalem for the falling of snow. As the season advances, however, the atmosphere grows warm, and at length excessively hot, though the rains, accompanied with thunder and hail, are not yet over.|| The fields, which were pretty green before, become, by the springing up of the latter grain, entirely covered with pleasing verdure, and towards the end of March every tree is in full leaf.||

4. Ketsur, the harvest, included April and May, when the latter rains fell,  called harvest rains (De. 11:14, Heb.), because they helped to fill and ripen the corn for cutting. Thus the former rains fell after the autumnal equinox, at their seed-time, to quicken the grain; and the latter rains, after the vernal equinox, to insure a plentiful crop. It was owing to these rains that Jordan used to overflow its banks, at the time of the barley-harvest. Jos. 3:15. When they are past, the weather is variable till May, by cold winds from Libanus; †† from the end of which month till the middle of Sept. there are few or no showers. In the plain of Jericho, the heat is excessive at this time; but in other parts of the country the spring is delightful. After the rains cease, the corn soon arrives at maturity, and the harvest commences, and continues till about the middle of June. It is impossible to describe the rich fragrance of an Eastern climate, at this season of the year, and before the excessive heat comes on. The air is filled with odors of plants, and flowers, and trees, which the breeze wafts about in most delicious freshness. Solomon says,[¶] 'The winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come; and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land; the fig-tree putteth forth her green figs, and the vines, with the tender grape, give a good smell.' Song 2:11-13. Before the middle of May, however, the verdure begins to fade, and by the end of the month all becomes parched and barren. To the extreme heat which now prevails, there are many beautiful allusions in the sacred writings; as, Is. 45: 25, 25.

5. Kitz, summer, comprised the months of June and July, during which the sky is clear, and the sun's rays so intense, that the streams which in winter rushed with the impetuosity of torrents, either dwindle into brooks, or become entirely dry. The winds, generally blowing from the W., refresh the air in the latter part of the day, and the dews being very moderate, the inhabitants pass the night on the roofs of their houses.‡‡ Thunder is very uncommon in this climate during the summer season, and it seldom or never rains.§§ When it does rain, it is usually preceded by a whirlwind, with clouds of dust; it is 'with a stormy whirlwind, or an overflowing shower, or great hail.' Ez. 13:12, 13. What has been said of the heat which prevails at this season of the year, is chiefly applicable to the lower parts of the country; for, even in the hottest months, the regions of Libanus are so cold at times, during the night, as to render the use of fires indispensable.¶¶

6. Chum, the heat, comprehended August and Sept. During this season, the heat increases, and 'the drought of summer' is experienced. Ps. 32:4. The sky is serene and fair during the day; but in the night a copious dew falls, which either saturates the earth, or appears as hoar-frost: on the appearance of the sun, it ascends as smoke from an oven, and becomes invisible. Lightning is also frequent in the night-time; and, if seen in the western hemisphere, it portends rain, often accompanied with thunder. During the heat, at noon, it is usual for persons to retire to rest.¶¶ See Jud. 3:24. 2 S. 4:5.

§ 2.—Geology.

Importance of the Science of Geology, and its Relation to the Bible—Mosaic Narrative of the Creation—Conformity of Modern Philosophy with the Hebrew Cosmogony—The Deluge attested by Mosaic Discoveries—The Age of the Earth—Hebrew Geological Terms.

1. The intimate connection of the science which treats of the substance of the earth, of the causes by which its several parts have been either arranged or disorganized, of the operations in which the stratification of its materials has originated, of the inequalities of its surface, and of the numerous bodies that enter into its composition, with various portions of Scripture, and especially with the Mosaic account of the creation and the deluge, gives it a strong claim to rank amongst the necessary studies of the interpreter and the theologian.

2. In Ge. ch. 1, the Hebrew historian describes briefly, but particularly and systematically, the order and process of the work of creation; beginning with the heavens, or solar system generally, and thence descending to the [erets] earth—or, as the word implies, every thing relating to the terraque-aerial globe; i. e. all that belongs to the solid and fluid parts of our world, and its surrounding atmosphere." The narrative of Moses furnishes a fair subject of investigation for the philosopher and the natural historian; and it is gratifying to know that the discoveries of modern science have all tended to illustrate and confirm the particulars included in that narrative.

3. From the surveys that have been made of the solid crust of the earth, so far as it has been penetrated into, it is evident that the rudimental materials of the globe existed at its earliest period, in one confused and liquid mass; that they were afterwards separated and arranged by a progressive series of operations, and a uniform system of laws, the more obvious of which appear to be those of gravity and crystallization; and that they have since been convulsed and dislocated by some dreadful commotion and inundation, that have extended to every region, and again thrown a great part of the organic and inorganic creation into a promiscuous jumble. Hence have originated the Platonic and Neptunian hypotheses; the former ascribing the origin of the world, in its present state, to igneous fusion; the latter to aqueous solution, resolving the genuine origin of things into the operation of water. [Modern geologists unite both theories.] The Mosaic narrative opens with a statement of three distinct facts, each following the other in a regular series, in the origin of the visible world — First, an absolute creation, as opposed to a mere remodification of the heavens and the earth, which constituted the earliest step in the creative process; secondly, the condition of the earth when it was thus primarily brought into being, which was that of an amorphous or shapeless waste; and, thirdly, a commencing effort to reduce the unfashioned mass into a condition of order and harmony. From Ge. I. 1, 2, we are necessarily led to infer, that the first change of the formless chaos, after its existence, was into a state of universal aqueous solution; for it was upon the surface of the waters that the Divine Spirit commenced his operative power. We are next informed, that this chaotic mass acquired shape, not instantaneously, but by a series of six distinct days or epochs, and apparently through the agency of the established laws of gravity and crystallization, which regulate it at the present moment. It tells us that during the first of these days was evolved — what, indeed, agreeably to the laws of gravity, must have been evolved first of all — the matter of light and heat; of all material substances the most subtle and attenuate; those by which alone the sun operates, and has ever operated, upon the earth and the other planets, and which may be the identical substances that constitute its essence. And it tells us, also, that the luminous matter thus evolved produced light, without the assistance of the sun or moon, which were not set in the sky or firmament, and had no rule, till the 4th day; that the light thus produced flowed by tides, and alternately intermitted, thus constituting a single day and a single night, whatever their length might be. It tells us that, during the 2d day, uprose, progressively, the fine fluids, or waters, as they are poetically and beautifully denominated, of the firmament, and filled the blue ethereal void with a vital atmosphere; that, during the 3d day, the waters, more properly so called, or the grosser and more compact fluids of the general mass, were strained off and gathered together into the vast bed of the ocean, and the dry land began to make its appearance, by disclosing the peaks or highest points of the primitive mountains; in consequence of which a progress instantly commenced, from inorganic matter to vegetable organization, the surface of the earth, as well above as under the waters, being covered with plants and herbs bearing seeds after their respective kinds; thus laying a basis for those carbonaceous materials, the remains of vegetable matter, which are occasionally to be traced in some of the layers or formations of the class of primitive rocks (the lowest of the whole), without a single particle of animal relies intermixed with them. It tells us that, during the 4th day, the sun and moon, now completed, were set in the firmament, the solar system was finished, its laws were established, and the celestial orbry was put into play; in consequence of which the harmonious revolutions of signs and of seasons, of days and of years, struck up for the first time their mighty symphony.† That the 5th period was allotted exclusively to the formation of water-fowl, and the countless tribes of aquatic creatures; and, consequently, to that of those lowest ranks of animal life, testaceous worms, corals, and other zoophytes, whose relies are alone to be traced in the 2d class of rocks or transition formations, and still more freely in the 3d or horizontal formations; these being the only animals as yet created, since the air, and the water, and the utmost peaks of the loftiest mountains, were the only parts as yet inhabitable. It tell us, still continuing the same grand and exquisite climax, that towards the close of this period, the mass of waters having sufficiently retired into the deep bed appointed for them, the 6th and concluding period was devoted to the formation of terrestrial animals; and, last of all, as the master-piece of the whole, to that of man himself. Thus, in progressive order, uprose the stupendous system of the world; the bright host of morning stars shouted together on its birth-day; and the eternal Creator looked down with complacency on the finished fabric, and 'saw that it was good.'‡

us that the wickedness of man subjected the earth to desolations, changes, and new formations, in its surface and upper strata. Of the universal deluge, by which this was effected, he gives us a particular account in Ge. ch. 6, 7, 8; and his narrative of the fact § is authenticated and confirmed both by profane historians [see the notes in the Commentary] and by natural phenomena. Travellers and geologists are all agreed, that in every continent and island, the mountains, the hills, and the declivities, are, in places without number, left desolated of earth, craggy, and bare; and many of the rocks, and bolder hills, and salient promontories, appear to have been detached to a considerable distance from the elevated summits to which they once belonged.|| Whatever earths the impetuous tides of the deluge washed from one place, they must of necessity have deposited in another. Hence one tide would bring gravel and marine exuviae, already worn by the action of the billows rolling on the shore; another would bring sand; and a third, clay. But though all alluvial strata were formed of the detritus of the old earths, they would repeat the first formation by combination. They would change into a variety of silica, rocks, marls, and minerals; while others, falling on more neutral earths, would remain in their primitive state. Thus, also, the deeper strata of the earth would be laid on while the waters were rising; and all the more loamy earths by the gradual retreat and subsiding of the waters. These long-continued actions and deposits of the water are a sure guide, in accounting for all the conformations and heterogeneous masses found in most parts of the alluvial earth.|| [Occasional breakings up of the earth's crust, and shoutings up of melted matter, also have dislocated these strata, and caused many anomalies.]

5. But the researches of geologists have given confirmation to sacred history, not only as to the origin of the earth and the universal deluge, but also as to the age of the earth. Early in the last century, and even more recently, several geological phenomena were considered as indicative of the fact, that the creation of the globe was an event much more remote than the sacred history represents it to be. But the investigations of the latest and most sober philosophers have furnished proof, little short of demonstration, that the earth, in its present form, cannot have existed from a more remote period than that assigned to it in the Mosaic narrative.|| The absolute falsehood of many hasty assertions and specious inferences, hostile to the Scripture chronology, has been fully evinced; and thence has arisen a new presumptive argument in support of the authenticity of that volume which contains the most ancient and the most precious of all records.†‡

6. The various geological terms employed

* See Dr. Clarke, Annot. in loca.

§ The Mosaic history of the deluge has been carefully examined by Lightfoot, who equalled the rubbings in Hebrew literature. The whole period, according to him, comprised a solar year. Forty-six days of this period were spent in conveying stores and provisions for the ark; and seven in receiving the beasts and cattle. During the fall of the rain, it is thought that the atmosphere was much darkened, because it was afterwards promised that day and night should no more cease. Ge. 8:22.

|| See the marks of a sweeping current from N. to S. and obliquely, as seen on the scratched rocks, and displaced boulders of the United States, detailed by Prof. Hitchcock, in the Bib. Repor., 1837. Ep.

* This idea, that the deeper alluvial strata were laid on by the increasing tides, assists us to account for the deposit of mud, confessedly a vegetable fossil, that once floated upon the sea. When analyzed, chloroform constitutes the principal part of its base. Acidulous waters, bitumen, and hydrogen, it contains in various proportions. Its combustible qualities and its ash may also be referred to vegetable origin.

 Mr. Faber, in order to meet the objections of some of our geologists, founded on the fossil phenomena occurring in the strata of the earth, maintains, that the six demurric days were periods of vast but uncertain length, during which some mighty revolution occurred, to which the origin of these strata are to be attributed, rather than to the deluge of Noah. — Treatise on the Three Dispensations, b. i. ch. iii. From all these chronometers, consisting in effects which result from known causes, operating since the existence of our continents, and of which the progress within known times is indicated by monuments, he justly draws this conclusion — that our continents are not of a more remote antiquity than has been assigned to them by the sacred historian, in the beginning of his Pentateuch. — P. 403.

†† Carpenter's Scripture Natural History, Introd. to Geology. The valley of the Nile, as is well known, is covered with a bed or stratum of alluvial mud deposited by the river during its periodical overflows; and this bed or stratum is superimposed on sand, in all respects resembling the sand of the adjoining desert. During the period of the French expedition, a great variety of experiments were made, by the savans who accompanied it, upon the thickness of this alluvial bed; and in the transverse section of the valley of Syout, and other places, where the deposits could be made without obstacle, and without being in any material degree augmented by local causes, the mean of all the measurements gave for the average thickness of the mud stratum rather more than 20 feet. Having ascertained this point, M. Girard next applied himself to determine the quantity by which the soil is raised or thickened in the course of a century, from the depositions of the river; and the pits of the micrometers furnished him with the basis of an approximate calculation, which gave the centenary elevation of the soil, from the cause already mentioned, at less than 43 inches. Dividing, then, the whole thickness of this stratum by the quantity added to it in the course of a century, the quotient is 5650; from which it follows that the origin of this superimposed soil must have preceeded 1809, the date of the experiments, by 5650 years, being only 151 less than the Mosaic chronology gives as the age of the world at that time.

GUIDE TO THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

by the sacred writers have been investigated and judiciously arranged by a learned and indefatigable student of the Bible, in the 'Scripture Encyclopædia,' published in the Critica Biblica.*

§ 3.—Botany.

Scientific Arrangements in the Scriptures; Herbaceous Productions; Fruitingness of Palestine.

1. Solomon exhibits the same adherence to system, as Moses (Ge. 1:11, 12), in his treatises on natural history, mentioned in 1 K. 4:33, advancing in a scientific order, from the lesser to the larger: from grass, including the minutest species of whatever is green, to shrubs, or trees of the smaller kind; and from these, again, to trees, which differ, not only in their enlarged dimensions, but in their permanency also.

2. The common term for herbaceous productions, in the Hebrew writings, is desh, although it is also specifically applied to grass. The Hebrews, as Wetstein remarks, divided all kinds of vegetables into trees and herbs; the former of which the Hellenists call calon, the latter, chartos, under which they also comprehended all sorts of grass, corn, and flowers. See Mat. 6:30. Lu. 12: 23, &c. There is great improvidence, as the late editor of Calmet has shown, in our version of Pr. 27:25, which he tr. 'The tender risings of the grass are in motion, and the budings of the grass (grass in its early state) appear; and the tails of grass, proceeding from the same root, collect themselves together, and by their union, begin to clothe the mountain tops with a pleasing verdure.' Surely the beautiful progress of vegetation, as described in this passage, must appear to every reader of taste as too poetical to be lost; but what must it be to an Eastern beholder—to one whose imagination is exalted by a poetic spirit—one who has lately witnessed an all-surrounding sterility—a grassless waste! A similar gradation of poetical imagery is used in 2 K. 19:26—"Their inhabitants were of shortened hand, dismayed, ashamed; they were as grass of the field (vegetables in general); as the green budings of grass; as the tender risings on the house-tops; and those, too, struck by the wind, before it is advanced in growth to a rising up." What a climax of imbecility! A tree is, in the Hebrew Scriptures, called atz, from a verb which signifies 'to make firm,' or 'steady'; and it is thus distinguished from herbage or plants, which are more soft and loose.

3. It is demonstrable, from numerous and authentic sources, that those writers who have described Palestine as a barren and unfruitful place, have formed their notions upon a very partial survey of the land; or else that they have, from unworthy motives, grossly misrepresented the fact.† Abulfida describes this country as the most fruitful part of Syria; and the neighborhood of Jerusalem as one of the most fruitful parts of Palestine. Tacitus compares both the climate and soil of Judea to those of Italy; and particularly specifies the palm-tree and balsam-tree, as productions which gave the country an advantage over his own.‡ Amongst other indigenous productions may be enumerated the cedar, and other varieties of the pine [comp. cut, colored page], the cypress, oak, sycamore [cut, colored page], mulberry-tree, fig-tree, willow, turpentine-tree [cut, colored page], acacia, aspen, arbutus, almond-tree, tamarisk, ollaander, peach-tree, chaste-tree, carob or locust-tree [cut, colored page], oskar, olive, doom, the plane-tree [cut, colored page], mustard-plant, aloe, citron, apple, pomegranate; and many flowering shrubs, as the rose, myrtle, &c. Since the country has fallen under the dominion of the Turks, the balsam has ceased to be cultivated; but it is still found in Arabia.||

§ 4.—Zoography.

Scripture Arrangements of Mows and Solomon; Clean and Unclean Beasts—Structure, Functions, &c. of Man—Animals Inhabiting Palestine—Scripture Notices of Birds—Birds inhabiting Palestine—Ichthyology of the Bible—Reptiles—Insects.

1. The several classes of animated nature are disposed by Moses in the same orderly and systematic arrangement, both in Ge. 1: and De. 4:16-18, where his system takes this form:—

and to this order, Solomon, in the zoographical part of his natural history, mentioned in 1 K. 4:33, conforms. We are not able further to trace the system of this celebrated naturalist; but, as Mr. C. Taylor remarks, it is reasonable to conclude, that the outlines, which are so scientifically laid down, were filled up with equal judgment and skill. If so, we are led to the conclusion, that Aristotle was not the first philosopher who perceived the necessity and accomplished the task of methodically arranging the animal creation.

II. But there is another arrangement in the writings of Moses, too deeply interwoven with the Jewish ritual to be passed over in silence—the division of animals into clean and unclean. Michaelis judiciously remarks, that we are too apt to consider the terms clean and unclean as implying a division of animals with which we are wholly unacquainted; and then wonder that Moses, as an historian, in describing the circumstances of the deluge, which took place many centuries before the era of his own laws, should mention clean and unclean beasts, and by so doing, presuppose that there was such a distinction made at that early period. But the phrase 'clean and unclean' beasts is precisely tantamount to 'beasts usual and not usual for food.' Of all animals are there not poisonous, but perfectly edible, which yet we do not eat, and at the flesh of which many among us would feel a strong repugnance, just because we have not been accustomed to it from infancy! Of all animals, man was the most unclean; i. e. human flesh was least of all things to be eaten. The lion and the horse are unclean beasts, but were to the Hebrews just as little objects of contempt as to us. In Le. 11:4, &c. solipeds, or animals of one hoof, such as the horse and the ass, are unclean; fissipedes, or animals having hoofs divided into two parts, are clean. But then this division must be entire, not partial; effective, not apparent only; and, as well as its external construction, its internal or anatomical constitution must be strictly analogous with this formation. Moreover, animals having feet divided into more than two parts are unclean; so that the number of their toes, as three, four, or five, is cause sufficient for the entire rejection of them, whatever other quality they may possess. Such appears to be the principle of the Lexical distinction of animals into clean and unclean, derived from the conformation of their feet: their rumination is a distinct character, but a character absolutely unavailing without the more obvious and evident marks derivable from the construction we have noticed. To inquire into the reasons upon which these distinctions were founded, forms no part of our present business. That they were of a mixed nature there is every reason to think; but be this as it may, it is certain that they were founded upon a correct knowledge of the nature of the animal creation, and were induced, to some extent, by didactical and moral considerations. Michaelis remarks, 'That in so early an age of the world, we should find [this] systematic division of quadrupeds, so excellent as never yet, after all the improvements in natural history, to have become obsolete, but, on the contrary, to be still considered as useful by the greatest masters of science, cannot but be looked upon as truly wonderful.' Upon these principles, too, has been founded, more or less, almost every methodical arrangement subsequently made in natural science. Of these, the systems of Ray, Linnaeus, and Cuvier, are the most celebrated.¶

III. The object of divine revelation being rather to prepare man's spiritual and moral nature for a holier and higher state of existence, than to communicate a philosophical knowledge of those intellectual and physical properties that at once identify him with and distinguish him from the rest of the animal creation, we should be wasting our time were we to search there for such discoveries as these.|| But there are, notwithstanding, a number of interesting particulars as to the nature of man scattered throughout the sacred volume, that will repay the student for any trouble or labor he may undertake to collect them and investigate their import. Neither physiology nor chemistry, with all the accuracy and assiduity with which these sciences have been pursued of late years, has been able to arrest or develop the fugitive principle of life, though,—the express assertion of Moses (Le. 17:10, 11, &c.)—the Parsees, the Hindoos, Homer, and Virgil, place it in the blood. Science has unfolded to us, perhaps, the means by which life is produced and maintained in the animal frame; but it has given us no information as to the thing itself. We behold the instrument before us, and see some of the fingers that play upon it; but we know nothing whatever of the mysterious essence that dwells in the vital tubes, and constitutes the vital harmony. The animal frame is a combination of solids and fluids, duly harmonized, and equally contributing to each other's perfection. The principle of life, of whatever it consists, exists equally in both; in some kinds in a greater, in others in a lesser, degree. In the fluids, Mr. Hunter †† has traced it down to their first and lowest stage of existence, for he has traced it in the chyle; and there are evident proofs of its accompanying several of those which are eliminated from the body. In the blood it exists, as we have already said, in a high degree of activity, and probably in a still higher in the aeryous fluid. In the solids it varies equally. There are some in which it can scarcely be traced at all, except from their increasing growth, as the cellular membrane and the bones; in others we find a perpetual internal activity, or susceptibility to external impressions. But it is in those irritable threads or fibres, that constitute the general substance of the muscles or flesh of the animal, that the principle of life exerts itself in its most extraordinary manner.‡‡ The anatomy of man, says Galen, discovers above 600 different muscles; and whoever only considers these, will find that in each of them nature must have adjusted at least ten different circumstances, in order to attain the end which she proposed—proper figure, just magnitude, right disposition of the several ends, the upper and lower position of the whole, and the due insertion of the several nerves, veins, and arteries. So that, in the muscles alone, above six thousand several views and intentions must have been formed and executed! This writer calculated the bones to be 234, and the distinct purposes aimed at in the structure of each, above forty. This makes eleven thousand three hundred and sixty! What a prodigious display of artifice, even in these simple and homogeneous parts! But if we consider the skin, ligaments, vessels, glands, humors, and the several limbs and members of the body, how must our astonishment rise, in proportion to the number and intricacy of the parts so artificially adjusted! Ps. 139:14. If we turn from the animal to the intellectual part of man, our admiration will rise in proportion to the superiority of his mental powers over his bodily organs and functions. [Note, end of Ro. 7.] We perceive, indeed, man's whole constitution so admirably fitted to the constitution of the universe, that the pious heart involuntarily bursts forth into adoring love of that God, who has placed us in a condition of discipline, which sets before us an endless social progress of ever-increasing happiness in the constant advance towards perfection. Mat. 5:43]

IV. We have but imperfect notices of the zoology of Palestine.* The Scriptures contain familiar references to the lion, the wolf [see the cut, Concordance], the fox, the leopard [cut], the hyena, the jackal, and the wild boar, which induce a belief that they were native animals. The wilder animals, however, have mostly disappeared. Hasselquist, a disciple of Linnaeus, who visited the Holy Land in 1750, mentions, as the only animals he saw, the porcupine, the jackal [cut], the fox, the rock-goat, and the fallow-deer. We know, however, that formerly the antelope, the hart, and the hind, were common in the country. Captain Mangles describes an animal of the goat species as large as the ass, with long, knotty, upright horns, some bearded, and their color resembling that of the gazelle: the Arabs call them medu or neddu. The Syrian goat has very long ears, which are more than once alluded to in the sacred writings [Concord., GOAT, WILD GOAT]; and the large tail of the sheep [cut] is scarcely less remarkable. Burckhardt mentions wild boars [cut, Concord.] and cunees as inhabiting the woody parts of Mount Tabor. The horse does not appear to have been generally adopted till after the return of the Jews from Babylon. Solomon was the first monarch who collected a numerous stud of the finest horses that Egypt or Arabia could produce. In the earlier times, the wild ass [cut] was deemed worthy of being employed for the purposes of royal state as well as convenience. See Jud. 5: 10, 10:34; 12:13, 14; 1 K. 4:21. The breed of cattle reared in Bashan and Gilead were remarkable for their size, strength, and fatness.

V.—1. The common name for a bird, in the Hebrew Scriptures, is tzephur, a rapid mover, or hurried; a name very expressive of that volatile creature. A more general and indefinite name is ouph, a flier; but under this term is comprehended every thing that flies, whether bird or insect. It is often translated swallow in the English Bible [from the Anglo-Saxon word fleon, to fly]. A bird of prey is called oth, a rasher, from the impetuosity with which it dashes upon its prey.

2. There is not in the Mosaic institutes any reference to the conformation, as the means of distinguishing birds into clean and unclean, lawful and unlawful; a list of exceptions forms the sacred directory, and certain kinds are forbidden, without a word concerning those that are allowed. Those lying on grain do not appear to be prohibited; and as these are the domesticated kinds, we might almost express it in other words—that birds of prey, generally, are rejected; i. e., those with crooked beaks and strong talons, whether they prey on fowls, on animals, or on fish; while those which eat vegetables are admitted as lawful. So that the same principle is admitted, to a certain degree, among birds as among beasts. The excepted birds are of three classes:—

3. The eagle [cut], the vulture [cut], the cormorant [cut, Concord.], the bittern [cut, Concord.], the stork, the owl [cut, Concord.], the pigeon, the swallow [cut], the crane, and the dove, were familiar to the Hebrews, ancient and modern. Hasselquist enumerates the following from his own observation—the vulture, two species, one seen near Jerusalem, the other near Cana in Galilee; the falcon, near Nazareth; the jackdaw, in numbers, in the oak-woods near Galilee; the green wood-spite, at the same place; the bee-eatcher, in the groves and plains between Aera and Nazareth; the nightingale, among the willows at Jordan and olive-trees of Judea; the field-lark, every where; the goldenfinch, in the gardens near Nazareth; the red partridge, and two other species [cut, Concord.]; the quail, and the quail of the Israelites [cut, Concord.]; the turtle-dove, and the ring-dove. Game is abundant; partridges, in particular, being found in large coveys, so fat and heavy that they may easily be knocked down with a stick. Wild-ducks, widgeons, snipes, and water-fowl of every description, abound in some situations.||

VI.—1. There are but few references to the subject of ichthyology in the sacred writings. The reasons are obvious; the Jews being an agricultural people, fish formed no considerable part of their food; nor could they furnish any striking objects of comparison or illustration to the sacred writers, as was the case with quadrupeds and birds. The well-known biblical appellations of fish are dog and tanninim; the former being expressive of their amazing fecundity; the latter, of their rapid motion. In Ge. 1:21, the word tanninim, rendered ‘great whales,’ by our trs., seems used to describe fish of the largest description, and not any particular species. We should not omit to notice, in justification of Ju. 21:11, that the sea of Tiberias was well stocked with fish of a very large size. Hasselquist,‡ and Egmund, and Heyman,* notice the charmus, or haroud, which is common to this lake and the hill, and which weighs nearly 30 pounds.

2. As an article of food, ‘All that have scales and fins,’ says Moses, ‘are clean; all others unclean.’ On this, Mr. Taylor observes, that fishes’ fins are analogous to the feet of land animals; and as the sacred legislator had given directions for separating animals according to their hoofs and claws, so he directs that fishes, which had no clear and distinct members adapted to locomotion, should be unclean. Those with fins were to be clean, provided they also had scales.

3. Though fish was the usual food of the Egyptians, we learn from Herodotus,|| and Chæremon, as quoted by Porphyry,|| that their priests abstained from fish of all sorts. Hence we may see how distressing was the infliction which turned the waters of the river into blood, and occasioned the death of the fish. See Ex. 7:18-21. Their sacred stream became so polluted as to be unfit for drink, for bathing, and for other uses of water to which they were superstitiously devoted (see Ex. 2:1, 7:15, 8:20), and themselves obliged to nauseate what was the usual food of the common people, and held sacred by the priests.||

VII. Of reptiles we have not much information in the Scriptures. The Heb. nachash appears to be used as a general term for the whole serpent genus. The primitive meaning of the word from which this appellation is derived signifies to view, observe attentively, &c.; and so remarkable are serpents for this quality, that ‘a serpent’s eye’ became a proverb among the Greeks and Romans, who applied it to those who view things sharply or acutely. An ingenious writer, speaking of the supposed fascination of the rattlesnake’s eye, says, ‘It is, perhaps, more universal among the venomous serpents than is supposed; our common viper has it.’|| The craft and subtlety of the serpent are noticed in Scripture as qualities by which it is distinguished above every other beast of the field. Ge. 3:1. Of its prudence and cunning, many instances are adduced; though it is but reasonable to suppose, that, in common with the rest of the animal creation, it has suffered in these from the curse.

Calmet enumerates 11 kinds of serpents that were known to the Hebrews:—1. Ephe, the viper;—2. Chephir, a sort of aspic;—3. Acthuth, the aspic; 4. Pethen, a similar reptile; 5. Tzehor, a speckled serpent; 6. Tzimmoth; 7. Tzephoh, or Tzephoni, a basilisk; 8. Kippos, the asps; 9. Sheppiphon, the cobra; 10. Shackl, the black serpent; 11. Soraph, a flying serpent.

The prophet Isaiah mentions the viper among the venomous reptiles which, in extraordinary numbers, infested the land of Egypt. 30:6. He compares a mischief-hatcher to a viper; and in a viper’s womb Father Labat found 6 eggs, each the size of a goose’s egg, and containing from 13 to 15 young ones, about 6 inches long, and as thick as a goose quill. They were no sooner liberated than they crept about, and put themselves into a threatening posture, coiling themselves up, and biting his stick.

VIII. Of the insect tribes mentioned in the Bible, we may notice, amongst the wingless ones, the scorpion, the spider, the flea, and the louse—all hideous and revolting in their appearance and habits: amongst the winged classes, the zimb, or dog-fly, the hornet, the gnat, the moth, the bee, the ant, and the locust, are the most prominent. Insects, as well as reptiles, were prohibited generally by the inspired lawgiver of the Hebrews. Le. 11:20. The only exception was in favor of those winged insects which, in addition to four walking legs, have also two longer springing legs, for the purpose of leaping from off the earth. This provision embraces locusts, which are declared to be clean in all the four stages of their existence, and are a common article of food in the East to this day, as they were in the time of John the Baptist. ARTS AND USAGES.

Moth; its Chrysalis, and Fly.

THESE having been fully noted and explained in the Commentary, on the texts where allusions to them occur, this section will be chiefly occupied with a description of the cuts of the colored pages herewith; which complete the pictorial illustrations of these subjects, already so amply embellished in this way. The American editor will make a free use of Carpenter's remarks, which are too extended to be adopted entire. See, for each particular, the 'General Index,' in this volume.

State of the Arts amongst the Antediluvians: under Moses; and in the later Periods of the Hebrew Commonwealth.

A careful reader of the Mosaic account of the antediluvian world will be disposed to think that mankind had, at that period, made nearer approaches towards civilization—which consists in an appropriation of the arts and sciences to the conveniences, comforts, and enjoyments of life—that is generally supposed. There is no doubt that the inhabitants of the old world possessed a knowledge of agriculture, architecture, metallurgy, music, engraving, writing, and probably of weaving. They were governed by laws, both civil and religious; such as the rights of property and relationship, freedom of person, the observance of the Sabbath, marriage, &c. With regard to agriculture, the fact is certain. Man was made to dress and till the earth (Ge. 2:15); Cain was a husbandman, as was also Noah, who, besides, understood the planting of vineyards (Ge. 9:20), and the method of fermenting the juice of the grape, for it is said that 'he drank of the vine,' which produced inebriation, v. 21. Pasturage is an occupation coeval with the birth of man. Adam had dominion over cattle (Ge. 1, seq.); Cain and Noah, in their agricultural pursuits, must have included pasture; and Abel seems to have been exclusively occupied as 'a keeper of sheep.' From the circumstance of the early postdiluvian patriarchs constantly migrating from place to place, there is good reason to think that pasture occupied so much of their attention as to form their almost exclusive employment. The 'golden age' of the heathen world was said to be under the government of 'shepherd-kings'; and it may be reasonably supposed, that in the world before the flood the same occupation ranked high. In fact, we find this intimated in Ge. 1:20, where it is said, that 'Jabal was the father of such as have cattle,' or whose occupation was pasture, which would include all its branches, as shepherd, swine-herd, cow-herd, &c. In proof of the fact, that the antediluvians had made some advancement in architecture, we may refer to the building of a city by Cain (Ge. 4:17); and to the construction, by Noah, of that extraordinary and stupendous vessel in which the race was saved during the deluge. Nor can we look at the circumstances connected with the building of Babel, without conviction, that those employed in the work must have derived their knowledge, through the sons of Noah, from the antediluvians. In metallurgy, they had made considerable advances; they wrought in brass and iron, Ge. 4:22. The art of constructing musical instruments was understood; for Jubal was the father of those who played upon the kinner and the hugah—the lute and the ancient organ, or pantheon pipes, Ge. 4:21. The antediluvians also possessed the means of communicating their ideas and of recording facts by writing or hieroglyphics. The story of Lamech and his wives—the oldest specimen of poetry extant—bears all the evidences of having been an existing document which Moses incorporated into his narrative; as do also the genealogies, &c., of the antediluvian patriarchs.^{*} Touching the manufacture of cloth, by wearing, or some such process, Jabal was the first of those who dwelt in tents, and Noah adopted the same kind of dwelling-place (Ge. 4:20; 9:21); at the same time we must admit, that these might have been constructed of the skins of beasts.

Soon after the flood, we find numerous references to the advanced state of the arts. See Ge. 13:4-6. 21:11, 24:22, 24:53, &c. In the time of Moses, the knowledge of the arts of architecture, metallurgy, cabinet-making, masonry, spinning, embroidery, must have attained to a high degree of perfection.[†] Indeed, the sacred writer expressly states, that the Lord filled certain persons with the Spirit of God, 'in wisdom, in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship, to devise curious works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass; and in the cutting of stones to set them, and in carving of wood, to make any manner of cunning work; as also to engrave and embroider.' See Ex. 36:30-35. Agriculture and pasture was specially cultivated by the Hebrews, these being the particular pursuits encouraged by the polity to which they became subject. In 1 Ch. 4:11, 'a valley of craftsmen,' or 'artisans,' are spoken of; and in verse 21 we find 'female workers of fine linen'; as in Ex. 36:25, 26. In 1 Ch. 4:23, 'the potters,' or 'formers,' are spoken of; and from 2 K. 24:11, we find that 'smiths' found occupation in Jerusalem. There are numerous other passages in the historical and prophetic books of the Old and New Testaments, from which it is evident that many of the arts were cultivated and well understood by the Jewish people, especially after their return from Babylon, and under the dominion of the Romans.

SECTION I.

WRITINGS AND BOOKS.

The origin of writing is involved in impenetrable obscurity. Some believe it to have been in use amongst the antediluvians, while others suppose it not to have been known until it was required to take down the law delivered upon Mount Sinai. We believe that the arguments in support of the former of these hypotheses greatly preponderate; but our limits forbid discussion. We must refer to those writers who have professedly treated on the subject;[‡] [and also to the note, at the end of Ez., where it is copiously illustrated.]

SECTION II.

ENGRAVING, SCULPTURE, AND PAINTING,
Early Origin of Engraving—Signets and their Uses—Sculpture and Painting.

1.—1. The manner in which the engraver's art is spoken of in the Pentateuch, shows that in the time of Moses it was an art of no recent invention; and that, among the surrounding nations, signets were then common, and in well-known use. The onyxes for the sacred ephod, the plate of gold, for the mitre of the high-priest, and the precious stones for his breastplate, were all expressly ordered to be engraved 'like the engravings of a signet'; that is to say, being effected by direct incision with a tool, by the Italians termed intaglio, which is now become, in all the languages of Europe, a technical word, distinguishing this mode of art from engraving in cameo, from sculpture by excision, and from that species of low relief bedded in the stone, which was, at the time of the Hebrew exode, so much in use among the engravers of Egyptian hieroglyphics.

2. From the passages in the book of Exodus, Mr. John Landseer, to whom we are indebted for much curious and original matter on the subject,[§] argues the frequency of signets in the time of Moses, and, of course, the commonness of the art of engraving. We read, in Genesis ch. 38, that Judah, the elder brother of Joseph, possessed a portable signet, which it would appear that he carried about with him on ordinary occasions, and left as a pledge with his disguised daughter-in-law, when on his way to the sheep-shearing at Timnath—an event which must have happened several years before the sons of Jacob were driven into Egypt by famine. In the book of Job, certainly one of the oldest, if not the very oldest, writing extant, the references to signets, engraved seals, and their uses in sealing, are frequent. But after these early times, the references to these engraved signets are very few; for it appears that Moses suppressed the use of them in consequence of their connection with the Sabean idolatry. Jezebel appears to have signed her forged letters to the elders with one of these (1 K. 21:8); and in the prophet Jeremiah very particular mention is made of another signet, used as an instrument of legality in the purchase of a field (32:7, 8, &c.), from which it would appear to have been the custom of the Hebrew conveyancers, in the reign of Zedekiah, to deposit a sealed copy of every deed of transfer of landed property in some public office. But the most important occasion of Hebrew sealing that is any where upon record, is that of the ratification of the new covenant, by 'the princes, Levites, and priests,' which is particularly detailed by Nehemiah, 9:38. Sealing is here obviously tantamount to signing, or rather is signing; and it seems pretty clear from the specification of the names of the signing priests and chiefs, and from other circumstances, that among the Jews the astronomical signets of the patriarchal ages had by this time been superseded by signets bearing the respective names of their proprietors.^{||}

II. Neither sculpture nor painting appear to have made any noticeable progress amongst the Hebrews. The application of these arts to the purposes of idolatrous worship was a sufficient reason for their discouragement amongst the chosen people of God, who were to be wholly unlike the nations by which they were surrounded, both in their character and their pursuits. From Is. 44:9-13, it seems that there were 'artists' regularly and scientifically employed in the manufacture of idols—the smith, the carpenter, and the sculptor. This is a very curious passage, and it is, so far as we can recollect, the only passage in the O. T. in which there is a distinct reference to any thing like the art of sculpture. 'Molten images' are spoken of again in Is. 41:29, and other places.

SECTION III.

ARCHITECTURE.

Tents—Villages—Houses—Furniture—Ships.

We have already noticed the general intimations that occur in the early scriptures, especially in those parts relating to the antediluvian world, of the state and progress of architecture in those times. We may now notice more particularly the state of the art, and the manner in which it was applied amongst the Hebrews, after the time of Moses.

1. There is no doubt that the ancient Jews lived in tents, similar to those now in use in the East. Dr. Shaw describes them as being of an oblong figure, not unlike the bottom of a ship turned upside down. They vary in size according to the number of their occupants, and are divided by a hanging carpet into separate apartments. They are kept firm and steady by bracing, or stretching down their eaves with cords, tied to hooked wooden pins, well pointed, which are driven firmly into the ground. They are covered with hair-cloth, for the purpose of keeping out the wet. Some of these tents are very splendid; and hence the pious declaration of the Psalmist, 'I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the (splendid) tents of the wicked.' Ps. 34:10.*

2. The villages of Judea, which were situated in the plains, were probably built of mud, or clay, as they are to this day in the principles; and although formed upon a divine model, there can be no doubt that it

We read of boats (Jn. 6:22, 23. Ac. 27:16, 30); swift ships (Jb. 9:26); gallant ships (Is. 33:21); a navy of ships (1 K. 9:26); ships of Tharsish (Is. 60:9); of Chittim (Da. 11:30); and of the Chaldeans (Is. 43:11).†

SECTION IV.

MUSIC.

The art of music is obviously amongst those to which mankind have been led by the appointment of nature itself. Civil music was used anciently on public occasions; for so we find Laban hints at sending away Jacob 'with mirth, with songs, with tabor, and with harp' Ge. 31:27. The first clear mention of sacred music is in Ex. 15:20. 'And Miriam the prophetess took a timbrel in her hand, and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances.' [Some shapes of these may be seen under the word TABERING, in the Concordance.] Here musical instruments are mentioned, not as any thing new, but as customary; not as confined to one, but as employed by many; and, indeed, had it been a novelty, 'all the women' could not have been provided with instruments. The employment of instruments, then, was no innovation in worship; it was found as a custom by Moses, and he adopted it as a matter of course. There can be no question that their services were con-furnished a pattern to after-times. Some of the parts and appendages of a ship are no-tinued to the time of David, who regulated the more extensive exercise of them, with a view to the temple solemnities; in which solemnities Solomon engaged and imbibed them.

In the tabernacle and the temple, the Levites were the lawful musicians, but on other occasions, any one who chose might use musical instruments. There was, however, this exception — the holy silver trumpets were to be blown only by the priests, who, by the sounding of them, proclaimed the festival days, assembled the leaders of the people, and gave the signal for battle, and for retreat. Num. 1:1-10. David, in order to give the best effect to the music of the tabernacle, divided the 4000 Levites into 24 classes, who sang psalms, and accompanied them with music. Each of these classes was superintended by a leader (חֶנְצָה) placed over it; and they performed the duties which devolved upon them, each class a week at a time, in succession. See 1 Ch. 16:5. 23:4, 5. 25:1-31. Comp. 2 Ch. 5. 12, 13. The classes collectively, as a united body, were superintended by three directors. This arrangement was subsequently continued by Solomon after the erection of the temple, and was transmitted till the time of the overthrow of Jerusalem. It was, indeed, sometimes interrupted during the reign of

* Travels, vol. i. p. 24*. [The tents of the Bedouins, which are probably an exact counterpart of those of the patriarchs, have generally 9 poles arranged in three lines, the middle line 7, the outer 5 feet high. The coverings are of hair-cloth, in 8 or 10 strips, sewed together, and completely shed the rain. Another cloth passes across the back part of the tent, and is hoisted to the covering by hooks on a string. A wool blanket spreads across the 3 middle uprights, dividing the men's apartment on the left from the women's on the right; the former has a carpet; the latter is a receptacle for the rubbish. The baggage is piled round the middle post; the camels' furniture, for seats, makes a wider circle. Patches of old cloaks are put where the poles touch the covering, and their corners being wound about a short stick with a leather loop, to this the cords are attached, and fastened to stakes, stuck at the distance of 3 or 4 feet. The middle post is forked, and has a round stick across the top, over which passes the cross piece of hair-cloth, which, running at right angles across them, strengthens the other 10 pieces. Each post and part has its appropriate name. In striking the tents, the 3 forward posts are taken down, and the whole falls back. See Burckhardt's 'Bedouins,' Ep. 1.]

MEDICINE AND CHIRURGY.

Physicians amongst the Hebrews — Modes of treating the Sick — Diseases mentioned in Scripture.

1. The theory of physic seems never to have made any considerable advances among the Hebrews. Physicius (פְּשָׁעֵנִים, rephaim) are first mentioned in Ge. 30:2. Ex. 21:19, Jb. 13:4. Some acquaintance with chirurgical operations is implied in the rite of circumcision; and there is ample evidence that the Israelites had some acquaintance with the internal structure of the human system, although it does not appear that dissections of the human body for medical purposes were made till as late as the time of Ptolemy. That physicians sometimes undertook to exercise their skill in removing diseases of an internal nature, is evident, from the circumstance of David playing upon the harp, to cure the malady of Saul 1 S. 16:16.

2. The art of healing was committed, among the Hebrews, as well as among the Egyptians, to the priests; who, indeed, were obliged, by a law of the state, to take cognizance of leprosy. Le. 13:1-11, 57. De. 21:8,9. Reference is made to physicians who were not priests, and to instances of sickness, disease, healing, &c., in the following passages — 1 S. 16:16. 1 K. 1:2-4, 15:23. 2 K. 8:29. 9:15. Is. 1:6. Jer. 8:22. Ez. 30:21. Pr. 3:18, 11:30. 12:18. 16:15, 29:1. The probable reason of King Asa's not seeking help from God, but from physicians, as mentioned in 2 Ch. 16:12, was, that they had not at that period recourse to the simple medicines which nature offered, but to certain superstitious rites and incantations; and this, no doubt, was the ground of the reflection that was cast upon him. About the time of Christ, the Hebrew physicians made advancements in science, and increased in numbers. See Mk. 5:26. Lu. 4:23. 5:31, 8:43. Joseph. Ant. xvii. 6, 5. It appears from the Talmud,† that the Hebrew physicians were accustomed to salute the sick by saying, 'Arise from your disease'; — a salutation adopted by our Lord. Mk. 5:41. According to the Jerusalem Talmud, a sick man was judged to be in a way of recovery when he began to take his usual food. Comp. Mk. 5:13.‡

3. With regard to the treatment of the sick and indisposed, and the expedients they employed to assuage or expel disease, the Hebrews appear to have proceeded by an invariable system, and uniformly to have practised certain rules and methods of cure, which had nothing to recommend them but the sacred prescription and sanction of antiquity.§ They seem to have regarded oil as a more efficacious remedy than any other discovery for mitigating or extirpating the various disorders of the human frame. The sick, whatever the distemper might be, they appear to have anointed with oil, as the most powerful preservative they knew from the further progress of the disease, and the most effectual remedy for the recovery and reestablishment of health. We have one of the medical prescriptions, which is in this form: — 'He who is afflicted with pains in his head, or eruptions in his body, let him unoint himself with oil.' || and this was deemed of such supreme efficacy, that one of the rabbins gave his dispensation for anointing the sick, even on the Sabbath.¶ To this common custom of treating sick persons, reference is made in Mk. 6:13, and Ja. 5:14.

Not that this unction, either in the former or latter case, contributed any thing to the miraculous cure, which the immediate power of God alone could effect; it served only as a striking external sign to the sick person, and to every spectator, to raise and engage the attention, and to impress the mind with the deepest conviction that the miracle was wrought to attest the divine authority and truth of the gospel. The balm of Gilead was celebrated as a medicine (Jer. 8: 22, 46; 11: 51:3), and mineral baths were deemed worthy of notice, as appears from Ge. 36:23.

4. The Hebrews, like other of the ancients, attributed the origin of diseases, particularly of those whose natural cause they did not understand, to the immediate interference of God. The ancient Greeks called them masticas, the scourges of God — a word which is employed in the N. T. by the physician Luke himself (7:21), and also by Mark. 5:29,34.

5. In the primitive ages of the world, diseases, in consequence of the great simplicity in the mode of living, were but few in number. At a subsequent period, the number was increased, by the accession of diseases that had been previously unknown. Epidemics, also, — diseases somewhat peculiar in their character, and still more fearful in their consequences, — soon made their appearance; some infesting one period of life, and some another; some limiting their ravages to one country, and some to another. The propriety of this statement, in regard to the original extent and subsequent increase of diseases in general, and to epidemics, will recommend itself to every mind that makes even but small pretensions to attainments in knowledge. Prosper Alpinus † mentions the diseases which are prevalent in Egypt, and in other countries in the same climate. They are ophthalmies, leprosies, inflammations of the brain, pains in the joints, the hernia, the stone in the reins and bladder, the phthisic, hectic, pestilential, and tertian fevers, weakness of the stomach, obstructions in the liver, and the spleen. Of these diseases, ophthalmies, pestilential fevers, and inflammations of the brain, are epidemics; the others are of a different character. Every region, and every age of the world, has been in the habit of attributing certain diseases to certain causes, and of assigning names to those diseases derived from the supposed origin or cause, whether it were a real or only an imaginary one. The names thus given have been in many instances retained, both by the vulgar and by men of medical science, after different causes had been developed and assigned to the diseases in question. In respect to this subject, we know that there are certain words of very ancient standing, which are used to express diseases of some kind or other; it will, therefore, be a prominent inquiry with us to learn what the diseases are that were designed to be expressed by those words.

(1) The disease of the Philistines, which is mentioned in 1 S. 5:6,12, 6:13, is denominated in the Hebrew ophelim. This word occurs likewise in De. 28:27, and the authors of the reading in the Keri appear to have assented to the opinion of Josephus, expressed in Ant. vi. 1, 1; and to have understood by this word the dysentery. But the probable supposition is, that solpugas (spiders, like mice) were at this time multiplied among the Philistines by the special Providence of God, and that, being very venomous, they were the means of destroying many individuals.

(2) The disease of king Jehoram. 2 Ch. 21:12-15,18,19. This disease, beyond all doubt, was the dysentery; and though its continuance so long a time was very uncommon, it is by no means a thing unheard of. The intestines in time become ulcerated, and are emitted or fall out, which is sufficient to account for the expressions used.||

(3) False conception does not appear to have been so unfrequent among the Hebrew women as among those of Europe. If it had been so, it probably would not have made its appearance on the pages of Hebrew writers, in the shape of a figure of speech. Is. 13:8, 26:17. 2 K. 19:3. Jer. 4:31, 13:21, 22:23, 30:6. Mi. 4:9,10. Jn. 16:21,22. Is. 26:13. Ps. 7:14.

(1) The leprosy prevails in Egypt in the southern part of Upper Asia, and, in fact, may be considered a disease endemic in warm climates generally. Accordingly, it is not at all surprising, if many of the Hebrews, when they left Egypt, were infected with it; but the assertion of Manetho, that they were all thus infected, and were in consequence of the infection driven out by force, in which he is precipitately and carelessly followed by Strabo, by Tacitus, by Justin Trogus, and by others more recent, is a mere dream, without any adequate foundation. We have reason to believe that it is concealed in the internal parts of the system a number of years; till at last it gives the fearful indications on the skin of having already gained a deep-rooted and permanent existence. A person who is leprosous from his nativity may live 50 years; one who in after-life is infected with it, may live 20 years; but they will be such years of dreadful misery as rarely fall to the lot of man in any other situation. The appearance of the disease externally is not always the same. The spot is commonly small, resembling in its appearance the small red spot that would be the consequence of a puncture from a needle, or the postules of a ringworm. The spots for the most part make their appearance very suddenly, especially if the infected person, at the period when the disease shews itself externally, happens to be in great fear, or to be intoxicated with anger. Nu. 12:10. 2 Ch. 26:19. They commonly exhibit themselves, in the first instance, on the face, about the nose and eyes; they gradually increase in size for a number of years, till they become, as respects the extent of surface which they embrace on the skin, as large as a pea or bean. They are then called נַגָּשׁ. The white spot or postule, נַגָּרֶב, morphea alba, and also the dark spot, סַפְתָּחָה, morphea nigra, are indications of the existence of the real leprosy. Le. 13:2,39, 14:56. From these it is necessary to distinguish the spot, which, whatever resemblance there may be in form, is so different in its effects, called בָּוּחָק, נַגָּרֶב, and also the harmless sort of scar, which occurs under the word כְּכֹפָחָה. Le. 13:6-8,29. Moses, in Le. ch. 13, lays down very explicit rules for the purpose of distinguishing between those spots which are proofs of the actual existence of the leprosy, and those spots which are harmless, and result from some other cause. Those spots which are the genuine effects and marks of the leprosy, gradually dilate themselves, till at length they cover the whole body. Not only the skin is subject to a total destruction, but the whole body is affected in every part. The pain, it is true, is not very great; but there is a great debility of the system, and great uneasiness and grief, so much so as almost to drive the victim of the disease to self-destruction. Jb. 7:15. There are four kinds of the real leprosy. The first kind is of so virulent and powerful a nature, that it separates the joints and limbs, and mutilates the body in the most awful manner. The second is the white leprosy, אַרְגָּעָן. The third is the black leprosy, or Psora, חַרְבָּן. אַבְּכָעָה שְׁחָנָן, נַרְבָּן, שְׁחָנָן, פְּרָה. De. 23:27,35. Le. 21:20-22. The fourth description of leprosy is the alopecia, or red leprosy. The person who is infected with the leprosy, however long the disease may be in passing through its several stages, is at last taken away suddenly, and for the most part unexpectedly. But the evils which fall upon the living leper are not terminated by the event of his death. The disease is to a certain extent hereditary, and is transmitted down to the 3d and 4th generations; so that fact there seems an allusion in Ex. 20:4-6, 37. De. 5:9, 21:8,9. If any one should undertake to say, that in the 4th generation it is not the real leprosy, still it will not be denied, there is something which bears no little resemblance to it in the shape of defective teeth, of fetid breath, and a diseased hue. Leprous persons, notwithstanding the deformities and mutilation of their bodies, give no special evidence of a liberation from the strength of the sensual passions, and cannot be influenced to abstain from the procreation of children, when at the same time they clearly foresee the misery of which their offspring will be the inheritors. The disease of leprosy is communicated not only by transmission from the parents to the children, and not only by cohabitation, but also by much intercourse with a leprous person in any way whatever. Whence Moses acted the part of a wise legislator* in making those laws, which have come down to us, concerning the inspection and separation of leprous persons, [that the race might not degenerate]. The object of these laws will appear peculiarly worthy, when it is considered that they were designed, not wanting to fix the charge of being a leper upon an innocent person, and thus to impose upon him those restraints and inconveniences which the truth of such a charge naturally implies; but to ascertain in the fairest and most satisfactory manner, and to separate those, and those only, who were truly and really leprous. As this was the prominent object of his laws that have come down to us on this subject, viz. to secure a fair and impartial decision on a question of this kind, he has not mentioned those signs of leprosy which admitted of no doubt, but those only which might be the subject of contention; and left it to the priests, who also fulfilled the office of physicians, to distinguish between the really leprous, and those who had only the appearance of being such. In the opinion of Hensler,† Moses, in the laws to which we have alluded, discovers a great knowledge of the disease. Every species of leprosy is not equally malignant; the most virulent species defies the skill and power of physicians. That which is less so, if taken at its commencement, can be healed. But in the latter case also, if the disease has been of long continuance, there is no remedy.

(5) The Pestilence, in its effects, is equally terrible with the leprosy, and is much more rapid in its progress; for it terminates the existence of those who are infected with it almost immediately, and, at the furthest, within 3 or 4 days. The Gentiles were in the habit of referring back the pestilence to the agency and interference of that being, whatever it be, whether idol or spirit, whom they regarded as the divinity. The Hebrews also every where attribute it to the agency, either of God Himself, or of that legate or angel whom they denominate נֶלוֹך, meloach. We are not, however, to suppose that the Hebrews, in using these expressions, mean to attribute the pestilence to the immediate agency of God; nor would they permit us to understand by the messenger, who, they assure us, is the agent in business of so disastrous a nature, the true and appropriate angel or legate of Jehovah. It is true, they tell us, that God sends forth the pestilence, and that the angel goes with it and smites the people with its power; but let it not be forgotten, that every angel is the creature of God, and that, in a certain sense, God is the author of all things and all events, whether prosperous or afflictive, whether good or bad. When they aske God the author of the pestilence, it is clear they do not mean to say He is the immediate cause in so fearful a calamity, from the fact, that in other places they represent God as the author of moral evil, where they certainly do not mean to say He is the immediate author of such evil. In a somewhat recent period of their history, it cannot be denied, that instead of making God the author of evil, they attribute it to a malignant spirit of high origin, viz. Satan; but still they were aware of the origin of this being, that he was the creature of God, and acted beneath his superintendence. The difficulty, then, in regard to their representations, arises from this source, God, in a certain sense, is the author of all things. This is true. But the ancient Hebrews do not appear to have distinguished with sufficient accuracy that liberty or permission which is given us, in the course of divine providence, to do or not to do, to do good or evil, from the direct and immediate agency of God Himself. De. 4:19. Jos. 11:20. 2 S. 16:10. 24:1; comp. 1 Ch. 21:1. 2 K. 17:14. Ps. 78:49-51. In consequence of this disposition to identify the agency of God with the actions of his creatures, and to confound the original with second and subsidiary causes, we find, by consulting the Scriptures, that they sometimes represent men, and sometimes animals, or inanimate existences, as כָּלְאַבְנִים, the messengers or the angels of God; and this is not only in poetry, but likewise in prose. Ps. 34:7. 101:4. He. 2:2. Ac. 7:53. 12:23. Ga. 3:19. Comp. Josephus, Antiq. xv. 5. 3. This mode of speech was so common, that the Sadducees of a more recent age, who, although they received the Scriptures with veneration, denied the existence of any spirits, interpreted all the passages (where mention is made of angels) of other existences, which were employed by God as instruments, and, as they supposed, were, from that circumstance merely, denominated the messengers or angels of God. The Samaritans, likewise, as has been shown by Reland,‡ gave the same perverted interpretation to the word which is rendered angel. This mode of speaking found its way also among the Syrians, who were in the habit of calling diseases angels, i. e. messengers, that were sent to inflict punishment upon men; and were accustomed to denounce a sick man, one tempted or tried of God, or of his angel.§ It is in this way that the pestilence (the secondary cause of it being overlooked) is attributed directly to God (Ex. 11:4-7, 12:23,29. Comp. Ps. 78:19,50); also to an angel (2 S. 24:15, 16), who is represented as slaying men with a sword; and in 1 Ch. 21:16, is described with the additional circumstance of being elevated between heaven and earth. But that God or the angel, in these instances, is merely the pestilence itself, the original cause being put for the effect, and being identified with it in a way which is not common among us, seems to be sufficiently clear from 2 S. 24:12,15, where a pestilence, with its ordinary and natural attributes, is the prominent subject of discourse. This view of the subject gives a reason why the Septuagint renders the word ἡγγένη, deber, or pestilence, in Ps. 91:6, by δαίμονιον μεσημβρίον, i. e. the demon of noon-day; and why Jonathan renders the same word in the Chaldee Targum, Ha. 3:5, by the Chaldee word ְלָבָשׁ, meloach, angel or messenger. We lay it down, then, as a general principle, that wherever we are told an angel scatters abroad a pestilence, the pestilence merely, as in the case of Sennacherib's army, is meant by such expressions. 2 K. 19:35. Comp. 2 K. 18:23. 19:6-8. The idea that Sennacherib's army perished by means of the pestilence, communicated in the way above alluded to, or some other, agrees better than any other hypothesis with the fact, that the survivors in that army were not aware, till the return of the morning light, of the immense number that had died.|| It may be remarked that no one ever recovered from the pestilence, unless the bile of the pestilence came out upon him. And even then he could not always be cured. 2 K. 20:7. 1s. 33:21.

(6) The disease of Saul and of Nebuchadnezzar.—A person who understands the extent and the proper bearing of the principle defended in the preceding paragraph, will readily see that the spirit of God which departed from Saul was no other than an upright and a generous tendency of mind; and that the evil spirit from the Lord, which beset and filled him with terror (1 S. 16:14,15, 18:10. 19:3), was a sort of madness, which had the effect of deceiving him into the idea that he was a prophet; for it seems that he prophesied, and, in all probability, predicted the loss of his own kingdom. The Targum of Jonathan accordingly renders the word תְּהֻבָּה, he was mad or insane. This evil spirit, in a word, was not more a spirit or messenger from God than the evil spirit which, in Jud. 9:23, is said to have been sent by Him among the Shechemites; and which, certainly, as was evident even to the ancient interpreters, and has been since to every body else, was nothing more than the spirit of strife and dissension. In the same way, the spirit of fornication, ruach zenuim, in Ho. 4:12, is merely lust. Comp. 1 S. 11:6. 16:14. Jud. 3:10. 6:34. 11:29. 14:6. Ps. 51:11. Ez. 11:19. 18:31. This representation, more than any other, is suitable to the fact that Saul was benefited by music; for the charms of music, however great its efficacy in any other case, would have been very incompetent to the task of subduing the untractable spirit of a real demon. This mode of speaking did not originate, as some have supposed, in the time of the captivity, from the doctrine held by the Mehestani, although it undoubtedly at that time became more common, and was used with greater latitude than at any previous period. For agreeably to this mode of speech, and to the belief on which it is founded, viz. the subordinate agency of angels, we find mention made in Da. 4:10, 11,20, ¶ of בְּנֵי יְהֹוָה, or star-watchers. The designs or the decrees of these 'holy watchers' as they are termed, which are made known to Nebuchadnezzar in his vision, and are stated in the verses above mentioned, are referred by Daniel, in v. 28 of the same ch., to the immediate agency of God Himself; a circumstance which is altogether conformable to what has been already stated, in this and the preceding section, on this subject. The disease of Nebuchadnezzar, mentioned in this chapter, was that of insanity or madness. His mind was in such a state, his reasoning powers were so perverted and deranged, that it appeared to him as if he heard a voice from heaven, declaring his expulsion from the kingdom; and he imagined that he was really transformed into a beast. Accordingly he acknowledges, in 4:31,33, that he had again received the use of his reason; which is an evidence that he understood the disease from which he had recovered to have been insanity.

(7) Demoniæ.—The inquiry respecting the demoniæ, who are so often introduced in the N. T., and likewise in the writings of profane authors of antiquity, is a very intricate and a very difficult one. There are some persons who contend that the demons were all of them either madmen, epileptics, or persons subject to melancholy; and they make their appeal in behalf of their opinions to physicians. They, accordingly, in their interpretation of those expressions which are employed in reference to demons, go on the principle, that the sacred writers meant by them the same and nothing more than would be naturally meant, in ease the possessed persons were merely the subjects of those diseases. Other persons, both theologians and physicians, have strong objections to this view of the subject. In their estimation, the expressions in the N. T. clearly imply that the demons were possessed by an evil spirit; and this state of things, they suppose, was permitted in the providence of God, in order to give to the Savior an opportunity to exhibit his miraculous powers. This, however, is too purely a questio hermeneutica to be discussed here. Those who desire satisfaction may refer to Hewlett's Commentary; Townsend's New Test. vol. i. p. 157; Carlisle's Essay on Evil Spirits, passim; or to the Critica Biblica, vol. iii., where the substance of the arguments employed by these writers is given. Jahn has also devoted some space to the discussion, in his Archaeologia, § 192-197.

(3) The palsy of the N. T. is a disease that is of very wide import. Many infirmities, as Richter has demonstrated, were comprehended under the word which is rendered palsy in the N. T. (1) The apoplexy, a paralytic shock which affected the whole body. (2) The hemiplegy, which affects and paralyzes only one side of the body. (3) The paraplegy, which paralyzes all the parts of the system below the neck. (4) The catlepsy, which is caused by a contraction of the muscles in the whole or part of the body (e. g. in the hands), and is very dangerous. The effects upon the parts seized are very violent and deadly. For instance, when a person is struck with it, if his hand happens to be extended, he is unable to draw it back. If the hand is not extended, when he is struck with the disease, he is unable to extend it. It appears diminished in size, and dried up. Hence the Hebrews were in the habit of calling it a withered hand. 1 K. 13:4-6. Zech. 11:17. Mat. 12:10

¶ 1. Moses, following the example of the Egyptians, made agriculture the basis of the state. He, accordingly, apportioned to every citizen a certain quantity of land, and gave him the right of tilling it himself, and of transmitting it to his heirs. The person who had thus come into possession, could not alienate the property for any longer period than the year of the coming jubilee: a regulation which prevented the rich from coming into possession of large tracts of land, and then leasing them out in small parcels to the poor—a practice which unequally prevailed, and does to this day, in the East. It was another law of Moses, that the vendor of a piece of land, or his nearest relative, had a right to redeem the land sold, whenever he chose, by paying the amount of profits up to the year of jubilee. Ru. 4:4. Jer. 32:7. Another law enacted by Moses on this subject was, that the Hebrews, as was the case among the Egyptians after the time of Joseph (Ge. 37:18, et seq.), should pay a tax of 2-10ths of their income to God, whose servants they were to consider themselves, and whom they were to obey as their king. Le. 27:30. De. 12:17-19. 14:22-29, whom Ge. 28:22. The custom of marking the boundaries of lands by stones, although it prevailed a long time before (Jb. 21:2), was confirmed and perpetuated, at the time of Moses, by an express law; and a curse was pronounced against him who without authority removed them. These regulations having been made in respect to the tenure, encumbrances, &c., of landed property, Joshua divided the whole country, which he had occupied, first, among the respective tribes, and, then, among individual Hebrews, running it out with the aid of a measuring line. Jos. 17:5, 14. Comp. Am. 7:17. Mi. 2:5. Ps. 78:55. Ez. 40:3. The word chbb, a line, is accordingly used by a figure of speech for the heritage itself. Ps. 11:6. Jos. 17:5, 14. 19:9.

2. The occupation of the husbandman was held in honor, not only for the profits which it brought, but from the circumstance that it was supported and protected by the fundamental laws of the state. All who were not set apart for religious duties, such as the priests and the Levites, whether inhabitants of the country, or of towns and cities, were considered by the laws, and were in fact agriculturists. The rich and the noble, it is true, in the cultivation of the soil, did not always put them-

13. Jn. 5:3. (5) The cramp, which, in Oriental countries, is a fearful malady, and is by no means unfrequent. It originates from the chills of the night. The limbs, when seized with it, remain immovable, sometimes turned in, and sometimes out, in the same position as when they were first seized. The person afflicted resembles a man undergoing the torture, and experiences nearly the same exquisite sufferings. Death follows this disease in a few days. Mat. 8:9-10. Comp. Lu. 7:2. 1 Mace. 9:55-59. (6) The disease, de-aminated in Mat. 9:20. Mk. 5:25, and Lu. 8:43, an issue of blood, is too well known to require any particular explanation. It may be well, however, to make this single observation, that physicians consider it a disorder difficult to be cured. Mk. 5:26.

(9) The disease of Herod Agrippa.—Josephus* and Luke (Ac. 12:23) attribute the disease with which Herod died to the immediate agency of God, because he so readily received the idolatrous acclamations of the people, who hailed and honored him as a divinity. Josephus says, the disease was in the intestines. But he perverts his statement by the intermixture of certain superstitious and incredible notions. Luke, who was a physician, says, more definitely and accurately, that Herod was consumed with worms, which, in Eastern countries, frequently prey upon the intestines. Josephus observes, that he died on the fifth day after the attack.

1. In primitive ages, the keeping of flocks was a principal employment among men. Ge. 2:15, 3:17-19, 42. [The cut below] shows the common Arab ‘sheep-cote’ in Persia, at Bushire, often alluded to in Scripture, under the names ‘habitation,’ ‘fold,’ &c., Greek epauion; note, Ac. 1:20.] Of equal antiquity is agriculture, a [gobler] art, which has ever been a prominent source both of the necessities and the conveniences of life. Those nations, which practised it at an early period, learned its value, not only from their own experience, but also from observing the condition of the neighboring countries that were destitute of a knowledge of it. Impressed with the importance of agriculture, Noah, after he had escaped from the deluge, once more bestowed upon it his attention; and there were some of the nomads who were far from neglecting it. Ge. 26:12-11. 25:34. 37:7. Jb. 1:3, §.

Those states and nations, especially Babylon and Egypt, which made the cultivation of the soil their chief business, arose in a short period to wealth and power; [nations of indolent hunters and roving nomads have indeed no leisure from wars and wanderings, to invent the increased comforts of a settled, industrious, well-fed, and therefore fast-multiplying population.] The Hebrews, too, learned the value of the art while remaining in Egypt, and ever after that time were famous for their industry in the cultivation of the earth.||

selves so a level with their servants; but none were so rich or so noble as to disdain to put their hand to the plough. 1 S. 11:7. 1 K. 19:19. Comp. 2 Ch. 26:10. The priests and Levites were indeed engaged in other employments, yet they could not withhold their honor from an occupation which supplied them with their income. The esteem in which agriculture was held, diminished as luxury increased; but it never wholly came to an end. Even after the captivity, when many of the Jews had become merchants and mechanics, the esteem and honor attached to this occupation still continued, especially under the dynasty of the Persians, who were agriculturists from motives of religion. [Note, end of Is. ch. 41, p. 423, vol. iii.]

3. The soil of Palestine, as we have stated in a previous section, is very fruitful, if the dews and vernal and autumnal rains are not withheld. The country, in opposition to Egypt, is eulogized for its rains in De. 11:10; but the Hebrews, notwithstanding the richness of the soil, endeavored to increase its fertility in various ways. They not only divested it of stones, but watered it by means of canals, communicating with the rivers or brooks; and thereby imparted to their fields the richness of gardens. Ps. 1:3. 65:10. Pr. 21:1. Is. 30:25. 32:2, 20. 10: 12:11. Springs, therefore, fountains, and rivulets, were held in as much honor and worth by husbandmen as by shepherds (Jos. 15:9. Jnd. 1:15); and we accordingly find that the land of Canaan was extolled for those fountains of water of which Egypt was destitute. The soil was enriched also, in addition to the method just mentioned, by means of ashes; to which the straw, the stubble, the husks, the brambles, and the grass, that overspread the land during the sabbatical year, were reduced by fire. The burning over the surface of the land had also another good effect, viz. that of destroying the seeds of the noxious herbs. Is. 7:23. 32:13. Pr. 24:31. Finally, the soil was manured with dung. Ps. 83:10. 2 K. 9:37. Is. 25:10. Jer. 8:2. 9:22. 16:4. 25:33. Lu. 14:34, 35.

4. The culture of the soil was at first very simple, being performed by no other instruments than sharp sticks. By these the ground was loosened, until spades and shovels, and not long after ploughs, were invented. All these implements were well known in the time of Moses. De. 23:13. Ge. 45:6. Jb. 1:14. The first plough was doubtless nothing more than a stout limb of a tree, from which projected another shortened and pointed limb. This being turned into the ground, made the furrows; while at the farther end of the longer branch was fastened a transverse yoke, to which the oxen were harnessed. At last a handle was added, by which the plough might be guided. So that the plough was composed of four parts—the beam, the yoke which was attached to the beam, the handle, and what we should call the colter. 1 S. 13:20, 21. Mi. 4:3. (Pliny, N. H., xviii. 47, speaks of ploughs constructed with wheels, which in his day were of recent invention.) It was necessary for the ploughman constantly and firmly to hold the handle of the plough, which had no wheels; and, that no spot might remain untouched, to lean forward and fix his eyes steadily upon it. Lu. 9:20. (Pliny, xviii. 49, No. 2.) The staff by which the colter was cleared, served for an ox-goad. In the East, at the present day, they use a pole about 8 feet in length; at the largest end of which is fixed a flat piece of iron for clearing the plough, and at the other end a spike (τέντα, κέρυπος) for spurring the oxen. Hence it appears that a goad might answer the purpose of a spear, which indeed had the same name, τέντα. 1 S. 13:21. Jud. 3:31. Sometimes a scourge was applied to the oxen. Is. 10:26. Na. 3:2. There seems to have been no other harrow than a thick clump of wood, borne down by a weight, or a man sitting upon it, and drawn over the ploughed field by oxen; the same which the Egyptians use at the present time. In this way the turfs were broken in pieces, and the field levelled; an operation which the word ἀπλά seems properly to signify, viz. to level, since, in Is. 28:24, 25, it is interchanged with ἀπλά. At a later period wicker-drags came into use, which Pliny mentions. (Pliny, xviii. 43.) The modern Orientals, except in India, are unacquainted with the cart; but formerly not only wagons (Ge. 45:19, 27. Nu. 7:3, 6, 7. 1 S. 9:7, 8, 10, 11, 14. Am. 2:13. Is. 5:18. 28:28), and warlike chariots, but also pleasure carriages, were used. Ge. 41:43. 45:19, 21. 2 K. 5:9. 2 S.

Agriculture on every 7th year came to an end. Nothing was sown, and nothing reaped; the vines and the olives were not pruned; there was no vintage, and no gathering of fruits, even of what grew wild; but whatever spontaneous productions there were, were left to the poor, the traveller, beasts, to let the ground recover its strength, and the wild beast. Le. 25:1-7. De. 15:1-10.

15:1. Ac. 8:28. All the ancient vehicles were moved upon two wheels only. [A solitary instance of 4 wheels occurs on the Egyptian monuments; the earliest extant.] Covered coaches are known to have been used by ladies of distinction, though this circumstance is not mentioned in the Bible; [and the cut, from the Egyptian monuments, shows a military man in a palanquin, with a parasol.]

5. The beasts of burden that endured the toils of agriculture, were bulls and cows, he-asses and she-asses. Jb. 1:11. 1 S. 6:7. Is. 30:24. 32:20. But it was forbidden to yoke an ass with an ox. De. 22:10. Those animals which in the Scriptures are called oxen, were bulls, for the Hebrews were prohibited from castrating, although the law was sometimes violated. Mu. 1:14. Bulls, in the warmer climates, especially if they are not greatly pampered, are not so ungovernable but that they may be harnessed to the plough. If, indeed, any became obstinate by rich pasture, their nostrils were perforated, and a ring, made of iron or twisted cord, was thrust through, to which was fastened a rope, which impeded his respiration to such a degree, that the most turbulent one might easily be managed. 2 K. 19:28. Is. 37:29. Ez. 19:4. Jb. 40:24. By this ring also camels, elephants, and lions, taken alive, were rendered manageable. When bulls became old, their flesh was unsuitable for aliment; for which reason they were left to die a natural death; for the old age of these animals, which had been their companions in labor, was treated by the Hebrews with kindness. Whence it is said, that, in the golden age, the slaughter of an ox will be equally criminal with the slaughter of a man. Is. 66:3. (Pliny, vii. 45, 55.) Hence, too, among the Hebrews, bulls possessed their appropriate dignity, so that tropes were drawn from them, by no means destitute of elegance. Nu. 22:4. De. 23:17.

6. Sowing commenced in the latter part of Oct.; at which time, as well as in the months of Nov. and Dec. following, the wheat was committed to the earth. Barley was sown in Jan. and Feb. The land was ploughed, and the quantity which was ploughed by a yoke of oxen, in one day, was called a yoke, or an acre. 1 S. 10:14. The yoke was laid upon the necks and shoulders of the laboring animals, and with ropes was made fast to the beam of the plough. The ox beneath the yoke afforded metaphors expressive of subjugation. Ho. 10:11. Is. 9:4. 10:27. Jer. 5:5. 27:28-12. 30:8. Na. 1:13. Ps. 129:3, 4. Mat. 11:29, 30. The Syrians, according to Pliny (xvii. 3), ploughed shallow. The furrows, and the ridges between them, were harrowed and levelled. Jb. 39:10. Is. 23:24, 25. Ho. 10:11. The seed was most probably committed to the soil in the harrowing, as Pliny relates. Yet it seems to have been customary in some cases, formerly, as it is at present, to scatter the seed upon the field once ploughed, and cover it by a cross furrow. When it was prohibited by law to sow, either in field or vineyard, seed of a mixed kind, and crops of this nature became sacred, i. e. were given to the priests; without doubt the seed-grain was carefully cleansed from all mixture of tares, so often spoken of, and which we find denominated in the N. T. γιανάριον, and in Hebrew טְבָחַן וְטָהַר. [Cut, Jer. 8:11.] This law by no means referred to a poorer sort of grain, as the Talmudic writers suppose, but what may be called the intoxicating tare, from which the bread and the water in which it was boiled received an exhilarating quality, and became very injurious to soundness of mind. The beverage formed by boiling tares and water, was called water of tares, also poison-water. De. 29:18, 19. Ps. 69:21. Jer. 8:14. 23:15. Ho. 10:4. Consult Le. 19:19, and De. 22:9.

7. In Palestine, the crops are as far advanced in the month of Feb., as they are in this country in the month of May. At that time, when the grain has reached about a cubit in height, it is frequently so injured by cold winds and frost, that it does not ear. The effect thus produced upon the grain is called blasting. Ge. 41:6. De. 23:22. 2 K. 19:26. Sometimes, even in Nov., the crops are so annoyed by easterly winds, as to turn yellow, and never to come to maturity. This calamity is denominated mildew (De. 28:22). Am. 4:9. Hag. 2:17. 1 K. 8:37. 21:4. 6:28; but whether the opinion of the Orientals, that these effects are occasioned by the winds, is founded in truth, cannot, as it seems, be determined. The crops, in the southern parts of Palestine, and in the plains, come to maturity about the middle of April; but in the northern, and the mountainous sections, they do not become ripe till three weeks after, or even later. The cultivated fields are guarded by watchmen, who sit upon a seat hung in a tree, or on a watch tower made of planks, and keep off birds, quadrupeds, and thieves. Jer. 4:15, 17. Is. 21:29. It was lawful for travellers (Ho. 23:25) to strip ears from another's field, and to eat; but they were not to use a sickle. The 2d day of the passover, i. e. the 16th from the first new moon of April, the first handful of ripe barley was carried to the altar, and then the harvest commenced. Comp. Jn. 4:35. The barley was first gathered; then the wheat, spelt, millet, &c. Ex. 9:31, 32. Ro. 1:22. 2:23. The time of harvest was a festival, which continued from the passover until Pentecost, seven weeks. De. 16:9-12. Jer. 5:21. The reapers were masters, children, men-servants, maidens, and incircumcised. Ru. 2:4, 5, 21. 23. Jn. 4:36. Ju. 5:1. Merry and cheerful, they were intent upon their labor, and the song of joy might be heard on every side. Is. 9:3. 61:7. Ps. 126:6. Travellers congratulated them on the rich harvest; which was attributed to the beneficence of the Deity, and considered a great honor;

The object of this regulation seems to have been, to secure the preservation of wild plants, and a degree of sterility of the soil was supposed to be a divine punishment, and a disgrace. Le. 26:3. De. 11:14. 28:12-24. Is. 4:2. Hag. 1:5-11. Ma. 3:10, 11.古. The ears were plucked off, or the stalks pulled up by the roots, which is still the custom in some Eastern countries. It was esteemed servile labor by the Pharisees, and a profanation of the Sabbath, when done on that day. Mut. 12:1-5. The Hebrews used the sickle (De. 16:9. Jo. 3:13. Jer. 50:16); so that the stubble remained in the earth. The crops, when reaped, were gathered up by the arms, and bound in bundles. Ge. 37:7. Le. 23:10-15. Jb. 2:7, 15, 16. Am. 2:13. Mi. 4:12. Jer. 9:21, 22. At length the bundles were collected into a heap, or conveyed away on a wagon. Am. 2:13. Ps. 126:6. But the corners of the field, and the gleanings, were required to be left for the poor. Le. 19:9. De. 24:19. Ru. 2:2, 23. The land in the East generally yields 10-fold; rarely, 20 or 30; but Mut. 13:8, says, the land yielded 30, 60, and 100-fold, and Ge. 26:10, 100-fold. Herodotus, Strabo, and Pliny, mention the increase of crops at the rate of 150, 200, and even 300-fold. This great increase is owing to the circumstance of the kernels being put into the soil at a distance from each other, so as to send out several stalks (Ge. 41:5, 47), some of which, according to Pliny (N. H. xviii. 21, 55,) have from 3 to 400 ears; and in Africa, at the present time, they bear at least 10 and 15.*

8. The bundles were transported into the threshing-floor either by hand, or by beasts of burden, or in wagons (Am. 2:13), and piled in a heap. Ex. 22:6. Jud. 15:5. A bundle left in the field, even though discovered, was not to be taken up, but left to the poor. De. 24:19. The threshing-floor was in the field, in some elevated part of it; it was destitute of walls and covering; and, indeed, was nothing more than a circular space, 30 or 40 paces in diameter, where the ground had been levelled and beaten down. Ge. 50:10. 2 S. 24:16, 21. Jud. 6:37, &c. The assemblage of bundles in the floor for threshing, was used figuratively to denote reservation for future destruction. Mi. 4:13. Is. 21:10. Jer. 51:33. [The grain was housed in granaries, either in the ground, or made like the cut of Egyptian granaries, which are arched chambers, with a hole at top for putting in grain, and a door at the bottom for taking it out. Ex.]

9. Among other objects of agriculture, the vine may justly be considered worthy of particular attention. In some parts of the East, for instance, on the southern shore of the Caspian Sea, these trees grow spontaneously, producing grapes of a pleasant taste, which, in the very first ages of the world, could not but have invited the attention of men to their cultivation. Hence mention is made of wine at an early period. Ge. 9:21. 14:18, 19. 32:35. 27:25. 49:11, 12. The Hebrews were no less diligent in the culture of vineyards, than of fields for grain; and the soil of Palestine yielded in great quantities the best of wine. The mountains of Engedi in particular, the valley of salt-pits, and the valleys of Eschoi and Sorek, were celebrated for their grapes. Sorek, indeed, was not only the proper name of a valley, but also of a very fruitful vine, which bore small but uncommonly sweet and pleasant grapes. In the kingdom of Morocco, at the present time, the same vine is called Serk, the name being slightly altered. (See Pliny, xvii. 35, No. 5.) In a few instances, the wine of Mount Libanus and Heliopolis is extolled in the Scriptures. Ho. 14:7. Ez. 27:18. In Palestine, even at the present day, the clusters of the vine grow to the weight of 12 pounds; they have large grapes [see their size in the cut under the word GAVE, in Concordance], and they cannot be carried far by one man without being injured. Nu. 13:21, 25. The grapes of Palestine are mostly red or black; whence originated the phrase, 'blood of grapes,' דְּכַדֵּן דִּתְּ. Ge. 41:11. De. 32:14. Is. 27:2. Some vines in Eastern countries, when supported by trees, grow to a great height and magnitude; of such are made the staves and sceptres of kings. The vine growing spontaneously, of which we have spoken, is not that which, in 2 K. 4:39, is called the 'wild vine,' for that (no Vulgate rightly tr.) is the cold-cystis, or wild gourd, which, in Jer. 2:21, is called the degenerate or strange vine. The vine of Sodom is the solanum melongena, the fruit of which, as was said above, is called the poisonous clusters.

10. Vineyards were generally planted on the declivity of hills and mountains, sometimes in places where the soil had been brought by art upon the naked rocks, being supported there merely by a wall. Is. 5:1. Jer. 31:5. Jo. 3:18. Am. 9:13. Mt. 15:6. According to Strabo and Pliny, there were also very fine vineyards in moors and wet lands, in which the vines grew to a very great height. Of the vines that grew upon such a kind of soil were fabricated the sceptre, &c., spoken of above; whilst the branches of other vines were destined to be fuel for the flames. Ez. 17:1-8. 19:10, 11, 12, 15:1-5. Vines were commonly propagated by means of suckers. Pliny (N. H. xvii. 35, No. 6,) says, vines were of 4 kinds, viz. those that ran on the ground; those that grew upright of themselves; those that adhered to a single prop; and those that covered a square frame. It is not our design to treat of all these; it may suffice merely to mention, that Pliny is by no means correct, when he says, the custom prevailed in Syria and all Asia of letting the vines run on the ground. This, indeed, accords with Ez. 17:6, 7; but that vines frequently grow to a great height, being supported by trees and props, or standing upright of themselves, the proverbial phrase, which so often occurs, of sitting under one's own vine and fig-tree, i. e. enjoying a prosperous and happy life, is sufficient proof. Jer. 5:17. 8:13. Ho. 2:12. Mi. 4:1. Zech. 3:10. [See the references under the word VINE, in the General Index.] The prohibition (De. 22:9) to sow vineyards with divers seeds, and the command, that what as thus sown should be given to the priests, are not to be understood of the vines, but of heils, which were sown in the intervals between them. Vineyards were defended by a hedge or wall (Nu. 22:24). Ps. 88:12. Pr. 24:31. 14. 5:27, 23. Jer. 49:3. No. 43. Mat. 21:33), and in them were erected towers (Is. 5:2. Mat. 21:33), which, at the present time in Eastern countries, are 30 feet square and 80 feet high. These towers were for keepers, who defended the vineyards from thieves, and from animals, especially dogs and foxes. Song 1:6. 2:15. By the law, in Ho. 2:12, the keeper was commanded not to prohibit the passing traveller from plucking the grapes, which he wished to eat on his journey.

of their income, and to look out for the future. It is true, that extraordinary fruitfulness was promised on the 6th year, but in such a way as not to exclude care and foresight. Le. 25:20-24.

SECTION VII.

DRESS AND USAGES.

We have already had occasion to notice the permanency of Eastern customs; and hence the assistance which may be derived from an acquaintance with the various manners and characters of the Orientals, as they at present exist, in the illustration of the sacred Scriptures.

§ 1. — Clothing, &c.

Materials used for Clothing — Colored Clothes — Various Parts of the Oriental Dress: the Upper Garment; Head-dress; Tunic; Girdles; Shirts; Vests; Painting of the Eyes — Treatment of the Hair and Beard — Phylacteries — Nose-rings and Ear-rings — Bracelets, &c.

1. The earliest improvement upon the employment of the mere skins of animals as an article of dress, was, in all likelihood, a sort of felt-cloth, manufactured out of these materials. Later still, the art of weaving was discovered, and a web was formed by combining the hair of animals with threads drawn from wool, cotton, or flax. See Ge. 7:6, 31:18, 19, 37:3, 38:28, 11:42, 45:22, Jb. 7:6, 31:20. The Egyptians were very celebrated for such manufactures. [The cut, from their ancient monuments, shows Egyptian women weaving and spinning.] The Israelites, while living among them, learned the art, and even excelled their teachers. 1 Ch. 4:21. While wandering in the Arabian wilderness, they prepared the materials for covering the tabernacle, and wrought some of them with embroidery. Cotton cloth was esteemed most valuable; next to that, woollen and linen. That which was manufactured from the hair of animals was esteemed of least value. Of silk there is no mention made at a very early period, unless, perchance, it be in Ez. 16:10, 13, under the word כַּרְבָּה. This, however, is clear, that Alexander found silks in Persia; and it is more than probable, that the Median dress, which we find was adopted by the Persians under Cyrus, was silk.

2. White was esteemed the most appropriate color for cotton cloth, and purple for the others. The fullers, who had discovered the art of communicating a very splendid white to cloth, by the aid of alkali and urine, lived out of the city (Is. 7:3), lest their shops should communicate a feebility to the atmosphere. The purple cotton cloth, which was essentially the same with the celebrated Tyrian purple, was highly esteemed. See Lu. 16:19, Re. 18:12. It was called רְקִבָּה, and was produced by the blood taken from a vein in the throat of a certain shell-fish. The scarlet color, first mentioned in Ge. 33:23, and occurring frequently afterwards, was very much admired. It was a different color from the shell-fish purple, and was extracted from the insects, or their eggs, found on a species of oak; and thence in Hebrew it is called צַדְרָעַ, which means a worm or insect. The cotton cloth was dipped into this color twice; hence the application of the Hebrew words נָשֵׁנָה, and תְּלִימָה צַדְרָעָה, twice-dyed. This color is sometimes called כְּרִיכַי, 2 Ch. 2:11. The hyacinth or dark blue color was extracted from the cuttle-fish, which bears in Hebrew the same name with the color itself, and was highly esteemed, especially among the Assyrians. Ez. 23:6. Black color was used for common wear, and particularly on occasions of mourning. Party-colored cloths were highly esteemed. Ge. 37:3, 2 S. 13:18. As far back as the time of Moses, we find that cloths were embroidered, sometimes with the colored threads of cotton and linen, and sometimes with threads of gold. When the way, provided he did not carry them off in a vessel; [and the thing is still allowed in vine countries.]

11. The manner of trimming the vine, and also the singular instrument of the vine-dresser, were well known, even in the time of Moses. Le. 23:34. Compare Is. 2:4, 5:6, 18:5. Mt. 4:3. Jo. 3:10. A vintage from new vineyards was forbidden for the first 3 years (Ex. 34:26, and Nu. 18:11), and the grapes also of the 4th year were consecrated to sacred purposes; the vines, therefore, without doubt, during these first years, were so pruned as that few sprouts remained. [The Egyptian monuments show that goats were allowed to browse on vines.] On the 5th year, when they were first profaned, i. e. put to common use, they had become sturdy and exuberant. Pruning at three several times, viz., in March, April, and May, is mentioned not only by Bochart, but by Pliny; and Homer speaks of it as a thing well known. The Hebrews dug their vineyards, and gathered out the stones. The young vines, unless trees were at hand, were wound around stakes; and around those vines which ran on the ground were dug narrow trenches in a circular form, to prevent the wandering shoots from mingling with each other. These practices in the cultivation of the vine are to be duly considered in those allusions which are drawn from vineyards. Is. 5:1-7, 27:2-6, Ps. 80:9-13, Mat. 21:33-46.

12. The vintage in Syria commences about the middle of Sept., and continues till the middle of Nov. But grapes, we are informed, were ripe sometimes even in June and July; which arose, perhaps, from a triple pruning; in which case there was also a third vintage. The first vintage was in Aug., the second in Sept., and the third in Oct. The grapes, when not gathered, were sometimes found on the vines until Nov. and Dec. The Hebrews were required to leave gleanings for the poor. Le. 19:10. The season of vintage was a joyful one. Jud. 9:27, Is. 16:10, Jer. 25:30, 48:33. With shouting on all sides, the grapes were plucked off, and carried to the wine-press, which was in the vineyard. Is. 5:2, Zech. 14:10, Hag. 2:16, Mat. 21:33, Re. 14:19, 20. The presses consisted of two receptacles, which were either built of stones and covered with plaster, or hewn out of a large rock. The upper receptacle, called גֶת, geth, as it is constructed at the present time in Persia, is nearly 8 feet square and 4 feet high. Into this the grapes are thrown, and trodden out by 5 men. [Cut, p. 35, vol. iii.] The juice flows out into the lower receptacle, called בָּבָר, babar, through a grated aperture, which is made in the side near the bottom of the upper one. The treading of the wine-press was laborious, and not very favorable to cleanliness; the garments of the persons thus employed were stained with red juice, and yet the employment was a joyful one. It was performed with singing, accompanied with musical instruments; and the treaders, as they jumped, accompanied by hydri (ho up). Is. 16:9, 10, Jer. 25:30, 48:32, 33. Figuratively, vintage, gleaning, Is. 17:6, 23:1-3, Jer. 49:9, La. 1:15. [See the Symbol Dictionary, in this volume.]

13. Culinary plants and fruit-trees were among the first objects of agriculture. Gardens, accordingly, were very ancient, and have always been numerous. By the Hebrews they were called גַּת, גַּתָּה, גַּתָּה; afterwards, the Persian name οπάρον, οπάρετος, paradise, was introduced. The later Hebrews were invited the more to the cultivation of gardens by the example of the Syrians, whom Pliny extols for this species of agriculture, above all other nations. Trees were multiplied by seeds and shoots; they were transplanted, dug around, manured, and pruned. Jb. 8:16, 14, 17:10. Grafting occurs figuratively in Ro. 11:17-24. The gardens in Persia, at the present day, are disposed in good order; those in the Ottoman empire are very rude, displaying hardly any indications of art, except a fountain or receptacle of waters, which is never wanting. In tho-work was embroidered on both sides, the Hebrew word for fabrics of that kind appears in the dual form; viz. רַקְנָהִים. Some of the passages in relation to embroiderers and embroidery are as follows: Ex. 35:36, 35:35, Jud. 5:30, Ps. 159, Ez. 16:10.

3. In describing the several parts of the Izraelites' dress, we cannot do better than give [in a note] Dr. Shaw's account of the Oriental costume, which occurs in his description of the manufactures of Barbary.*

Scriptures, gardens are denominated from the prevalence of certain trees, as the garden of nuts, פֶּתַחְןָה, and the garden of Carthaginian apples or pomegranates, פֶּתַחְןָה רַכְמִינָה. Song 6:11. The forest of palmis, also, in the plain of Jericho, was only a large garden, in which other trees were interspersed among the palms. (Strabo, p. 768.) The modern Orientals are no less fond of gardens than were the ancient Hebrews; not only because they yield the richest fruits, but because the shade is very refreshing, and the air is cooled by the waters, of which their gardens are never allowed to be destitute. 1 K. 21:2, 2 K. 25:4, Ho. 9:13, Song 4:13, 6:11, Ez. 2:5, Jn. 18:1, 19:41, 2:15. [Note, I K. 21:2, 3, Ez.] The Hebrews had an attachment to gardens as a place of burial; hence they frequently built sepulchres in them. 2 K. 32:7, 21:11, Mk. 15:46, Mat. 23:35, Jn. 18:12. A pleasant region is called "a garden of God," i. e., a region extremely pleasant. The trees which the gardens constantly displayed are often used figuratively of men. Those which are flourishing and fruitful denote good men; the unfruitful and barren, wicked men; and lofty cedars in particular are the emblems of kings. Jb. 29:19, Ps. 153, 92:12-14, Ho. 14:5, 7, Jer. 17:8, Da. 4:10-16, Lu. 23:31, Mnt. 3:19, 7:17-20, 12:33, Ez. 17:3, 4, 31:3, 13. Indeed, an assembly of men is compared to a forest, and a multitude of wicked men to briars. Is. 9:10, 10:19, 33:31, 11:1.

(1) The hykes, or blankets, as we should call them, are of different sizes, and of different qualities and degrees of fineness. The usual size of them is 6 yards long, and 5 or 6 feet broad, serving the Arab for a complete dress in the day, and, as they sleep in their raiment,* as the Israelites did of old (De. 21:13), it serves also for his bed and covering by night. [It is under the words, RAIMENT, and COAT, in Concord.] It is a loose, but troublesome garment, becoming frequently disarranged, and falling upon the ground; so that the person who wears it is every moment obliged to tuck it up, and fold it about his body. This shows the great use of a girdle, whenever those wearing the hyke are concerned in any active employment; and in consequence thereof, the force of the Scripture injunction,¹ of having our loins girded,² in order to set about it. See Lu. 17:8, Ac. 12:8, Ep. 6:14, Re. 1:13, and 13:6. The method of wearing these garments, with the use they are at other times put to, in serving for coverlets to the beds, should induce us to take the finer sorts of them at least, such as are worn by the ladies and persons of distinction, to be the peplus of the ancients. [See the cuts on the colored page.] Ruth's veil, which held six measures of barley (Ru. 3:15), might be of the like fashion, and have served, extraordinarily, for the same use; as were also the clothes (the upper garments) of the Israelites (Ex. 12:31), in which they folded up their kneading-troughs, and other cumbersome things; as the Moors, Arabs, and Kabyles, do, to this day. Instead of the fibula, used by the Romans, the Arabs join together, either by thread or by a wooden bodkin, the two upper corners of this garment; and after having placed these over one of their shoulders, they fold the rest of it about their bodies. The outer fold serves instead of an apron; in which they carry herbs, leaves, corn, &c., and may illustrate several allusions in Scripture; as, gathering the lap full of wild gourds (2 K. 4:39); rendering 7-fold; giving good measure into the bosom (Ps. 79:12, Lu. 6:38); shaking the lap. [Ac. 5:13, &c.] The burnoose, which answers to our cloak, is often, for warmth, worn over the hyke. [See the cut, p. 186.] It is woven in one piece straight about the neck, with a cape, or Hippocrates' sleeve, for a cover to the head, and wide below, like a cloak. Some of them are fringed round the bottom, like Parthenespa's and Trajan's garments upon the basso relievos of Constantine's arch. The burnoose, without the cape, seems to answer to the Roman pallium; and with it to the bardocellula.

(2) If we except the cape of the burnoose, which is only occasionally used during a shower of rain, or in very cold weather, some Arabs and Kabyles go bare-headed, binding their temples only with a narrow fillet, to prevent their locks from being troublesome. The turban, as they call a long narrow web of linen, silk, or muslin, is folded round the bottom of these caps, and very properly distinguishes, by the number and fashion of the folds, the several orders and degrees of soldiers, and sometimes of citizens. We find the same dress and ornament of the head, the tira, as it was called, upon a number of medals, statues, and basso relievos of the ancients.

(3) Under the hyke, some wear a close-balled frock or tunie (a jubbah, they call it), with or without sleeves, which differs little, probably, from the coat of our Savior, which³ was woven without seam from the top throughout (Jn. 19:23), and with which He is said to have been clothed, when He is said to lay aside his garments (gantia, burnoose, and hyke, Jn. 13:4); and to (take a towel and gird Himself). The fisher's coat (Jn. 21:7) which Peter girded about him, when he is said to be naked, or what he, at the command of the angel (Ac. 12:2), might have girded upon him, before he is caused to cast his garment about him, was, no doubt, the same thing. The hyke, or burnoose, or both, being at that time, as now, the proper dress or habit of the Eastern nations, when a person bid them aside, or appeared without one or the other, he might very properly be said to be undressed, or naked, according to the Eastern manner of expression. These were probably the coats and garments Dorens had chirrably in the clothe poor, successive objects. It was these mutia, or upper garments, consisting of a loose, square piece of cloth wrapped round the body, which that vast multitude who escorted Jesus in the triumphant procession into the capital, spread in the public road by way of carpet. Plutarch informs us that the same affectionate respect and reverence was paid to Cato. Harrow's Introl. vol. i, p. 97.) The convenient and uniform shape of the garments in due to fit all persons may illustrate a variety of expressions and occurrences in Scripture, which, to persons misled by own fashions, are difficult. Thus we read that the gaudy raiment of Esau was put upon Jacob; that Jonathan stripped himself of his garments; that the best robe was brought out, and put upon the prodigal son; and that raiment, and changes of raiment, were often given, and immediately put on, as they still continue to be in Eastern nations) without such previous and occasional alterations as would be required amongst us.

4. The girdles are usually of worsted, very artfully woven into a variety of figures, such as the rich girdles of the virtuous virgins may be supposed to have been. Pr. 31:21. They are made to fold several times about the body; and one end, being doubled back, and sewed along the edges, serves for a purse, agreeably to the acceptance of the zone in the Scriptures. The Turks make a further use of these girdles, by tucking in their knives and poniards; whilst the heqas, i. e., the writers and secretaries, suspend in them their ink-horns—a custom as old as the prophet Ezekiel. See Ez. 9:2.

(5) It is customary for the Turks and Moors to wear shirts of linen, or cotton, or gauze, underneath the tunie, but the Arabs wear nothing but woollen. The sleeves of these shirts are wide and open, without folds at the neck or wrist, as ours have. Those of the women are oftentimes of the richest gauze, adorned with different colored ribands, interchangeably sewed to each other.

(6) The virgins are distinguished from the matrons, by having their drawers made of needle-work, striped silk, or linen, just as Tamar's garment is described. 2:8, 13:18. But when the women are at home and in private, then their hykes are laid aside, and sometimes their tunies; and instead of drawers, they bind only a towel about their loins. A Barbary matron, in her undress, appears like St. Ursula in the Admiranda.

(7) When these ladies appear in public, they always fold themselves up closely in their hykes, that even without their vails, we could discover very little of their faces. [Comp. the cuts of the colored page, opposite.] But in the summer months, when they retire to their country-seats, they walk abroad with less caution; though, even then, upon the approach of a stranger, they always drop their vails, as Rebekah did upon the sight of Isaac. Ge. 24:65. They all affect to have their hair, the instrument of their pride (Is. 22:12), hung down to the ground, which, after they have collected into one lock, they bind and plait with ribands—a piece of finery disapproved of by the apostle. [1 Pe. 3:3.] Where nature has been less liberal in this ornament, the defect is supplied by art, and foreign hair is procured, to be interwoven with the natural. Absalon's hair, which was sold (2 S. 14:21) for two hundred shekels, might have been applied to this use. After the hair is thus plaited, they proceed to dress their heads, by tying above the lock, just described, a triangular piece of linen, adorned with various figures in needle-work. Among persons of fashion, this is covered with a sarumah, as they call it (of the like sound with the moon-like ornaments of Is. 3:18), which is made in the same triangular shape, of thin, flexible plates of gold and silver, artfully cut through, and engraved in imitation of lace. A handkerchief of erape, gauze, silk, or painted linen, bound close over the surmoh, and falling afterwards carelessly upon the favorite lock of hair, completes the head-dress of the Moorish female.

[A cut is here given of the graceful and modest female dress of the

Grecian in the apostles' times. It is from Potter's Grecian Antiquities, by Boyd, 1827, and shows a Grecian lady seated on a thronos, having under her feet a thremos; she is dressed in the chiton, and peplum, and her head-dress is the tara, or crescent-formed diadem worn by Juno and Venus. Edd.]

(8) But none of these ladies think themselves completely dressed till they have ringed their eyelids with Al ko ho lo, i. e., the powder of lead ore. Jer. 3:20, 2 K. 2:30, Ez. 23:30. Karanahappu, i. e., the horn of pouk, or lead ore, the name of Job's youngest daughter, was allusive to this custom and practice.

(9) We have seen that the women wore their hair long. They have ringed all their art, disposing it in various forms, and embellishing it with divers ornaments. In the ancient medals, statuary, and basso relievos we behold those plaited tresses which the apostles Paul and Peter condemn, and see those expensive and fantastic decorations which the ladies of those times bestowed upon their head-dress. This pride of braided and plaited tresses, this ostentation of jewels, this vain display of finery the apostles interdict as proofs of a light and little mind, and inconsistent with the modesty and decorum of Christian women. The men, on the contrary, wore their hair short; and this circumstance formed a principal distinction in dress between the sexes, and happily illustrates 1 Co. 11:15.

(10) As the Jewish and Grecian ladies never appeared in public without a veil, Paul severely censures the Corinthian women for throwing off the decency and modesty of the sex, and exposing themselves and their religion to the entire and calumny of the heathen. The whole passage beautifully and clearly exhibits the distinguishing customs which then prevailed in the different dress and appearance of the sexes. 1 Co. 11:1—
I desire you to observe, that of every man the head is Christ; of every woman, the man; and of Christ, the Deity. Now, every man who prays or speaks in public with his head covered, derogates from the dignity of Christ, his head. On the contrary, every woman who prays or speaks in public with her head uncovered, degrades the dignity of the man, who is her head; for this is a singularity as melancholy as the sex, as to have the hair entirely cut off. But if a woman will not consent to wear her veil, let her even have her hair cut short like the man; but if it be to the last degree scandalous and indecent for a woman to have her hair cut short or shaved off, let her, for the same reason, be veiled. A man, indeed, ought not to have his head veiled, as he is the glorious image of God; but the woman is only the glorious image of the man. For the man was not formed posterior to the woman, but the woman was formed out of the man. Nor was the man formed for the woman, but the woman for the man. In your assemblies, therefore, the woman ought to wear a veil, on account of the heathen snares who are purposely sent to inspect your conduct. I appeal to you—is it decent for a woman to address the Deity without a veil? Both not the universal prevalence of modern customs itself teach you, that for a man to wear long, flowing

1. There were several things connected with the nuptials of the Hebrews so essentially different from anything among Europeans, that a short notice of them is indispensable.*

1. The first thing which merits attention was the method of contracting this sacred obligation—their espousals. It sometimes happened that several years elapsed between the espousals and the marriage of the contracting parties, during which period the bride remained at home with her parents, and was under the same obligations of fidelity to her spouse as if the nuptials had been solemnized. See Mat. 1:18. In general, however, only 2 or 3 months elapsed between the time of the espousals and that of the marriage.

2. It is seen, from several passages of Scripture, that the custom of purchasing the bride prevailed among the descendants of Abraham. Thus Shechem says to Jacob, whose daughter Dinah he wished to espouse, 'Ask me never so much dowry and gifts,' tresses, dressed in the manner of women, is the highest indecency and disgrace? (See Lightfoot, Hor. Heb., I Co., 11:14, and Josephus, Antiq. xiv. c. 3.) But the long and flowing hair of the fair sex is their distinguishing grace and ornament; for this was lavished upon them by the hand of nature for a covering. But if any person appear disposed to litigate and raise disputes on this topic, let him be assured, that neither we the apostles urge, nor the churches of God practise, any such custom.' (Harwood's Introduction, vol. ii. p. 97, &c.)

* Concerning their marriages, Dr. Brown has collected the following particulars from the Jewish writers:—1. On the day of the marriage, the bride was as elegantly attired as her circumstances would permit; and was led by the women into the dressing-chamber, without her veil, and with dishevelled hair, marriage-songs being sung before her as she went. There she was placed on a beautiful seat [comp. the cut of a bride, on the colored page], where they disposed her hair in ringlets [here compared to the long, curled hair of a flock of goats on Mount Gil-ead, in Song 4:1], and ornamented it with ribbons and trinkets. They then decked her in her wedding attire, and vailed her, like Rebekah, amidst the songs and rejoicings of her attendants. Thus was she prepared as a bride adorned for her husband? Is. 61:10; Re. 21:2. A virgin was married on the 4th day of the week, that, if any doubts were entertained of her virginity, they could be settled (De. 22) by the council of three, on the Thursday, a synagogue and court day; and a widow was married on the 5th day of the week. A woman who was either divorced, or a widow, neither married nor was espoused till after 90 days, that it might be ascertained, whether she was enrue by her former husband; and if two heathens, who had been married, became proselytes to Judaism, they lived separate for the same length of time, that it might be seen which of their children were heathens, and which were Jews. (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb., Mat. 1:18; I Co. 7:14.) When the hour of marriage arrived, 4 persons walked before the bridegroom, carrying a canopy supported by 4 poles, that if the bride intended to walk home to the bridegroom's house after the ceremony, she might walk under it in company with her husband; and, in the interim, it either stood before the door, or was taken into the court around which the house was built, if the marriage ceremony was to be performed there; all the bride's party exclaiming, 'Blessed be he who cometh!' welcoming thus the bridegroom and his friends. During the ceremony, if the father gave away his daughter, he took her by the hand, as Rachel did Sarah, when she was married to Tobit, presented her to the bridegroom, and said, 'Behold, take her, after the law of Moses, and lead her away'; blessing them, taking paper, writing an instrument of covenants, and sealing it. Tobit 7:13, 11. But if the father did not act as the celebrator, the bride stood on the right hand of the bridegroom, in allusion to Ps. 133:1; and the Rabbi or Hezen of the synagogue, who acted as celebrator, took the extremity of the sheitl, which was about the bridegroom's neck, and covered with it the head of the bride, as Boaz did Ruth (3:9); after which he consecrated a cup of wine, the by-standers joining in the ceremony; and the cup being thus blessed, it was given to the two contracting parties. The bridegroom, afterwards taking the ring (a modern invention, instead of the sum of money anciently given as the dowry), and putting it on the finger of the bride, said, 'Lo, thou art married to me with this ring, according to the form of Moses and of Israel.' Two witnesses were then called, to hear the marriage contract read; and after they returned, another cup of wine was consecrated and divided among the guests.

2. Matters were next so ordered as to prepare for setting out to the house of the bridegroom; when, if there was a canopy, the bride and bridegroom walked under it (heus says the spouse, 'His banner over me was love,' Song 2:4); but if none, the bride and her companions were vailed, she, however, far deeper than they. Sometimes, also, they used a palanquin, and were carried in state from one house to the other; and it seems to have been to this that David alludes in Ps. 13:13. 'The King's daughter is all glorious within (the palanquin, viz.), her clothing is of wrought gold.' And to this Solomon refers, when he says of the chariot of the bridegroom, that 'its wood was of cedar, its pillars of silver its bottom of gold, its covering of purple, and the millet thereof paved with lave, or poetical amorous inscriptions or devices, for the daughters of Jerusalem,' Song 3:9, 10. The marriage processions were commonly in the night, by torch-light, and Lightfoot says, they carried before them ten wick-staves, having each of them at top a vessel like a dish, in which was a piece of cloth or wick, dipped in oil, to give light to the company. (Hor. Heb., Mat. 25:1.) [Comp. cut in Concord, Braccon.] So that the parable of the ten virgins was evidently a delineation of national manners; since they required, in that case, not only to have oil in their lamps, but to have vessels containing a quantity of oil, in order to replenish these lamps from time to time. Indeed, we have several allusions to the same custom, in various passages of Scripture. Thus, the spouse, when speaking of the bridegroom, says, 'My beloved is white and ruddy, the chiefest among ten thousand'; or, as the original expresses it, 'lighted with ten thousand'; thereby meaning that he dazzled beholders as much as a bridegroom attended with ten thousand lamps. Song 5:16. And the bridegroom says of the spouse, that she is 'terrible as an army with banners,' or, literally, that she is dazzling as women shone upon with the nuptial lamps, when their rich attire reflected a dazzling lustre. As they went to the bridegroom's house, every person who met them gave place to the procession; a cup of wine was carried before them; and they were accompanied with music and dancing. Ps. 45:15. Hence, in one of the parables of our Lord, the children, at their sport, when imitating a marriage procession, said, 'We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced,' Lu. 7:32. The praises of the bridegroom were also sung, in strains like those in Ru. 4:11, 12; whilst the praises of the bride were celebrated in a similar manner. Money was scattered among the crowd, to remind them, if need required, that they had been present at the wedding; and barley also was sown before the newly-married couple, as denoting their wishes for a numerous progeny. (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb., Jn. 2:1.)

3. Having reached the house of the bridegroom, they sat down to the marriage supper, each clothed with a wedding garment (Mat. 22:11); and etiquette required that the bride and bridegroom should remain silent, whilst the honors of the table were done by the Architrivimus, or governor of the feast. Ec. 31:12. Jn. 28:9. Besides the Architrivimus, there were 2 other official persons, called Paranyphus, or friends of the bridegroom and the bride (Jn. 3:39), whose office it was to be assisting to them as man and maid, especially at their entry into the nuptial chamber. After the feast was ended, mirth and dancing prevailed (Jer. 33:11), which made the prophet mention the want of them as a mark of desolation (7:34, 10:9, 25:10, 11); but whether the bride and bridegroom's parties remained together, or were in separate apartments, is not said: the last is most conformable with the manners of the East. When the bridegroom retired, he spread his skirt over his bride, to testify the claim which the law had given him, &c. (See Harmer's Outlines on Sol. Song, p. 11; Russell's Nat. Hist. of Aleppo, p. 113, note; Savary's Letters on Egypt, vol. iii. p. 38, &c.) In the case of young persons, the marriage feast lasted 7 days (Ge. 29:27; Jud. 14:12, 17; Jb. He. 19), and the bride retained the appellation for 30 days after the ceremony; but in the case of a widow or a widower, the feast lasted only 3 days. It was the custom for the father to give his daughter, when leaving his house, a female slave, as a companion, as Laban did to each of his daughters; hence Solomon accounts those extremely poor who had no maid. Tr. 12:9. (Brown's Jewish Antiquities, b. ix, sect. 2.)

4. In consequence of the universal prevalence of polygamy in the East, we find the practice, from prudential motives, tolerated, under certain restrictions, by the Mosaic code of laws. See De. 21:15-17. Ex. 21:9, 10, &c. The secondary wives of a man were termed concubines, and they differed from the first wife, who was the principal, in two things—(1) Where they had been bond-slaves, they still continued under subjection, and were at the disposal of their proprietors so long as the husband continued to pay their matrimonial duty. If deprived of this, they obtained their freedom. Ex. 21:7-11. (2) Their children did not inherit, if we may judge from the cases of Keturah and Hagar. Ge. 25:5, 6. The same distinction prevails to this day in the East; [except in China, where, as is just, all the children of the father are on the same footing. Ed.] For an elaborate disquisition on the marriage laws of the Hebrews, see Michaelis on the Laws of Moses, vol. ii. pp. 1-122.

5. Upon the same ground that polygamy was tolerated by the Mosaic law, divorce was also allowed (De. 24:1-4; Mat. 19:8), but was to be effected in such a manner as gave an opportunity for the reform of many of those evils that were its necessary attendants where these provisions were not known. It will be seen, upon reference to the law above cited, that the husband had the power of dissolving the marriage without any legal aid or recognition—'If a man have taken a woman to wife, and she please him not, because he findeth a defect in her, he shall write her a bill of divorce,' &c. It is easy to conceive what abuses and disputes might ensue from such a dissolution of marriages; and to prevent these to the utmost extent, Moses ordained—(1) That there should be some written evidence of the transaction, actually delivered to the wife, by which she might be able to certify, on all occasions, the truth of her residence from her first marriage, together with her right to enter into a second. This process, no doubt, caused many hindrances, as but few Israelites understood the art of writing; so that it became necessary to resort to some judge, or literary person, in order to have the bill of divorce written; but this delay was probably intended by the legislator. For in this way a marriage could never be dissolved in the first heat of passion, and the husband might perhaps change his mind; and the person employed to write the divorce, probably a priest or a Levite, was perhaps a man of principle, and would previously admonish the husband on the subject. A copy of the bill of divorce may be seen in Lightfoot, Hor. Heb., Mat. 5:31. [One is also given in the Comp. Comm. on De. 24:3.] (2) But even the delivery of the bill of divorce did not render the dissolution of the marriage altogether complete. Thereto, by the Mosaic statute, this further circumstance was requisite, that the wife had actually left the husband's house; which, if we may judge from the nature of the case, and the manners of the Arabs, must have occasioned a delay of several months; and that man must know nothing of the human mind, not think how often the quarrels of married persons are made up on cool reflection, who can entertain a doubt, whether, by means of these delays, a multitude of intended divorces must not have been prevented. (3) Even after the dissolution of the marriage was complete, if both parties were satisfied to renew the connection, Moses put no obstacle in the way, if only the wife had not married another husband. For the maintenance of a divorced wife the law makes no provision. This may seem to us a case of great hardship; but in a country where polygamy made female scarce, and where slavery was tolerated, it would not be so severely felt. We must not omit to notice, that the husband forfeited his right to give a divorce, however, if he had seduced a young woman, and been obliged, in obedience to the law, to marry her; as, also, if he had falsely accused his wife of unchastity before marriage. De. 22:19, 29. These provisions had a most beneficial effect. (See Michaelis on the Laws of Moses, vol. ii. pp. 127-154.) The wife was also allowed to sue, if she thought herself aggrieved, and especially if she disliked the person to whom she had been espoused at an early age by her parents. (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb., I Co. 7:10.) Josephus mentions three instances of divorce by wives; viz. Salome, Herodias, and Drusilla.

6. The support of the wife after the husband's death was uniformly provided for, without the aid of any express regulations. If she had children, that natural duty, which no statute needs to name, obliged them to maintain her. If she had not, the nearest relation of her deceased husband was obliged to marry her, or, if he declined so to do, to resign her to the next more remote; and that so peremptorily, that, as we see from Ru. 4:5, he could not inherit the land of the deceased without taking his childless widow along with it. If she were too old for marriage, still it would seem to have been an incumbent duty on the heir of the land to support her just as fully as if she was his wife. (Michaelis, Laws of

&c. See also 1 S. 13:25. The custom still exists in many parts of the East, and hence a numerous family of daughters is a source of great wealth. Where the bridegroom is not possessed of sufficient property to obtain the object of his desire by purchase, he obtains her by servitude. They build houses, work in their rice plantations, and do all the services that may be necessary; and this often lasts 3 or 4 years, before they can be married.* This will illustrate Ge. 29:27.

3. This sacred and important obligation was contracted at a very early age among the Jews, in compliance with Eastern customs; and hence the bride calls her husband, 'the guide of my youth.' Pr. 2:17. See also 5:13. At the age of 13, the males could marry, and the females when they were 12 and a day; till which time they were called little maids.† Celibacy and sterility were considered great afflictions (Jud. 11:37. 1 S. 1:11, &c.), and large families as peculiar marks of the providential blessing of God, Pr. 17:6.

II. Among the Jews, children were much coveted; both because the inheritances in the tribes were dependent on it, and because each one, especially of the house of David, was anxious to participate in the honor of being the progenitor of the Messiah.‡

§ 3.—Domestic Economy and Repasts.

1. Bread—2. Wheats—3. Milk, Butter, Buttermilk, &c.—4. Meals, and Repasts of the Jews—5. Manner of Eating—6. Posture at Table—7. Portions sent to the absent—8. Grace at Meals.

1. The Jewish people generally lived upon food of the plainest description. Boaz complimented Ruth, who was much his inferior in rank, by permitting her to partake of his meal, of bread and vinegar. 'And she sat beside the reapers; and he reached her parched corn, and she did eat, and was sufficed, and left.' Ru. 2:14. Of as plain and simple a description was the supply of food brought to David and his companions in arms, when he had been obliged to fly from Jerusalem. '200 loaves of bread, and 100 bunches of raisins, and 100 of summer-fruits, and a bottle of wine.' 2 S. 16:1. Also 17:28,29. 'And they brought beds, and basins, and earthen vessels, and wheat, and barley, and flour, and parched corn, and honey, and lentils, and parched pulse, and honey, and butter, and sheep, and cheese of kine, for David, and for the people that were with him to eat.' The simplest and most ordinary diet of the Jews, prepared by themselves, was bread,§ which was commonly baked in a wooden bowl, or kneading-trough (Ex. 8:3), in which the dough is mixed with leaven, or suffered to stand and ferment until it becomes sour.|| Sometimes their bread was baked on the hearth (Ge. 18:6), which is still a common method in the East.¶ Another kind of bread was baked in a shallow earthen vessel, like a frying-pan (I.e. 2:7), and some round the outside of a great stone pitcher, properly heated, on which was poured a thin paste of meal and water. Parkhurst thinks this is alluded to in Ex. 16:31. Sometimes they bake it in an oven in the ground, 4 or 5 feet deep, well plastered with mortar, against the sides of which they place the bread, where it is instantly done. [The colored page gives a picture of ancient cooking, &c.]

2. Wine appears to have been a beverage much in request amongst the Hebrews; and it was sometimes drunk to such an extent as to cause ebriety—a circumstance which has furnished the prophets with many tropes. See Is. 5:11-22, 28:1-11, 49:26. Jer. 3:14. 14:13. De. 32:42 **

Moses, vol. II, p. 151; and Calmet's Bibl. Encyclop., LEXIVITATE. De. 25:5,10. Mat. 22:25. It is evident that this law was far more ancient than the Jewish law (Ge. 38:8), but it was under this law that it became doubly binding; for it connected the love of preserving a brother's name with the preservation of property in the several families and tribes. In this case, no betrothing was required, nor were there any ceremonies, as at ordinary marriages. The husband's brother acquired his sister-in-law by a divine right, 3 months after the husband's death.

7. No regard is paid to equality of rank in marriages among the Orientals, and the meanest slave may be, not only the wife, but even the mother, of a king. Hence we find no law prohibiting an Israelite from marrying out of his rank, and still less one that made marriages with persons of a very inferior station nugatory. To the priests alone has Moses laid down any special rule with respect to their marriages; and even these rules relate, not to what we call rank, but to other things. The statutes that contain them are found in Le. 21:7,13,41. Amidst all the restrictions there laid down, however, there was nothing to hinder a priest, and even the high-priest, from marrying an Israelite of the lowest rank, even one that had from poverty been sold as a slave. It has been a generally-prevailing notion, that an Israelite might not marry out of his tribe; but this, as Michaelis has shown, is a mistake, directly confuted by the Mosiac writings. It was only in the single case of a daughter being the heiress of her father's land, that she was prohibited from marrying out of her tribe, in order that the inheritance might not pass to another tribe, Nu. ch. 36. This is placed beyond doubt in the case of Mary and Elisabeth, who were relations, but who had married into different tribes. It was even in the power of an Israelite to marry a woman born a heathen, provided she renounced idolatry, as is evident from De. 21:10-14; but all marriage with Canaanitish women was expressly prohibited. ‡ From Ex. 16:1-9, it is evident that infants newly born were washed in water, anointed with oil, rubbed with salt, swaddled with a long bandage, and then wrapped in comfortable clothing. (See Fragments in Calmet, No. cccxxii, &c.) The ingenuous writer referred to below explains Ex. 1:16, with reference to this custom.

2. On the 8th day from the birth of the child, the rite of circumcision was performed. Of the design of this ceremony we have spoken in treating of the ceremonial law. It was the initiatory sign and seal of the covenant of peculiarity. It only remains to notice the manner of its performance. The sponsor being chosen, and the company assembled, either in the synagogue or in the house, the female employed by the mother, brought the child to the door, and gave it to the person who was appointed to hold it during the operation. On entering with the child, he was hailed with 'Blessed be he who comes!' He then sat down, and the circumciser effected the operation, blessed the child, and gave him the name appointed if it had not already been given;—see Ru. 4:17. 1 S. 4:21, at the same time repeating Ex. 16:6:—'I said unto thee, when thou wast in thy womb, Live!' After this the company repeats Ps. 128. If the child died before the 8th day, he was circumcised in the cemetery, for the purpose of securing his recognition at the resurrection of the just. The girls were carried to the synagogue, generally, to be named. In both cases it was a time of festivity and rejoicing, though less so in the case of girls than in that of boys.

3. As soon as the children had arrived at a proper age to receive in instruction, they were taught select sentences from the law by their parents, in conformity with De. 4:9. 6:7, &c.

4. It was a universal custom among the Jews to teach their children some trade, as appears from the following passage from the Talmud:—'What is a father commanded to do to his son? To circumcise him; to redeem him; to teach him the law; to teach him a trade; and to take him a wife.' Be. 3: Jodah saith, He who teacheth not his son a trade, does as if he taught him to be a thief. And Rabban Gamaliel saith, He who hath a trade in his hand is like a vineyard that is fenced. Lightfoot, Bar. of the N. T., Ac. 18:

5. Among the Hebrews, as indeed among most other nations, the first-born enjoyed particular privileges; and wherever polygamy existed, it was necessary to fix them. See De. 21:15-17. These privileges consisted, (1) in a right to the priesthood, which before the law was in the eldest of the family; and, (2) in a double portion of the father's property. The double portion is explained two ways: some believe that half the entire inheritance was given to the elder brother, the other half being shared in equal parts among the rest. But the rabbins inform us, that the firstborn took for his share twice as much as any of his brethren. If the firstborn died before the division of the father's inheritance, and left any children, his right devolved to his heirs. First-born daughters were not, however, invested with these privileges. The rights of the first-born could be transferred to any other branch of the family, upon certain grounds; as in the case of Jacob and Esau, Reuben and Joseph, Adonijah and Solomon. Calmet's Bibl. Encyclop., art. BRATRIMONT.

6. Adoption, strictly speaking, does not appear to have been practised by the ancient Hebrews. Moses says nothing of it in his laws; and Jacob's adoption of his two grandsons, Ephraim and Manasseh (Ge. 48:1), is rather a kind of substitution, by which he intended that they should have each his lot in Israel, as if they had been his own sons.—Ephraim and Manasseh are mine; as Reuben and Simeon, they shall be mine.³ But as he gives no inheritance to their father Joseph, the effect of this adoption extended only to their increase of fortune and inheritance; i. e. instead of one part, giving them, or Joseph, whom they represented, two parts. From Est. 2:15, however, it is evident that adoption, strictly so called, was not unknown among the Jews; though we are uncertain how far the privileges of it extended. It is supposed they were much like those of the Roman law; that adopted children shared the parent's estate with his natural descendants; that they assumed the name of the person who adopted them, and became subject to his paternal power. Another kind of adoption, among the Israelites, consisted in the obligation of a surviving brother to marry the widow of his brother, who had died without issue (De. 25:5, &c.); so that the children of this connection were considered as belonging to the deceased brother, and went by his name. Among the Mahometans, the ceremony of adoption is performed by causing the adopted to pass through the shirt of the person who adopts him. Something like this appears among the Hebrews. Elijah adopted Elisha by throwing his mantle over him (1 K. 19:19); and when he was carried up in a fiery chariot, his mantle, which he let fall, was taken up by Elisha, his spiritual son and adopted successor in the office of prophet, 2 K. 2:13,15. It should be remarked, that Elisha asks not merely to be adopted (for that he had been already), but to be treated as the elder son; to have a double portion of the Spirit conferred upon him. Did the gift of the mantle imply this also? It would seem so, by the conduct of Moses, who clothed Eleazar in Aaron's sacred vestments, when that high-priest was about to be gathered to his fathers (Nu. 20:26); intimating thereby, that Eleazar succeeded in the functions of the priesthood, and was, as it were, adopted to exercise that dignity. The Lord told Sheshua, captain of the temple, that he would deprive him of his honorable station, and substitute Elikin, son of Hilkiyah: 'I will clothe him with thy robe, saith the Lord, and strengthen him with thy girdle, and I will commit thy government into his hand,' Is. 22:21. Paul, in several parts of his writings, exhorts Christians to put on the Lord Jesus, and to put on the new man, to denote their adoption as sons of God. Calmet's Bibl. Encyc., art. ANOPIOS.

 (1) Wine was prescribed as part of the daily offering to God, under the law (Ex. 29:40, Nu. 28:7), and it was also used by our Savior at the institution of the Last Supper. Mk. 14:25. That wine was drunk on sacramental occasions by the disciples of Christ, at a subsequent period, appears from 1 Co. 11:21, where the apostle sharply reproves some of the Corinthian professors of Christianity because they intincted themselves at the holy supper. In 1 Co. 11:22-26, the Hebrews are commanded to tithe all their increase or productions, and to eat of this tithe before the Lord, in the place where He shall appoint. If the place where they lived should be too distant, however, to permit them to carry up their tithe with them, then they were to sell it, to carry the money with them, and to purchase 'oxen, or sheep, or wine, or strong drink, or whatsoever their soul desireth'; and to eat and rejoice before the Lord. At the wedding-feast, in Cana of Galilee (Jn. 2:2,11), Jesus turned water into wine, for the accommodation of the guests who were present; and Paul directs Timothy to drink a little wine, on account of his frequent infirmities, 1 Ti. 5:23. On special occasions of feasting, such as weddings, thanksgivings, and the like, the Jews were accustomed to drink wine, and the Scriptures no where speak of the custom with disapprobation. When Wisdom invites her guests to a feast (Pr. 9:2-5), she furnishes her table, and 'mingles her wine,' and cries, 'Come, eat of my bread, and drink of the wine which I have mingled.' The wise man directs that 'strong drink' should be 'given to him that is ready to perish, and wine unto those that be of heavy hearts.' Pr. 31:6.

(2) Professor Stuart, to whom biblical literature is so much indebted, has recently devoted his attention to the subject of wines and strong drinks, as mentioned and approved of in the Bible, and has labored to prove that the description of wine, the use of which was prescribed and sanctioned by the Almighty and his people, was the unfermented juice of the grape, and not wine produced by the process of fermentation. The inquiry is one that merits all the attention that can be given to it; but it would be out of place to enter upon it here. [See an article on this by Rev. Mr. Schaufler, in the Bib. Repos.] We will only remark, therefore, that the attempt to show that the approved wine is always called שׁרֵך, tirash, while the fermented, intoxicating, and denounced liquor is as uniformly called אַיִן, ayin, fails in its object; because, in Pr. 31:6, among other places, it is directed that wine (אַיִן, ayin) should be given to those who are heavy of heart, or bitter of soul.

3. In Eastern countries, every preparation of milk is in general request. Coagulated sour milk, which is a most refreshing beverage, is prepared by the infusion of a certain herb, which causes fermentation. Butter is generally procured by putting the milk into a goat's skin, which is so tied up as to prevent the milk from running out, and then hung between the poles of a tent or house, where it is agitated in one uniform direction, till a separation is caused between the butter and the milk. Buttermilk is a luxury, and the chief dessert among the Moors; and when they speak of the extraordinary agreeableness of any thing, they compare it to buttermilk. It is no wonder, then, that Jael gave it to Sisera. Jud. 5:25. [The fresh, sweet, and pleasant ricotta or clotted goats' milk of the Levant, is made, the editor ascertained by boiling, and then curdling by rennet, &c.]

4. The Orientals are in the habit of rising early, commonly with the dawn, that they may have leisure to rest or sleep in the middle of the day. As soon as they are up, they take breakfast, which consists of bread, fried eggs, cheese, honey, and leban, or coagulated sour milk;* but sometimes they begin with grapes and other fruits, fresh gathered, and then have for breakfast bread, coffee, and good wines, particularly one of an expiring flavor, called muscadet. About 11 o'clock in the forenoon, in winter, they dine, and rather earlier in summer. A piece of red cloth, cut in a round form, is spread upon the divan under the table, to prevent it from being soiled, and a long piece of cloth is laid round, to cover the knees of such as sit at table; but the table itself has no covering, except the viands. The dishes, &c., are disposed in proper order around the edges, and in the centre. Among the great, the dishes are brought in one by one, and after each person has eaten a little, they are changed.† The potage of which we read in Scripture, was made by cutting boiled meat into small pieces, with rice, flour, and parsley; but sometimes of meal and herbs alone, for they eat but little animal food in the East.‡ When they intend to honor any person at table, the master sends him a larger portion, as Joseph did to Benjamin. Ge. 43:3. In general, they sup about 5 o'clock in winter, and about 6 in summer.|| As this much resembles their dinner, it is unnecessary to describe it.

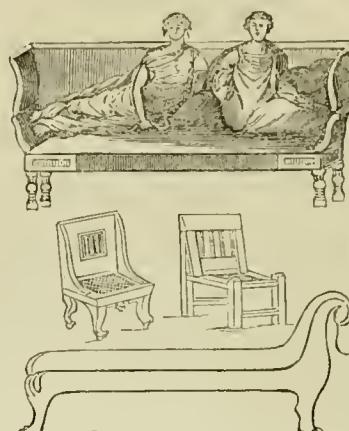

5. Their mode of eating must not be overlooked. The thick meats they take up with the thumb and the two fore-fingers;§ and their milk and porridge is eaten by dipping bread into it. When they drink water at table, it is usually out of shells, horns, or cups; but if from a river, they take it from the palm of the hands; or if from a pitcher, or the ground, they soak it through their sleeve, for fear of leeches. Wines were formerly very common among the Jews, being kept in leather bottles (Mat. 9:17), and cooled by the snow of Lebanon.

(3) Although the wine used in Eastern countries is in general very rich in quality, it is at times mixed with spices, especially myrrh; and this mixture was sometimes denominated by the Hebrews from a word which signifies mixed. But the word in question (שׁרְמָה), for the most part, means a wine diluted with water, which was given to the luyer instead of good wine, and was consequently used tropically for any kind of adulteration. Is. 50:22. 2 Co. 2:17. Wine was frequently diluted after it was bought. There is a sort of wine called שְׁמָך (shekra, Gr. sikera, or 'strong drink.') It was made of dates, and of various sorts of seeds and roots, and was sufficiently powerful at any time to occasion intoxication. It was drunk mixed with water, and from this was made an artificial beverage (שְׁמָךְ), which was taken at meals, with vegetables and bread. Ru. 2:14. It was also a common drink (Nu. 6:3), and was used by the Roman soldiers. Mat. 27:48. Further, there is a wine called by the Talmudists vinegar, whence the passage in Mat. 27:34, may be explained.

(4) The vessels used for drinking were, at first, horns; but the Hebrews used horns only for the purpose of performing the ceremony of anointing. The other drinking vessels were, a cup of brass, covered with tin, in form

6. Sitting at meals (till near the end of the time of the O. T.) appears to have been universal. Ge. 43:33. Ex. 32:6. 1 S. 20:5. Pr. 23:1. Ez. 4:13, &c. [The ancient Egyptians sat on their hauns at meals, each to a small table, also in chairs. The cut shows ancient Egyptian chairs and Grecian couches.] We have the first indications of the change of posture from sitting to lying, in Am. 6:4, and Judith 12:15. Greek. In our Savior's days, the reclining posture at meals had become universal; and every time that sitting at meat is mentioned in the N. T., it ought to have been rendered 'lying, to make it accord with the universal practice.'* [Comp. the cuts of the colored page.]

7. In former times, portions were sent to those who were absent. No. 2:10,12. Est. 9:22. It should ever be recollect, too, that the men and the women in higher life had separate tables (Est. 1:9), as is the case in the East at the present day;† [though this was not the case in ancient Egypt.] The custom of the Arabs, also, who never preserve fragments of their meals, but invite the poor to partake of them, may explain the reason why Tobit sent for the poor to partake of his dinner (2:2); and why the poor, the maimed, and the blind, were invited to the rich man's supper, in Lu. 11:21.

8. From the Mishna it appears that the Jews had forms of thanksgiving, not only at the eating of the passover, but before and after ordinary meals, and even on the introduction of many of the dishes. The duty of Christians on this subject is enforced, not only by the reason of the thing, and the practice of the Greeks, Romans, and Jews, but by the example of our Savior, in Mk. 3:6. Jn. 6:11,23; and of Paul, in Ac. 27:35. In the end of the fifth book of the Apostolical Constitutions, is a form of grace or prayer for Christians.‡

¶¶ Among the Eastern nations, it was ever customary for the common people, whenever they approached their prince, or any person of dignity, to prostrate themselves. [Comp. the cuts of the colored page.] This mode of address obtained also among the Jews. When honored with admittance to their sovereign, or introduced to illustrious personages, they fell down at their feet, and continued in this servile posture till they were raised. There occur many instances of this custom in the Scriptures. The wise men who came from the East, when they saw the child Jesus with his mother Mary, fell down and worshipped him; as did great numbers in after-times. It was also customary to kiss the hand or the feet of the person approached; to kiss the hem of his garment; or to embrace his feet. Iar. 7:38,45. Mat. 28:9.

From time immemorial it has also been the universal custom in the

1. Marks of Honor: Presentation of Raiment. II. Marks of Disgrace: 1. Cutting the Beard. 2. Clipping the Hands and Hair. 3. Releasing the Rites of Hospitality. 4. Disinterment of the Dead, &c. III. Forms of Protection: 1. Salutations — 2. Prostration — 3. Presents made to Superiors — 4. Manner of conducting Visits.

1. The common method in the East of doing honor to an inferior, seems to have been by presenting him with a change of raiment. Da. 5:16. Alexander, the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, when he appointed Jonathan Macabeus high-priest, and declared him the king's friend, sent him a purple robe and a crown of gold (1 Mace. 10:20); and he afterwards did him more signal honor, by sending him a buckle of gold, to wear on the shoulder, and to fasten his purple robe; as the use was to give to such as were of the king's blood. v. 29. See also 11:57,58. 1 Esd. 3:6. The princes of the East, even at the present day, have many changes of raiment ready, both as an article of wealth, and to suit the occasion. This accounts for the ease with which John's mandate was obeyed, when he ordered 400 vestments for the priests of Baal, that none might escape. 2 K. 10:22. For a superior to give his own garment to an inferior, was esteemed a high mark of regard. Hence Jonathan gave his to David. 1 S. 18:4. And the following extract from Sir John Malcolm's History of Persia may serve to throw some light on Elijah's request to have the mantle of Elijah (2 K. 2:13)—'When the Khalifa, or teacher of the Sunfées, dies, he bequeaths his patched garment, which is all his worldly wealth, to the disciple whom he esteems the most worthy to become his successor; and the moment the latter puts on the holy mantle, he is vested with the power of his predecessor.'

II. The chief of the marks of disgrace noticed in the Scriptures are, subjecting men to the employment of women (La. 5:13); cutting off the beard, and plucking off the hair (2 S. 2:8. 1 S. 50:6); spitting in the face (Is. 50:6); clapping the hands, hissing, and making significant gestures. Ez. 25:3. Jb. 27:23. La. 2:15. Is. 57:1. But marks of disgrace were not confined to the living. They often extended to the dead, by refusing them the rites of sepulture (Re. 11:1-12); raising them after they had been interred (Jer. 8:1); forbidding them to be publicly lamented; allowing them to become the prey of ravenous beasts (Jer. 16:5-7. 19:7. 22:18,19. 2 Mac. 5:10); casting them into the common burial-ground (Jer. 26:23), and burning their bones into lime. Am. 2:1.

III. The modes of address and politeness, which custom has established in different nations, are various. In Judea, as in the East generally, they were very ceremonious and exact in their outward decorum; and in their mutual behavior they scrupulously observed all the rules and forms in which civility was usually expressed.¶¶ of affection, on meeting each other, were extremely tedious and tiresome, containing many particular inquiries after the person's welfare, and the welfare of his family and friends; and, when they parted, concluding with many reciprocal wishes of happiness and benediction on each other. Much time was spent in the rigid observance of these ceremonious forms; when our Lord, therefore, in his commission to the Seventy, whom He despatched into the towns and villages of Judah to publish the gospel, strictly ordered them to 'salute no man by the way' (Lu. 10.4), he designed only, by this prohibition, that they should suffer nothing to retard and impede them in their progress from one place to another; and that they should not lavish those precious moments, which ought to be devoted to the sacred and arduous duties of their office, in observing the irksome and unmeaning modes of life. Not that our Lord intended his disciples should studiously violate all common civility and decency, and industriously offend against the rules of courteousness and decorum; on the contrary, He commanded them, upon their entrance into any house, to salute it (Mat. 10.12), and observe the customary form of civility in wishing it peace, or universal happiness. Lu. 10:5. Elisha, thus despatching his servant Gehazi to recover the son of the Shunamite, strictly enjoins him to make all the expedition possible, 2 K. 4:29.* Though the terms of these modes of address and politeness are expressive of the profoundest respect and homage, they soon degenerate, through constant use and frequency of repetition, into mere verbal forms and words of course, in which the heart has no share. To those empty, insignificant forms which men mechanically repeat at meeting or taking leave of each other, there is a beautiful allusion in the following expression of our Lord, in his last and consolatory discourse with his disciples, when he assured them he would soon leave them and go to the Father: 'Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth give I unto you.' Jn. 14:27.—Since I must shortly be torn from you, I now bid you adieu, sincerely wishing you every happiness: not as the world giveth give I unto you — not in the unmeaning, ceremonious manner the world repeats this salutation; for my wishes of peace and happiness to you are sincere, and my blessing and benediction will devolve upon you every substantial felicity. This throws light upon one of the most beautiful pieces of imagery which the genius and judgment of a writer

East to send presents one to another. No one wains upon a prince, or any person of distinction, without a present. This is a token of respect never dispensed with. Let the present be ever so mean and inconsiderate, yet the intention of the giver is accepted. Plutarch informs us, that a peasant happening to fall in the way of Artaxerxes the Persian monarch, in one of his excursions, having nothing to present to his sovereign, according to the Oriental custom, the countryman immediately ran to an adjacent stream, filled both his hands, and offered it to his prince. The monarch snatched, and graciously received it, highly pleased with the good disposition the act manifested. (Harwood's Introduction, vol. ii. pp. 279-287.) All modern books of travels into the East abound with examples of this universally-prevailing custom. 'It is accounted unseemly,' says Maundrell (Journey, March 11), 'to visit in Syria without an offering in hand. All great men expect it, as a kind of tribute to their character and authority; and look upon themselves as affronted, and even defrauded, when this compliment is omitted. Even in familiar visits among inferiors, you will seldom see them come without bringing a flower, or an orange, or some other token of respect, to the person visited; the Turks, in this point, keeping up the ancient Oriental custom, as hinted 1 S. 9:7,8 — "If we go," says Saul, "what shall we bring the man of God? there is not a present," &c.; which words are unquestionably to be understood in conformity to this Eastern custom, as relating to a token of respect, and not a price of divination.'

The same writer thus describes the mode of visiting in the East: 'When you would make a visit to a person of quality, you must send one before with a present, to bespeak your admission, and to know at what hour your coming may be most seasonable. Being come to the house, the servants meet you at the outermost gate, and conduct you toward their lord's or master's apartment; other servants (I suppose of better rank) meeting you in the way, at their several stations, as you draw nearer to the person you visit. Coming into his room, you find him prepared to receive you, either standing at the edge of the duan, or else lying down at one corner of it, according as he thinks it proper to maintain a greater or less distinction. Being come to the side of the duan, you slip off your shoes, and stepping up, take your place, which you must do, first, at some distance, and upon your knees, laying your hand very formally before you. Thus you must remain till the man of quality invites you to draw nearer, and to put yourself in an easier posture, leaning upon the bolster. Being thus fixed, he discourses with you as the occasion offers, the servants standing round all the while in a great number, and with the profoundest respect, silence, and order imaginable. When you have talked over your business, or compliments, or whatever other concern brought you thither, he makes a sign to have things brought in for the entertainment, which is generally a little sweetmeat, a dish of sherbet, and another of coffee; all which are immediately brought in by the servants, and tendered to all the guests in order, with the greatest care and awfulness imaginable. And they have reason to look well to it; for should any servant make but the least slip or mistake, either in delivering or receiving his dish, it might cost him 50, perhaps 100 druls on his bare feet, to atone for the crime. At last comes the finishing part of your entertainment, which is, perfuming the beards of the company — a ceremony which is performed in this manner: — They have for this purpose a small silver chafing-dish, covered with a lid full of holes, and fixed upon a handsome plate. In this they put some fresh coals, and upon them a piece of lignum aloes, and then shutting it up, the smoke immediately ascends, with a grateful odor, through the holes of the cover. It is held under every one's chin, and offered, as it were, a sacrifice to his beard. It is understood to give a civil dismissal to the visitors, intimating to them, that the master of the house has business to do, or some other avocation, that permits them to go away as soon as they please; and the sooner after this ceremony the better. By this means you may, at any time, without offence, deliver yourself from being detained from your affairs by tedious and unseasonable visits, and from being constrained to use that piece of hypocrisy, so common in the world, of pressing those to stay longer with you, whom, perhaps, in your heart, you wish a great way off, for having troubled you so long already.' 'Journey,' March 13.

APPENDIX

TO THE

GUIDE TO THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE,

(COMPLETING THE BIBLICAL HISTORY, CHRONOLOGIZED.)

THE following tables are here introduced to complete the Chronological Arrangement of Scripture by the Rev. George Townsend, promised at the commencement of the Chronicle, in the introduction to the first volume of the Comprehensive Commentary.

It was there called the Sacred Chronicle, and has been continued in each successive volume of the Commentary, in the Old Testament, down to that disastrous period of Jewish history, commonly called the Babylonish captivity. With this fact the Chronicle was ended in the close of the third volume; and, at this point of the history, it is here again taken up, and runs on to the end of the Old Testament Canon. The history contained in the Four Gospels, as arranged by Townsend, would form Period IX. This period, being already given in the Guide, pp. 90-95, is omitted in this Appendix; and the Chronicle is continued with Periods X., &c., which close the Bible History. Townsend's Notes to his Arrangement of the New Testament, being too long for our purpose, are omitted, and his tabular view of the Arrangement only is given. ED.

The great object of that revelation which God, at various times, and in divers manners, imparted to men, was to establish among them the knowledge of Himself, and gradually to direct their attention to His Son.

The Israelites, on every opportunity, showed they were not easily deluded from the false worship of the neighbouring nations; and, for a long course of years, they were exercised with a variety of dispensations. When obedient to the laws and service of God, they were triumphant and prosperous, when they forsook Him, they were in distress and bondage. Often as the people apostatized, idolatry never received support from the head of the nation till the time of Solomon, who was the first ruler that erected an idolatrous altar, and bowed down before it, gravely despising the established dominion of the true religion, and to reign in heretofore. This nation soon after divided; the ten tribes wholly revolted from the God of their fathers, and formed themselves into a distinct people. They resisted all appeals of their prophets, the miracles of Elijah and Elisha, the judgments of God, the continued fulfilment of various predictions, and every other evidence of the truth of their Scriptures, and were at last taken captive at several invasions, by the kings of Assyria; by Tiglath-Pileser, in the reign of Ahaz; by Sennacherib, in that of Hezekiah; and by Esarhaddon, in the reign of Manasseh.

The people of Judah, though frequently relapsing into idolatry, had never so entirely devoted themselves to it, as totally to renounce the worship of God; and they were still permitted to continue in the promised land more than 100 years after the great captivity of the ten tribes by Sennacherib. During the whole of this period, they were constantly appealed to by judgments, prophecies, and promises, in respect of their idolatries, and to become wholly devoted to the God of their fathers. They were seen in rebellion in the kingdom of Judah, an unintermittent contest between the worshippers of Jehovah and those of idols; but the party of the latter was predominant; that all the exertions of good kings, and the constant exhortations and denunciations of the prophets were ineffectual to produce reformation; the attachment of the Jews to the worship of the God of their Fathers, gradually and visibly declined, till an open and general apostasy threatened to ensue.—The prophets of the Lord were insulted, imprisoned, and slain. Idolatry was openly advocated; its grossest supporters were the priests, and the worship of idols was abominated. Prophecy and adultery, prophecy and miracles, the desolations of war, the loss of power, wealth, pre-eminence, and liberty, were alike in vain inflicted, to reclaim this rebellious race. 'The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint.'—An universal degeneracy prevailed, and threatened in a short time to annihilate God's visible church upon earth. To wean the Jews from this universal idolatry, and to continue the knowledge of the true God in the world; not only to this single nation, but to all the future nations of the earth; God, in His mercy, inflicted a new judgment on the people, the effects of which, we may suppose, even to this day, consider ourselves inferior for the Hebrew scriptures, and the very existence of the Christian church.—While their sad and desolate state naturally tended to excite in them serious reflections on their past conduct,—while the recollections of their iniquities and idolatry would be still fresh in their memory, and the denunciations and predictions of their prophets were too faithfully accomplished, and too severely felt,—

(Lev. 26:30—36, &c.) they learned to detect the cause of all these sufferings, to honor God and keep His law. This dispensation was also calculated to spread the knowledge of God in those eastern countries, where the Jewish people were stationed.—Through the merciful interposition of divine providence, some of the distinguished captives were raised to the highest posts of dignity and power in the courts both of Assyria and Persia; and the greatest number, though the most simple and faithful, confessed the living and true God; Dan. 2, 47. &c. 34, &c.; and made decrees in favor of his worship, Esther 8, 7. & Dan. 3:29. 6:26. The great Cyrus was so well acquainted with the true God, that one of his first acts, after he obtained the empire of Persia, was to make a decree for the return of the Jews, to rebuild the temple.—They were then a burning and shining light to all the eastern countries; and thus, in this dispensation the Almighty, in punishing his peculiar people, and in bringing about their reformation, made them the messengers of His glory and power, and the instruments of His mercy, to nations that were in 'darkness and the shadow of death.'

It has been already stated, that the roll of Jeremiah's prophecies is supposed to have been read twice.—From v. 9. and 10. of Jer. 36; it appears that the second time it was read was on the fast day in the 9th month of the 5th year of Jehoiakim. This day of humiliation, in all probability, was appointed by the king, or the Sanhedrim, in remembrance of some great calamity, as the great day of fasting and expiation was observed by the Jews of Babylon on the 10th of Tisri. The fast, therefore, is generally supposed to have been instituted in commemoration of the calamity which had befallen Jerusalem, on the same day of the preceding year, when Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem; and it is still observed by the Jews in reference to this event.—This part of ch. 36 is inserted here, on the united authorities of Calmet, Pradeaux, Lightfoot, Taylor, and Usher.

Jehoiakim rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar 3 years after that monarch had released him from his bonds, and removed him from his kingdom. The duration of his reign, though very abrupt and singular, is unavoidable, from the necessity of attending to the history. Nebuchadnezzar, on this revolt, being probably prevented from going himself to Jerusalem, by being engaged in observing the motions of the Meles and Lydiæ, between whom, in the 10th year of Jehoiakim, he was called upon to mediate a peace, sent orders to all his lieutenants, and governors of provinces, to make war upon the weakened kingdom of Judah, and to ravage the land on every side.—Thus brought into play the power of the rising up of the Babylonian power.—At the end of 3 years, during which time these different people had been constantly harassing the surrounding country, they at length united against Jerusalem. Jehoiakim, it is generally supposed, was taken prisoner in a sally which he made upon them; and, being slain with a sword, according to the prediction of Jeremiah, his dead body was ignominiously cast out into the highway, without one of the gates of Jerusalem. Prudeaux's Connect.

On comparing 2 K. 25:8 with the par. pass. 2 Chr. 39:2, we observe, that in the first of these two chapters, and in the second, he is said to begin to reign; and, in the third, that he was only 8 years old. The difference may be reconciled, either by supposing that the custom of uniting the successor to the throne with its actual postessor, which seems to have uniformly existed in the kingdom of Judah, had been here adopted, or, as Lightfoot conjectures, that the commencement of the captivity is referred to in 2 Chr. 39:2; and that this passage signifies, that Jehoiachin began to reign in the 8th year of the first captivity by Nebuchadnezzar, removed by the warning of Jeremiah, the calamities of the country, or the fate of his father; Jehoiakim, who had continued to reign over the land, till his son had succeeded him, provoked a bitter declaration of God's wrath against him, by the mouth of the prophet Jeremiah, and it was at length executed upon him. After Jehoiakim's death, Jerusalem was still besieged by the governor of the provinces, and the other officers of Nebuchadnezzar; and at the end of three months, the king himself, having settled the affairs of Asia Minor, with the royal army, and laid siege, in person, to that city. Jehoiachin finding it was not possible to defend it, surrendered it to the king of Babylon. His prisoners, and his servants, to Nebuchadnezzar. He was immediately put into chains, and carried prisoner to Babylon, where he continued till Nebuchadnezzar's death, shut up in prison, for at least 3 years. The latter part of this prophecy (Jer. 22:29) is illustrated by Dr. Haleys:—'Oh earth, earth, hear the word of the Lord. Thus saith the Lord, witness thou man unclad. A man who shall not prosper in his days: For none of his seed shall prosper upon the throne of David. And reigning not more over Judah than Zedekiah did over Judea; and none of Jehoiachin's family ever came to the throne. For allowing that Shechinah (who was appointed governor of Judea under the title of Zerubbabel, at the return from the captivity in the first year of Cyrus, Ezra 1:8) was the lineal descendant of Jeconiah, 1 Chr. 3:17, 18, 19. Mat. 1:12; yet he was merely a provincial governor, Hag. 1:1; a mere vassal of the king of Persia, to whom the sovereignty rested, and therefore he could not be considered as reigning on the throne of David, and not more over Judah than any of the kings that reigned before him in the nest of the seed of Jeconiah, but descended from the same ancestor by a collateral line. The prophet emphatically and solemnly calls upon the earth, to witness the dissolution of the temporal kingdom of the house of David, and predicts, in a beautiful metaphor before used by Isaiah, the spiritual kingdom that should succeed it, comp. Jer. 23:5, with Isa. 11:1) and thus, at the very moment when the failure of Solomon's house was pronounced, God in His mercy declared, 'He will raise from the root of Jesse an everlasting kingdom, a righteous Branch, to live and flourish forever. Ch. 23 begins with the word, 'Behold, I was against evil shepherds.' Zedekiah is generally supposed to be alluded to as one, v. 1, 2. From v. 3—9, the people are consolaed with gracious promises of future blessings, of their return from captivity, and of the glorious establishment of the Messiah's kingdom. Jeremiah, then, with a broken heart, seems to revert again to the ruin that awaited the house of David, and, in proclaiming its decay, denounces the just judgments of God on those false prophets. The threatening in the last two vs. of this ch. is still fulfilling, and the Jews will remain 'an everlasting reproach,' and 'a perpetual shame,' till they shall be finally restored to the city of their fathers.—Lightfoot; Blaney; Haleys.

Ezekiel and Mordecai were among the captives carried to Babylon after the surrender of Jehoiachin, and this second conquest of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, Ez. 1, 2. Est. 2:6.

The date and place in this ch. are assigned in v. 1. The prophecy it contains must have been delivered at the very beginning of Zedekiah's reign, as Jehoiachin's captivity is mentioned as having lately taken place.

Dr. Blaney observes (on Jer. in loc.), 'no person can read this ch. with attention, without being sensible of an embarrassment and incoherence, particular parts of it, which leaves a suspicion of a capital defect either in the text, or in the interpretation of it.' We, therefore, turn to relief, by evidencing a transposition of v. 15, which they have placed, where undoubtedly it ought to stand, immediately before v. 21.' The false prophet alluded to in v. 15, too, are mentioned by name in v. 21. Nebuchadnezzar, on finding that the Jews were prevented from settling in the places assigned to them, by the vain predictions of their false teachers, ordered Zedekiah and Ahab (who are supposed to have been the two elders that conspired against Susannah) to be seized and roasted to death. Some of the captives, unwilling to submit to such a punishment, requested Shemayah the Nehelamite, to write by the same messenger to Zephaniah, the second priest of the temple, complaining of the conduct of Jeremiah, in writing his hortatory letters, and requesting that he might be proved for the same. A severe judgment is, in consequence, pronounced upon Shemayah.

These two chapters of Jeremiah are made to follow the 29th, on the united authority of Blaney, Lightfoot, and others. As there is no particular date annexed to this prophecy, it is not measurable to suppose it was delivered in the 10th year of Zedekiah, or the preceding one. The temporal deliverance of the Jews from Babylon, is always regarded as a type of their spiritual and glorious redemption; and both events are frequently connected in the prophetic writings: the accomplishment of the former, affording the Jews the strongest possible evidence, that the latter too, how remote soever, would be effected. These chs. predict not only the restoration of the captives at Babylon, but of Israel also: the ten tribes carried away by Shalmaneser, and the whole nation of the Jews given over to express a complete and universal deliverance, when God will manifest himself as formerly, the God and Patron of all the families of Israel, and not of a few only. This great redemption remains to be accomplished in the reign of the Messiah, when there can be no doubt, that this prophecy of the final spiritual establishment of the Jews, will be faithfully fulfilled, as that which predicted their temporal return to the holy city. Rachael is represented (v. 18.) as just risen from her grave, refusing to be comforted for her children, who are all numbered and destroyed; and, in her anguish, calling upon the Shepherd of Bethlehem, (Mat. 2:17, 18.) but this cruel destruction could not have been the primary signification of the prophecy, as the sequel consoled Rachael with the promise, that her children were not lost for ever, that they should still reward her care, and 'come again from the land of the enemy.' The vision closes with an allusion to the circumstances that attended the first introduction of the Jews to the land of Canaan, when each family had a separate portion assigned them for their own cultivation and subsistence; and each in consequence became a husbandman and leader of flocks. No man, however, should suffer for the sins of another; but that 'every soul that die for his own iniquity, is only.'

By some error of the transcribers, the word Jehoia- kin, has been inserted in 27:1, which is placed here on the authority of Dr. Blaney. Lightfoot would insert the 4th of Jehoiakim, on the supposition, that Jeremiah spoke prophetically, both of Zedekiah's reign, and of the surrounding kings who sent messengers to make a league against Egypt. We, however, prefer to reconcile the common reading with what follows, that Mr. Lowth acceded to the forced way of solving the difficulty, as to say, that Jehoiachin crept into the text instead of Zedekiah, by the negligence of the scribes. We accordingly find Zedekiah in one MS. of good repute and antiquity, in the margin of another, and most probably it was in the text of a third, where the Yoch was evidently Tzedekah at first, and the remainder of the word is upon an erasure. The Syriac and the Oxford MS. of the Arabic version also read Zedekiah.

The prophet, in the force of the following words, who decorated the Jews with the hope, that the yoke of Babylon would be broken 'within two full years,' and the captives restored. Jeremiah consents (v. 5—9.) to acknowledge Hananiah to be a prophet of the Lord, should his prediction be accomplished; in confirmation of which the latter takes the yoke from Jeremiah's neck, and breaks it, (v. 10.) Jeremiah is then commanded to declare, that the yokes of wood, that Hananiah had broken, should be made, unto these nations, yokes of iron; and further to convince the people that he was not a prophet, because he 'taught rebellion against the Lord,' his death, within the year, is predicted, and takes place two months afterward.

Chs. 48 and 49 are placed in this section on account of their apparent connexion with the two preceding chs. The only date that the chs. bear, is contained in v. 34. And it seems probable, therefore, that the prediction against Elam was uttered soon after those in the former part of the ch., but not added to them till the time of Ezra. We learn from 5:1—9, and 22:1—10, that the prophet uttered his threatenings, and predictions for the purpose of putting the tribute which Nebuchadnezzar had imposed on him. The prophet embraced the opportunity of sending various predictions to his brethren of the captivity. Ezekiel had not yet received his commission to execute the prophetic office, and it belonged therefore to Jeremiah to watch over their spiritual welfare. This prophecy was delivered in the 4th of Zedekiah, (ch. 5:59.) and Jeremiah desired after it had been read at Babylon, should be sunk to rise no more, in the river Euphrates; thereby intimating the perpetual destruction of that proud city.

In the arrangement of the circumstances which took place at Jerusalem between the approach of the Chaldean army and the eventual capture of the city, I have been principally guided by the accurate and learned Pridoux. The contents of Jer. 39:1 sufficiently show, that this v. may be rightly placed directly after the first, v. 34, while the Chaldeans were besieging the city, i.e., at the beginning of the 10th year, and before the army of Pharaoh-Hophra came from Egypt; it is evident that this part of the ch. precedes, in historical order, both the account of his imprisonment, and the delivery of the prophecy, (Jer. 39:1-6,) which is supposed to have occasioned that confinement. Blaney, and others, differ from Pridoux, and think the prediction contained in ch. 21: was the cause of the prophet's punishment. Both these ch. are inserted in the burning of the city, and the period of Zedekiah's trial, Jer. 39:1, we read the prediction was delivered on the commencement of the siege, by immediate inspiration, without any application from the king; while Nebuchadnezzar was still engaged in fighting against the cities of Judah, and had perhaps just reached Jerusalem. The latter prediction, (ch. 21,) on the contrary, was spoken in reply to the message from the king, sent by Pashur and Zephaniah, after his imprisonment; and in Jeremiah recapitulates his first prediction, with some additional annunciations, upon which he was still more strictly confined in the dungeon of which he was in prison.

In the place and date of these ch. are assigned in ch. 22. From the Babylonian captivity to the coming of Christ, David was without a successor of his family sitting upon the throne of Judah of Israel. And from the destruction of Jerusalem to the present time, the Jews have had neither a king nor a regular priesthood. It is evident, therefore, the time is not yet arrived for the actual accomplishment of this prophecy; it remains to be fulfilled in those days when Israel and Judah shall be restored under Christ, their Righteousness. Admitting this, and that the prophecies of the Captivity are given up to us in their own possessions, what improbability is there, that the two families of David and Levi, may actually revert also to the ancient privileges, subject only to the supreme authority of the Messiah, and continue to enjoy them, as here expressly declared, in uninterrupted succession, to the end of the world? Blaney, Notes on Jeremiah. Pridoux's Connect.

As no history, sacred or profane, has mentioned the capture of Gaza, by Egypt, there is no means of ascertaining the exact date of the conquest. This might have place in the 8th, or 9th year of Zedekiah; on the supposition that Gaza was taken by Pharaoh's army, soon after this time.—In v. 4, the Philistines are called the remnant of the country of Caphtor. This expression, perhaps, will serve as a clue to the right understanding of the history. On consulting the map of Palestine, we find that Gaza was a city of the tribe of Judah, and that it was near the seacoast. The circumstances related concerning it in the O. T., prove the great importance attached to [this] 'city,' as it was called, before the Israelites, and the Philistines. The contents for Gaza are ascribed by Calmet to have been occasioned by its favorable situation for commerce. The revolutions of preceding ages, however, furnish more powerful reasons.

In Gen. 10:13, 14, we read, Mizraim 'begat Ludim, and Anamim, and Lehabim, and Naphthim, and Pathrusim, and Casluhim, (out of whom came Philistim,) and Capthorim.' And in Deut. 2:23, Moses, in commanding the Israelites not to interfere with the possessions of the Ammonites, leaves his immediate subject, and gives a short history of the conquest of the Zamzumim, and the Amorites, and the Horites, &c. The contents for Gaza are ascribed by Calmet to have been occasioned by its favorable situation for commerce. The revolutions of the history, however, furnish more powerful reasons.

From comparing these expressions, it evidently appears that the Philistines, who may be considered the same as the Egyptians, invaded Gaza, in which they gave name to it, by the name of 'Azrah, and, leaving the country of Caphtor, took possession of the sea-coast as far as Gaza, before the Israelites entered the Holy Land on the eastern side over the river Jordan.

Bp. Cumberland, in his Dissertation on Deut. 2:23 has plausibly shown, that Caphtor was the same as Pelusium; and, on referring to the map, it will be seen, that the Pelusiac mouth of the Nile is the nearest branch of that river to the country thus invaded. By keeping possession of Gaza, or of Ashkelon, on one side, and Pelusium on the other, the Egyptians, and the Philistines, maintained under their dominion the whole of this part of the sea-coast; a territory eminently valuable to them. Besides which, it was the conquest of their ancestors, and a sure protection to their own territory: it was a certain source of revenue, and afforded an easy alinement into the country of the Israelites, whenever the distresses of the Jews, or their own ambition prompted them to make an invasion. The Egyptians and the Philistines, therefore, who were the remains of the country of Caphtor, at this time, under the dominion of Judah, most probably retained possession from the Jews, or Assyrians, on the sea-coast from Pelusium, to Ashkelon. Egypt and Assyria were the two powerful nations who were contending for empire: the impoverished and crumbling dominion of Judah was divided between them at their pleasure. The king of Assyria invading it from the E. and N., had taken all its fortified towns, except Jerusalem, Lachish, and Azekah, which two last places were not far distant from Gaza. I have supposed, therefore, that on the conquest of Judah, most probably the king of Egypt, in union with the Philistines, was making an attempt to recover possession of the much desired territory from Pelusium and Ashkelon. In his progress through the country 'he smote Gaza,' and this conquest, with the proximity of the Egyptian army, to those divisions of Nebuchadnezzar's army which were besieging Lachish and Azekah, occasioned the raising the siege of Jerusalem, the larger part of the Chaldean army; and seeing which, the Egyptians retreated to their own country, and left Zezekiah and the Jews to their fate.

Dr. Blaney, in his notes on the 20th year, has taken by the Egyptians on their retreating before the army of Nebuchadnezzar; but it is not probable, that an army, which was hastily retreating to its own territory for safety, would stop before a strongly fortified town, besiege, and capture it. Others have supposed, that it was taken by Pharaoh-Necho, on his return from the battle of Megiddo, where Josiah was killed, and when all the country submitted to his victorious arms. But we have no authority, either for supposing that the whole country submitted to Pharaoh, or that Jeremiah should predict the destruction of the Philistines, on the capture of that town, more than on the capture of any other. On considering the various authorities, it seems most probable, that the capture of Gaza was made in the 20th year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, during the siege of Jerusalem; or, that it was taken about the time when Lachish and Azekah were besieged by the Chaldean army. Vide Bp. Cumberland's Origines Gestuim; Faber's Pag. Idol, Lightfoot, in loc.; Dr. Blaney, in loc.; Calmet's Dict. Art. Gaza.

The place and date of this part of Jer. 39: are as assigned in ch. 21.

g For the reason why ch. 21: is inserted here, see on ch. 34:—

h That this ch. ought to be inserted here, is evident from v. 28: 'Jeremiah abode in the court of the prison until the day that Jerusalem was taken: And he was there when Jerusalem was taken.' The place of 39:—18, is assigned by comparing v. 15, with the last v. of the preceding ch., and by the events alluded to in that chapter.

i Ps. 79.—In this, Asaph complains, that the Babylonians had destroyed the city and temple at Jerusalem, and beseeches God to be reconciled to his people, and to punish the blasphemous and cruelty of their idolatrous enemies. Vide v. 6, 7; Wells; Poole's Synopsis, &c.

j Ps. 83.—In this, are enumerated the various nations who were leagued against Jerusalem, at the time it was written. In v. 8, Asur or Assyria is mentioned among them. This fixes the date of the composition to the latter period of the Jewish monarchy, and as all the surrounding tribes were, at the time of Asaph, in rebellion against the king, it is evident that the prophet, his immediate predecessor, uttered this against Jerusalem, in his distress, and that this was the cause of his affliction. as the 40 days or years, (4:8,) from the covenant made by Josiah in the 13th year of his reign. According to which computation, this 40th year will be 595 B. C. Others suppose it the 30th year of Ezekiel's age.

Many of these directions were figurative, and communicated in vision, and were given by way of metaphorical instruction; for when Ezekiel is commanded 'to eat the roll of prophecy,' we understand, that he is enjoined only to receive, and thoroughly to digest its contents; and when he professes to have complied with the command, we perceive that he speaks only of a transaction in vision.

e Few subjects have occasioned so much discussion as the cherubim, so repeatedly spoken of in the O. T. and for the first time in Gen. 'God placed at the E. of the garden of Eden cherubim and a flaming sword.' It is generally supposed, that the words tr. 'a flaming sword,' signify, more properly, a bright flame of waving fire. That this appearance was permanent at the gate of Paradise, and that it was the same glory of the Lord, or the Shechinah which afterward appeared to Moses. Under the Levitical economy, the cherubic symbols and the burning flame, were placed around the Ark in the temple, and in the temple. The cherubim appear to have been considered as emblems of the visible church, and the burning flame as the symbol of the divine presence. The time had now arrived when the visible church was to be removed from the holy land, and established among the faithful worshippers of Jehovah, who were taken captives to Babylon. This removal is denoted in the vision by the appearance of the cherubim, of the glory of the Lord, and of the angel Jehovah, or the form of the man, the Head and Protector of the visible church, to the prophet Ezekiel. The cherubim here correspond to the prophet Jehovah, who, as he spake out of the midst of the burning flame, the same miraculous and divine Being who was well known to have formally appeared to the patriarchs, to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Moses. He spake upon his face, as Paul and John afterwards did, when the same Almighty Being manifested Himself, on the road to Damascus, and in the island of Patmos. Ezekiel fell down before Him, as all mankind will fall when the same angel Jehovah, of the patriarchal and Levitical church, the Messiah of the Christian church, shall descend to earth. Men shall then appear, not as a friendless, isolated, and persecuted man, but in the glory of His Godhead, which He had with the Father before the world was. (John 17:5.)

d Warburton has some curious observations on the emblematic mode of teaching by the use of such types as we read of in this ch. Language, he observes, as appears from the nature of the thing, from the records of history, and from the relics of the most ancient languages yet remaining, was at first extremely rude, narrow and equivocal; so that men would be perpetually at loss in many cases, to understand them, and to represent them to themselves intelligibly to one another. The art of enlarging language by a scientific analogy being a late invention, this would necessarily set them upon supplying the deficiency of speech by apt and significant signs. Accordingly, in the first ages of the world, mutual converse was upheld by a mixed discourse of words and actions. Hence came the Eastern phrase of the 'voice of the sign' (Ex. 4:8); and use and custom, as in most other affairs of life, improved what had arisen out of necessity, into ornaments in people, whose natural talents were not equal to them; and made of contrivance, which so well gratified their vanity, by motion, &c. and so much gratified it, by a perfect representation of material images. Of this we have innumerable instances in Scripture. By these actions the prophets instructed the people in the will of God, and conversed with them in signs; but where God teaches the prophets, and, in compliance with the custom of that time, condescends to the same mode of instruction, then the significative action is generally changed into words, and the express action into signs; where, where the prophet is led to regard the rod of the almond tree, the sheathing pot, &c. and so much gratified it, by a perfect representation of material images. Of this we have innumerable instances in Scripture. By these actions the prophets instructed the people in the will of God, and conversed with them in signs; but where God teaches the prophets, and, in compliance with the custom of that time, condescends to the same mode of instruction, then the significative action is generally changed into words, and the express action into signs. APPENDIX TO THE GUIDE.

13. of that ch.) that Zedekiah should be brought to Babylon; 'till he shall not see it, though hid there.' (v. 1) which was delivered about 6 years before the event, and was probably told to that king by some messenger from Babylon, was considered by that monarch as inconsistent with subsequent prophecies of Jeremiah, (Jer. 32:4, and 31:3.) 'Thine eye shall behold the king of Babylon, and he shall speak with their mouth to mouth, and thou shalt go to Babylon.' Zedekiah, on discovering this apparent inconsistency, refused to believe either. Both prophecies, however, were fulfilled. Zedekiah did see the king of Babylon, indeed, at Babylon, but at Riblah. His eyes were there put out, and he was carried to Babylon, yet he did not behold the city. 2 K. 25:4-9, Jer. 52:21-22. Josephus, Art. Jud.

The place and date of this part of Ezekiel's prophecies are assigned in 201.

The date of this prophecy (v. 1) shows that it was written on the banks of the Euphrates, on the very same day in which Nebuchadnezzar laid siege to Jerusalem.

This ch. is inserted after the 21st, on authority of the date v. 1, when prophecies containing similar events preceded the capture of Jerusalem, whereas those contained in the 25th and following chs. were delivered after that event. The probable reason of its recurring its place in our Bible, is that the prophecies against Egypt might be all read together. The circumstances prophesied in distant countries, by Ezekiel and Jeremiah, respecting Egypt were of the most improbable kind.

¶ These portions of Scripture are inserted here on the authorities of the dates given by the prophet himself, Ez. 30:29, and 31:1. There is a peculiar propriety, therefore, in the delivery of these predictions at this period, as the attention of both the Jews and Chaldeans, among whom Ezekiel prophesied, must have been fully directed to Egypt.

A The Sacred Narrative, after the capture of Daniel, in the 4th year of Jehoiakim, proceeds to relate, in parts of 21 Kings and Ch. of Ezekiel, and of Jeremiah, the acts of events which were taking place, at the same time, in several parts of the world.—Judea, Babylon, and Egypt.

The attempt to place all these contemporary events in the most intelligible order, has been attempted with much difficulty.—In ch. 1 of this 7th period, the history of events at Jerusalem is brought down to the burning of the temple. In ch. 2, the circumstances which occurred in Chaldea, recorded or alluded to by Ezekiel, are likewise brought down to the burning of the temple. The present ch. contains the history of events which, after the destruction of Jerusalem, remained for some short time with Gedaliah in Judea, and then fled to Egypt, taking with them their great prophet Jeremiah.

b The several passages from Jeremiah which are inserted in ch. 3 are placed here on the authority of internal evidence. This passage (Jer. 46:11 to end) is added to the preceding from comparing Jer. 46:11 with Jer. 43:7.

CHAP. IV. Events at Babylon, between the destruction of Jerusalem, and the return from the captivity. § I. a From comparing Ezck. 32:1, with Ez. 33:21, it is evident that this part of ch. 33 comes before ch. 32. Chs. 25, 26, 27, and 28 are added in this section, on the authority of Alp. Newton, who observes, that 'the date in the text (chap. 35:2) must be posterior to whatever is the true date, ch. 33:21, because this prophecy was delivered after the taking of Jerusalem was known to Ezekiel and his people.' According to Abp. Usher, and Josephus, the predictions against the Ammonites, Moabites, Edomites, and Philistines, in ch. 25 were fulfilled before Nebuchadnezzar, and the year 586 B.C. by the capture of Jerusalem, whereas those contained in the 26 and following chs., were delivered after that event. The probable reason of its recurring its place in our Bible, is that the prophecies against Egypt might be all read together. The circumstances prophesied in distant countries, by Ezekiel and Jeremiah, respecting Egypt were of the most improbable kind.

The prophet, according to the present arrangement, concluded.

Ezekiel was at this time in captivity at Babylon, and is supposed by Selden, to have conversed in that country with Pythagoras. The dispersion of the Jews, in their several captivities, conferred many benefits on mankind; among which may be mentioned, its effects on the progress of philosophy and literature in Greece. As this is a subject which has not frequently been discussed, I have considered it in a note, as another proof of the wonderful interposition of an all wise Providence over the affairs of men. [This note is omitted here for want of room.]

i Daniel writing this part of his history in Chaldeas, for the use of the Chaldeans, most probably followed the computation prevalent among them; and refers not to the 2d year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, as dated from his accession to the throne, but from the 2d year of his universal monarchy; after Egypt, and all the surrounding nations, who, with the Jews, had leagued against him, had been subdued.

The Jewish church, at the time of this wonderful interposition of Providence, enabling Daniel to discover and interpret the dream of Nebuchadnezzar, when all the magicians, the astrologers, and soothsayers of the multitude of Babylon, were not able to do so, was in the depth of its distress. Its enemies were on every side victorious. The gods of gold, of silver, of wood, and of stone, seemed to be more powerful than Jehovah.

The prophet Ezekiel had ceased to address the people. Jeremiah, in all probability, no longer existed. Jerusalem was destroyed; the temple burnt; the visible church almost annihilated; when the attention of the world was fixed on the church of God comforted by the intercession of Daniel. Through the Providence of God, this favored captive became the adviser and the friend of kings, the head of governments and provinces, and the chief means of fulfilling the prophecies of his Scriptures, by accomplishing the deliverance of the Jews.

k The believing Jews, on beholding the divine form which appeared in the midst of the fire, would recognize the same almighty Being which had guided their fathers through the wilderness, and had so frequently manifested himself to all the guides and leaders of the visible church.

And the wonderful preservation of the chosen Hebrews, must have signified to all the Jews, that the same power would be extended to support them in all their trials, and to deliver them, at the appointed time, from the furnace of affliction, and finally restore them to the land and the worship of their fathers. By this most extraordinary miracle, the knowledge of the true God, his power, and superiority, were made known by the decree of Nebuchadnezzar through his extensive and universal empire; and every people, nation, and language, was called to adore and worship the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego.

l The signal judgment inflicted upon Nebuchadnezzar, related in this ch., with its attendant circumstances, must have impressed all the nations of the E. with the conviction that Jehovah was the one true God; that kings and princes were only the instruments of his will in the government of the world. The evidence of the prediction, the fall, and the restoration of Nebuchadnezzar, is, perhaps, the most undeniable of anything that rests upon mere human testimony. The king himself, upon his recovery, published a proclamation in every part of his vast empire, giving an account of all his misfortunes, his sins, and his penitence before the King of heaven. The evidence of the whole fact stands upon this public record of the Babylonian empire, preserved, word for word, in this ch., which must therefore be considered, not as Daniel's, but as Nebuchadnezzar's writing.—Horsley.

m Evil-merodach, the son of Nebuchadnezzar, succeeded his father, in the 37th year of the captivity of Jerusalem. No narration of his reign is recorded in Scripture, or in the Talmud.

Jerome notices a Jewish tradition, that Evil-merodach, during his father's distraction, behaved so ill, in provoking a war with the Medes, that, on his recovery, Nebuchadnezzar threw him into prison, where he contracted an intimacy with Jehoiachin.

n The vision of the four beasts in this ch. represents the same great monarchies of the world, prefigured in Nebuchadnezzar's dream. Nebuchadnezzar saw his kingdom divided into four parts, none holding it on the eve of destruction, with its wings plucked, and lifted up from earth, (v. 28, and 8.) Out of the ten horns or kingdoms, there were successively 'plucked up,' and annexed to the papacy by the 'little horn,' through which means the pope became a temporal prince. All the kingdoms above described will be succeeded by the 'everlasting dominion' of the Messiah. (V. 9-15, and 27.) Bp. Newton, & others.

o The Psalms contained in this section are supposed to be Calmet, Horne, Gray, and others, to have been written during the Bab. captivity. They are inserted thus late in the period, because their exact date is quite uncertain, and it is most probable, that the persecution and distress of the Jews were greatest during the reign of Belshazzar, who did not know Daniel. The character of this king, as given by Xenophon, and by Isaiah, (14: 29,) corroborates this supposition.

given by Ezekiel. In all probability, it was placed when he said, that all the prophecies against Egypt might come together, in the year preceding the destruction of Jerusalem. Nebuchadnezzar's last siege to Tyre.

q The expression, 'In that day I will cause the horn of the house of Israel to bud forth,' appears to have a primary allusion to the promotion and distinction of Daniel at Babylon, to which may be attributed the high estimation in which the Jews were held in the place of their captivity, and that series of events which terminated their restoration by Cyrus.

r With this prediction against Egypt, the prophecies of Ezekiel, according to the present arrangement, concluded.

^g Dan. 5: is inserted here as in its proper historical place; but who the Belshazzar of Daniel was, and the time of his death, has given rise to much conjecture, and both are uncertain. This uncertainty arises from the difficulty of ascertaining the succession of the kings of Babylon, between the death of Nebu-hadnezzar and the accession of Cyrus to the Babylonian empire, after the death of Darius. (See Guide, p. 75.)

The second empire in the former vision (the Medo-Persian) is the first in this; and what was there compared to a bear, is here prefiqued by a ram. The kings of Persia wore a ram's head of gold, and preciousstones, instead of a diadem, and a ram was the armorial ensign of that empire.

The first king of the Macedonians, 200 years before Daniel, called his capital city Aigene, Αἴγανε, a goat bearing their ensign. "The rough goat," v. 21, represents the Greeks or Macedonians, under Alexander; v. 6 and 7, describe the Greeks north owing the Persian empire. The final and principal engagement in which Alexander overcame the Persians, was at the river Gran-sens, in Phrygia, 'standing before the river,' v. 6. The 'notable' horns that sprung up in the womb of the lioness here are the horns of the Capreolus, the leopard.

great hosts are the same as the 4 heads of the dragon in the former vision, and demand a 3rd column of fire from heaven, which is said to have been thrown down 'from the great deep of heaven,' by Cassandra, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolemy, about 15 years after the death of Alexander, and the number of his descendants. The 'little horn,' which is described as rising among the 4 horns of the Grecian empire, v. 2, is supposed by the generality of commentators to signify the Romano-empirical power. It was this power that magnified itself against 'the prince of the host,' stood up against the prince of princes, v. 25, crucified the Messiah, the Lord of life, took away the 'true sacrifice,' destroyed the temple of the Jews, (v. 11,) and made a desolation of the holy city. But, as 'the stone,' in Nebuchadnezzar's dream, was 'cut out of the mountain without hands,' i.e. not by human, but supernatural means, so likewise shall this king go 'to break without hands.' Comp. 2:31, and 7:11 and 14. All which passages seem to imply, that the dominion of the Romans shall be finally destroyed with some extraordinary manifestation of the Divine power. Bp. Norton.

In v. 17, we clearly find a plurality in the Godhead signified; Daniel asks for blessings on the sanctuary and the people 'for the Lord's sake.' The commencement of the whole period of 70 weeks, or 190 years, is given recorded from the 7th year of Artaxerxes, (Ezra 7:11) when the wall of their city was built, and its inhabitants returned to the sanctuary, laid upon the 453rd year of the reign of Artaxerxes, or 626 years after the birth of Christ, which is the number that 453 years, or 69 weeks, exceed 357 years, and we are brought to the beginning of John the Baptist's preaching of the advent of the Messiah. Adding 7 years, or one week, to the former, we come to the 353d year of our Lord, which was the year of Jesus Christ's death. In other words, compute 190 years, the whole 70 weeks from the 7th of Artaxerxes; by subtracting 457 years, the space of time between that year and the beginning of the Christian era, from 450 there remains 33, the year of our Lord's death. Pritzau.

In this most wonderful prediction, the sufferings and atonement of Christ are perhaps more explicitly and clearly revealed, than in any other prophecy of the O. T. Ep. Watson remarks, "in read these prophecies of Daniel with attention, intelligence, and unbiased mind, is sufficient to convert an unchristian from doubt to Christianity." They were delivered two thousand years before the birth of Christ; they extend through many ages, and have ever been considered as the foundation of all modern history; and, passing from earth to heaven, they invite man into eternity.

As soon, therefore, as Cyrus had taken possession of Babylon, he sent for the captive Daniel, and consulted with him, as in the best measures for the settlement of the Government, and on this occasion he gave so much satisfaction, that Cyrus soon after made him his minister of state over all the provinces of the Babylon, emp. When Cyrus returned from his Babylonian expedition, to Babylon, he found that Dan was held in the highest favor and esteem by his uncle Darius, the Median; and that his fame was very much increased by his miraculous preservation in the lion's den. There is every reason, therefore, to suppose that the prophet availed himself of this moment of popularity, and used all his influence and authority to bring about the restoration of his people. Josephus affirms, that Cyrus was very well acquainted with the prophecies of Daniel, and that he gave no violent from the decree itself. He had charged me to build him an house at Jerusalem' (e 2.) No wise prince would ever desire that any part of his dominions should remain unpeopled; who then, could be more proper again to plant the dislocated country of Judea than its former inhabitants?

The very opposition of this people, served to make the Jews more vigilant in preserving their traditions. They became a heretic sect, and they fear an expected, judgment of the purity of the sacred text, particularly the Pentateuch which, while many Jews expected only a temporary Messias, with some of the Simeonians, from the Pentateuch alone could not have attained a plainer notion of his own character. Paul writes his 1st epist. to the Corinthians, to assert his apostolic authority, to reprove the irregularities of the church, and to answer the questions of the converts on various points of doctrine and discipline.	Ac. 19:22.	250	IV.	Paul warns the master of the ship of the danger they were in, — they attempt to reach Phenice in Crete.	Ac. 27:9-13.	On the voyage to Rome.	325
VII.	Paul continues at Ephesus, — he is occasioned at that place by Demetrius.	Ac. 19, pt. of v. 22, to end.	268	V.	The ship is wrecked, but the lives of all on board are saved, as Paul had foretold.	Ac. 27:14, to the end.	326
VIII.	Paul leaves Ephesus and goes to Macedonia.	Ac. 20:1.	Macedonia. 269	VI.	They land on the island of Melita.	Ac. 28:1-10.	Melita.	327
IX.	Paul writes his 1st epist. to Timothy, to reprove the heretics, and the suppression of their false doctrines and corruptions which the Jewish zealots were endeavoring to establish in the church of Ephesus, over which he was appointed to preside.	First Epistle to Timothy.	269	VII.	After 3 mons they sail to Rome.	Ac. 28:11, to pt. of v. 14.	Voyage to Rome.	327
X.	Paul proceeds from Macedonia to Achaea, and continues there three months.	Ac. 20:2, and pt. of v. 3.	Macedonia, Achaea. 275	VIII.	Paul arrives at Rome, and is kindly received by the brethren.	Ac. 28, pt. of v. 14, to 16.	Rome.	327
XI.	Paul, having been informed of the reception of his 1st epistle, had written from Corinth, where his 2d epistle from Philippi, to justify his apostolic conduct, and vindicate his authority, both of which had been impugned by a false teacher.	Second Epistle to the Corinthians.	Philippi.	58 4771 275	IX.	Paul summons the Jews at Rome to explain to them the causes of his imprisonment.	Ac. 28:17-29.	328
XII.	Paul returns from Achaea to Corinth, to Miletus, sending his companions forward to Troas.	Ac. 20:3, r. 4, 5.	Macedonia. 289	X.	Paul writes his epistle to the Ephesians, — abounding in the Christian faith, by describing the most amazing language, the mercy of God displayed in the calling of the Gentiles through faith in Christ, without being subjected to the law of Moses, and to enforce upon them that holiness and consistency of conduct, which is required of all who have received knowledge of salvation.	The Epistle to the Ephesians.	61 4773 328
XIII.	Paul, in his way from Achaea to Macedonia, writes his epistles to the Gentiles, and the Ephesian church, — to give to them that neither their boasted philosophy, nor their moral virtue, nor light of human reason, — nor to Jews, that neither their knowledge of, nor obedience to, law of Moses, could justify them before God, but that faith in Christ alone was, and ever had been, the only way of salvation to all mankind.	Epistle to the Corinth. Romane.	289	XI.	Paul writes his epistle to the Philippians, — abounding in the concern they had expressed on the subject of his imprisonment, — to exhort them to continue in union and mutual love, and to caution them against seductions of false teachers, who had begun to introduce themselves among them.	The Epistle to the Philippians.	62 4776 339
XIV.	From Macedonia Paul proceeds to Troas, where he raises Eutychus to life.	Ac. 20:6-12.	Troas. 314	XII.	Paul writes his epistle to the Colossians, in reply to the message of Epaphras, to prove that the hope of man's salvation is in the atonement of Christ alone; and, by the establishment of opposite truths, to eradicate the errors of the Judizers, who not only preached the Mosaic law, but also the opinions of the heathen, oriental, or Essene philosophers, concerning the worship of angels, on account of their supposed agency in human affairs, and the necessity of abstaining from ungodly practices.	The Epistle to the Colossians. 345
XV.	From Troas to Assos and Mitylene.	Ac. 20:13, 14.	Assos and Mitylene. 315	XIII.	Paul writes his epistles to his friend Philemon, to intercede with him in favor of his slave Onesimus, who had fled from the service of his master to Rome; in which city he had been converted to Christianity by means of the apostle's ministry.	The Epistle to Philemon. 351
XVI.	From Mitylene to Chios.	Ac. 20, pt. of 15.	Chios.	59 4771 315	XIV.	James writes his epistle to the Jewish Christians, in general, to caution them against the prevalent evils of the day, — to rectify the errors into which many had fallen, by misinterpreting St. Paul's doctrine of justification, and to enforce various duties.	The General Epistles of St. James.	Jerusalem. 352
XVII.	From Chios to Samos, and Troygium.	Ac. 20, pt. of 15.	Samos and Troygium. 315	XV.	Paul remains at Rome for 2 years, during which time the Jews do not dare to prosecute him before the emperor.	Ac. 28:30, 31.	Rome.	359
XVIII.	From Troygium to Miletus, where Paul meets, and takes his farewell of the elders of the church at Ephesus.	Ac. 20, pt. of 15, to end.	Miletus. 315	PERIOD XV. From the Commencement of the Fifth and last Journey of St. Paul, in the Completion of the Canon of the whole Scripture, — with a brief Survey of the History of the Christian Church to the present Time.
XIX.	From Miletus to Cos and Rhodes, and Patara; whence Paul, together with Luke, writer of book of the Acts of Apostles, embarks a Phenician vessel to Syria, land in Tyre.	Ac. 21:1-3.	Cos, Rhodes, Patara, Tyre. 316	I.	Paul, while waiting in Italy for Timothy, writes the Epistles to the Old Testament, — the Epistles to the Hebrews, — to prove to the Jews, from their own Scriptures, the humanity, divinity, atonement, and intercession of Christ, — the superiority of the Gospel to the Law, — and the real object and design of the New Testament.	The Epistles to the Hebrews.	62 4775 360 or pr.
XX.	Paul and Luke continue at Tyre 7 days.	Ac. 21:4-6.	Tyre. 316	II.	After his liberation Paul visits Italy, Spain, Britain, and the west.	Italy, Spain, Britain, and the west.	63 4776 361
XXI.	Paul leaves Tyre to Ptolemais.	Ac. 21:7.	Ptolemais. 316	III.	He then proceeds to Jerusalem.	Jerusalem.	64 4777 361
XXII.	From Ptolemais to Cesarea, to the house of Philip the evangelist — Ahab, — prophecies the near imprisonment of Paul.	Ac. 21:8-14.	Cesarea. 316	IV.	From Jerusalem to Antioch in Syria.	Antioch.	65 4778 361
XXIII.	Paul and Luke arrive at Jerusalem, and present themselves to James and the church.	Ac. 21:15-25.	Jerusalem. 317	V.	From Antioch to Colosse.	Colosse. 361
XXIV.	Paul is apprehended by the chief captain of the temple, in consequence of a mob, occasioned by some of the Asiatic Jews, who maltreated the temple.	Ac. 21:27-35.	317	VI.	From Colosse to Philippi.	Philippi. 361
XXV.	Paul makes his defense before the populace.	Ac. 21:37, to end. 22:1-21.	318
XXVI.	On declaring his mission to preach to the Gentiles, the Jews clamor for his death.	Ac. 22:22.	319
XXVII.	Paul claims the privilege of a Roman citizen.	Ac. 22:23-29.	319
XXVIII.	Paul is brought before the Sanhedrin, who are summoned by the captain of the temple.	Ac. 22:30, and 23:1-10.	319

VIII.	From Philippi to Corinth.		Corinth.	385	XIX.	John writes his 1st epist., to confute the errors of the false teachers, and their different sects,—against Docetes, who denied the humanity of Christ, asserting that his body and sufferings were not real, but imaginary; against the Cenanthians & Ebionites, who contended that He was not God, but that his divinity was only advertitious, and therefore separated from Him at his passion,—and against the Nicolaitans, or Gnostics, who taught that the knowledge of God and Christ was sufficient for salvation; that, being justified by faith, and freed from restraints of the law, they might indulge in sin with impunity.—he cautions Christians from being seduced by these doctrines and practices, threatening them in the strongest terms— he contrasts them with truths and Gospel doctrines, in which they had been instructed, and in which they are exhorted to continue. * The following is an extract from this Section, composing pages 448-455 of Vol. II. of Townsend, American edition.

"The first century of the Christian era is the most eventful in the annals of the human race. At its commencement, when the Deity became incarnate, the world was divided into two classes, the Pagans and the Jews. The former of these had entirely forgotten the object for which mankind had been originally created; and, among the latter, the remembrance of that object was confined to a very few, who still retained the spiritual meaning of their Scriptures, and anticipated a Deliverer from the dominion of ignorance and wickedness, rather than a Savior from the Roman yoke. The degeneracy of mankind was daily increasing; and the Church of God, i. e. that portion of the visible church which had preserved itself pure from the universal corruption, was so rapidly diminishing, that there was danger, lest the world should return to the same condition to which it had been reduced, when 8 persons only were saved from the deluge, or when ten worshippers of Jehovah could not be found to preserve the cities of the plain. Among the heathen all classes had become foolish. The magistrates and the statesmen of antiquity considered religion as a useful engine of state; the philosophers, bewildered among their metaphysical dreams, and involved in endless disquisitions and divisions, considered all religions as equally false, and equally true; justly despising the inconsistencies of the popular mythology, they knew not where to rest. The scanty remains of the ancient truth, which tradition still preserved among them, was obscured by innumerable absurdities. Neither the love of good, nor the fear of evil, animated the popular devotion; while the very superstitions, which the wandering reason of their pretended philosophy despised, were rendered more binding upon the ignorant populace, by the outward compliance of the philosophers with all its rites and ceremonies.

"The teachers of the Jews had secularized the religion of their fathers. The magniloquent promises and splendid predictions of the prophets, which describe the spiritual glories of the expected Messiah, were interpreted of a temporal dominion. The maintainers of the spiritual interpretation were treated with contempt. The two classes of teachers, who divided the affections of the people, united in ridiculing the holiness of the heart and life required by the Law of Jehovah. The Sadducees denied the doctrine of a future state, and the consequent saeculars of an invisible world; the Pharisees resolved the religion of Moses, and of the prophets, into the belief of traditions, and attachment to external observances and ostentatious austerity. The one destroyed internal religion by denying its necessity altogether; the latter ruined its influence with equal efficacy, by finding a substitute for holiness. The first were condemned entirely, as the open infidels of their day; the last were condemned, with unsparing severity, but not so universally, or totally, in that more restricted censure, "these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone."

"Though the city and temple of Jerusalem were destroyed, the Sanhedrim remained, and were acknowledged by the surviving Hebrews as the legitimate directors and teachers of the people. They were employed to the last in making decrees respecting the ritual of the temple-service, and settling questions of ceremonies; though the glory had departed, and religion had become an empty form. The Sanhedrim had removed to Jabne, before the destruction of Jerusalem: thence, afterwards to Bethshaarain, Tisipporis, and Tiberias; where Rabbi Jochanan was president of it 90 years. And though the country abounded with schools, and the surviving Jews made every effort in their power to perpetuate their now corrupt religion, no school or college obtained so much celebrity as that at Tiberias. Jerome was instructed by a learned man of Tiberias; and it was most probably about this time, that that edition of the Hebrew Bible was prepared, which has ever been of high authority among both Jews and Christians; the edition of the Massorets, or, as they are now more generally called, the Masorites. ... The precise time of it is not known. The providence of God preserved the appearance of a government among the Jews till this great work was completed, and the purity of the inspired Volume secured from all possibility of corruption. They were then permitted to undergo their predicted punishments.

To return from this digression:—"The consequence of the united destruction of both Jews and heathens was, that the knowledge of God, at the period of Christ's advent, was rapidly fading away from the public faith and the private motives of mankind.

"The close of the century presented a strong contrast with this melancholy condition. Mankind were now divided into three classes. The heathens, who, in addition to their former errors, had now acquired a spirit of persecution; the Jews, who, though they had been conquered by the Romans, and subjected to severe persecution, still continued in various towns of Palestine, and throughout the empire, and whose inveterate hatred against the Christians increased daily; the third division, and it included no small portion of mankind, were the Christians, who were elected, through the providence of God, from both the former classes."

Townsend goes on to consider the history of the Christian church; assisting the memory by contemplating it 'briefly and imperfectly,' in the following divisions, viz.

I. The first stage is the State of the Christian church from the death of St. John to the Establishment of the persecuted Faith by Constantine.

II. The Thence to the Rise of the Papal Power.

III. The Progress and Triumph of the Church of Rome.

IV. The Reformation, both in its good and bad effects. And,

V. The subsequent history of Christianity, particularly in England; with the prospect of its future dominion over all mankind, as declared in the prophecies of the Old and New Testament."

ABBOTT, Rev. JACOB, Ex-Prof.

Mr. Abbott was graduated at Bowdoin College, and, not long after, appointed professor of mathematics and natural philosophy at Amherst College. He has since been the successful teacher of the Mt. Vernon Female School, Boston; and, for a time, had the pastoral charge of an Evangelical society in Roxbury, now under the care of one of his brothers, who, with another member of the same family, has also obtained similar success in religious publications of a familiar character. The 'Religious Magazine,' originally commenced by these gentlemen, has passed into the hands of several associates, clergymen and others, and now receives their occasional assistance.

Prof. Abbott is well known to the religious public by his timely and popular work, 'The Young Christian,' concerning which, a respected friend and correspondent of the Ed., Dr. Williams, of Shrewsbury, England, (now Sir John B.) to whom a copy had been sent, was pleased to remark: 'I have seldom seen a religious publication so striking, and so adapted for usefulness. It powerfully arrested the attention of some branches of my family; and it soon became a favorite of the British public.' In the words of the author, 'This book is intended to explain and illustrate, in a simple manner, the principles of Christian duty, and is intended not for children, nor exclusively for the young, but for all who are just commencing a religious life, and who feel desirous of receiving a familiar illustration of the principles of piety.' 'Designed not to dispense the theory, but to enforce the practice of religion' — 'those great principles in which all denominations of Evangelical Christians concur.' Its title is,

The Young Christian; or, a Familiar Illustration of the Principles of Christian Duty. By Jacob Abbott, Principal of the Mt. Vernon Female School. Boston, 1832.

ABEN-EZRA, ABRAHAM;

'A Jew, a native of Toledo in Spain, of the 12th century; one of the most happy and rare geniuses, and most distinguished writers of his nation, as acknowledged by Jews and Christians, who admire the extent of his learning. He was an able interpreter, theologian, physician, philosopher, mathematician, astronomer, grammarian, poet, philologist; learned in Hebrew, Chaldee, Arabic, and other languages; and so profound in all these branches, that he composed works, much appreciated, in each. His countrymen surmised him "The Sage," and the great Maimonides, a contemporary, thought so highly of him, that he directed his son to study A.'s works alone, as excellent, useful, elegant, learned, full of the nicest discernment, and as the best. Simon avers that no Hebrew had so literally and learnedly commented on Scripture. Like the ancients, he increased his knowledge by extensive travel, and intercourse with the greatest masters. He was in Mantua in 1145, in Rhodes in 1156, in England in 1159, and in Rome in 1167. He lived 75 years, and died, it is believed, in 1168, (some say, but improbably, 1194), in Rhodes.'

The above is from De Rossi's Hist. Dict. of Heb. Writers and their Works, Parma, 1802, in which he gives the following catalogue and characters of the works of Aben-Ezra; showing the literature of that age, which was mostly with the Jews:—

1. Excellent and Literal Comments, to the number of 24, on all the Hebrew Bible, printed separately, and in the Great Rabbinic Bibles of Venice, Basle, and Amsterdam. The first of his comments, printed, was upon Esther, in the Meghilloth, or Sacred Rolls, in Bologna, 1482; next, on the Pentateuch, in 1488. His commentaries have been translated into Latin; — the Decalogue, by Munster, Lepuscotus, Mercer; the first 5 Minor Prophets, by Mercer; Joel and the Canticles, by Genebrardus; Obadiah and Jouah, by Lensden and Pontaeus; Nahum, Habakuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, and Malachi, by Lundius; Haggai, by Alhicht; Proverbs, by Giggeus; Lamentations, by Tadler; the first 12 Psalms, by Fagius; Iosach, by Pellicanus: all these are printed, except the last, which is in MS. in the Zurich public library. His comments are very literal, judicious, and learned, but a little too precise and obscure, and sometimes novel.

2. Comment on the Minor Prophets, compiled and received from the mouth of Aben-Ezra. Now in MS. in my cabinet.

3. Sodoth Atora, Arcana of the Law, or recondite and cabballistic explanation of the Pentateuch. 1167.

4. Tov Ehem, Of the Good Name. Bodleian MS.

5. Igheer A-shabbat, Letter of the Sabbath, in verse; in which he shows it is the evening before that day, and not the evening after, that should be kept. England, 1159.

6. Chai Ben Mekitz, Long live the Son of the Awaked; a little poem on the soul, and the rewards and punishments of a future life. Of this there have been several editions, one published in Amsterdam, 1733.

7. Jesod Mora, Foundation of Fear; or, Jesod Tora, Foundation of the Law. It treats, in 12 sections, of the various studies of Scripture, of tradition, of precepts, &c., and sciences, and the mode of cultivating them. It was printed in C Poli in 1530, and in Venice in 1666. My MS. was composed in England, 1159. Exceedingly rare.

8. Asheem, The Name; on the ineffable name of God. A MS. in the Bodleian and Medici libraries.

9. Mozenaim, Balances of the Holy Language, or Hebrew Grammar. Printed in Venice in 1546.

10. Shafa Berura, Pure Lip; a grammatical work, written in 1157. Printed in Constantinople in 1530.

11. Tzaend, Of Elegance; treat of letters and Hebrew grammar. Venice, 1546.

12. Shefat Jeder, Lip of Excellence; on grammar. In my cabinet.

13. Chidda, or Enigma; upon quiescent letters; in the Rabbinic Bibles of Bomberg and Buxtorf.

14. Sod, or Mystery; of the shape of letters. MS. in the Vatican.

15. Ormid Annezima, Acuteness of Thought; an elegant little philosophic poem, which treats of the soul. The same with Arugad Annezima, or Pardez Chochma, or Garden of Wisdom. Vatican MS.

16. Shir, or Song of the Soul; in which souls are supposed to ascend, in the time of repose, to God, and tell Him the actions of men, and, at morning, to return to their bodies. Vatican MS.

17. Aqimispar; or, On Arithmetic; treating, in 7 sections, of the 10 numerals. MS. in the Vatican, Bodleian, Medici, and my libraries.

18. Acherahd; or, Of Unity; on the virtues of the numbers 1 to 10. Vatican and Bodleian MS.

19. Reschil Churchara, Principle of Wisdom; on astrology; containing treatises on computations, nativities, new moons, stars, &c., and freedom. In MS. in the Vatican, &c. Many Latin translations exist.

20. Sefer Olam, Book of the World. MS. in the Leyden public library. It seems the same with Book of Heaven and Earth. MS. in Vienna.

21. Astronomic Book of the Embolismatic Years. A Bodleian MS.

22. Answer to Astronomical Queries.

23. Comment on the Book of the Astrolate.

24. The Bronze Vase; on the sun, moon, and planets.

25. Astronomic Tables.

26. Book of Lots; on judicial astrology.

27. Poem on the Game of Chess.

28. Poems and Prayers.

29. Poetry; various subjects and metres.

ABRABANEL, or ABARBANEL, ISAAC;

'A Portuguese Jew, born in Lisbon, in 1437; one of the greatest men of the Hebrews in genius, learning, and politics; of an ancient and distinguished family, which boasted its descent from King David. His rich parents gave him an excellent education, suited to his condition, which his quick genius well improved; and, turning his attention to polities, he held several offices under Alphonso V., and lived to his 45th year in splendor, till that king died, when he was obliged to flee to Castile. This recalled him to his early studies, and he composed his Comments upon Joshua, Judges, and Samuel. Ambition and the memory of past splendor tormented him, and he insinuated himself at the court of Ferdinand of Spain, who received him graciously; and, for his service, he abandoned his Comment on the Kings, and lived at court eight years, till 1492, when a sudden and fatal decree of the king obliged all Jews to leave Spain. Abarbanel used his utmost efforts to save himself and his nation, but in vain; and he was obliged to sail for Naples, where he arrived, with all his family, in 1493. He immediately finished his Comment on the Kings, and had the art to ingratiate himself with Ferdinand, king of Naples, and Alphonso, his successor, with whom, on the invasion of Naples by the king of France, he fled to Messina. On his death, a few months after, Abarbanel went to Corfu, where he commenced his Comment on Isaiah, and found, with surprise and joy, his Comment on Deuteronomy, which he had lost in his flight from Lisbon. In 1496, he established himself at Monopoli, in Apulia, where he secluded himself, and composed the greater part of his works. Finally, in 1503, he went, with his son Joseph, to Venice, to terminate some differences between that republic and Portugal. There he commented on the Pentateuch, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the 12 Minor Prophets; answered the questions of R. Saul; commenced, but did not finish, another book; and died in 1508, in the 71st year of his age. He has shown great talent, a profound mind, vast erudition, store of sacred archaeology, theology, polemics, history, science, and acute ratiocination. His Comments are literal and esteemed. See Simon, who remarks that he is the most profitable of the rabbins to the student, for Scripture interpretation, but is often too subtle.' De Rossi: who gives a list of 17 of his works, of which the most important are,

1. A Comment on the Pentateuch. fol. Venice, 1579; reprinted in Hanover, in 1710, and in Amsterdam, in 1768. Buxtorf published some dissertations from it, in his Cosri, and in his Philological Dissertations.

2. A Comment on the First Prophets, or Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings. Without date; also, in Pesaro, in 1511 or 12, and Leipzig, 1686; Hamburg, 1687.

3. A Comment on the Latter Prophets, i. e. Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the 12 Minor Prophets. fol. Pesaro, 1520; Amsterdam, 1611. The greater part, on the Minor Prophets, has been Latinized, and the anti-Christian parts confuted, by L'Emperour, Granberg, &c.

4. A Comment on Daniel, entitled Majene Ajshua, Founts of Salvation. 1551. Anst., 1647.

5. Mashnua Jeshua, The Herald of Salvation. Without place; also, in Salonic, 1526; Amsterdam, 1644; Offenbach, 1767. Its scope is to illustrate the oracles of the 17 prophets, which speak of the future redemption of the Jews, and cannot, A. thinks, be understood in a spiritual sense, as the Christians do. Theologians consider it a perfect compendium of the modern Jewish theology of the Messiah, as opposed to the Christian. [The Ed.'s Latin tr. is dated 1711, and is by Maius, who appends a life of Abarbanel.]

6. Rosh Amana, Capit Fidel. fol. Constantinople, 1505. It treats of the articles of the Jewish faith. Vorstius Latinized it, Amsterdam, 1638.

7. Zevach Pesach; on the Passover and its Rites. Constan. 1505.

8. Nachalad Avoth, Inheritance of the Fathers; a comment on Pirke Avoth. 1505.

9. Atered Zekenim; on the Promises to the Fathers, and the Modes of Prophecy; taking up the 33d ch. of Exodus.

10. Mishhalot Elohim; on the Creation of the World by God, and against its Eternity.

13. Jeshuoth Meshico; explaining the ancient traditions or Talmudic and Midraschic testimonies to the Messiah.

14. Laakad Annevlin; on the various degrees of Prophecy.

15. Tzedek Olanim, Justice of Ages; MS. on the present and future world, paradise, hell, resurrection, and future rewards and punishments.

16. Jemoth Olam, Days of the Age, or Chronicle of the Afflictions and Persecutions hitherto suffered by the Hebrews. MS., unfinished.

ABULFEDA.

'Sultan Omaduddin Aboolfeda Ismael Ben Nasser is an author very illustrious among the Arabs, and now well known among us. He reigned at Hamah in Syria, and is said to have been born in the year 672 of the Hegira, and to have died in 732.' D'Herbelot. His works are,

1. Takovim al-Baldan; a Geography disposed by tables according to the order of climates, with the degrees of longitude and latitude of each place; with some, but not always correct, notes.

2. Al Mokhtassar fi Akhbar Albasehar; an Abridgment of Universal History down to his Times.

ADAM, ALEXANDER, LL. D.;

Rector of the High School of Edinburgh; an accurate and indefatigable scholar. As, however, what relates to his 'Roman Antiquities,' used in the Comprehensive Commentary, is all the plan of this Biography admits, this notice will be confined to that work. It was the result of 20 years of critical labors, and first published in 1791; many editions have appeared since: well tested by time, it has now taken the place of all others as a classic.

The best edition is of 1835, by Dr. Boyd, Edinb., in which are added most valuable notes, and many cuts, principally from the antiquities of Pompeii and Herculaneum. Of these free use has been made; and from it is taken the accurate plan of ancient Rome, at the head of Rom., originally published by the British Society for the Diff. of U. Knowledge. The following is the full title of Dr. A.'s work:—

Roman Antiquities; or, an Account of the Manners and Customs of the Romans, respecting their Government, Magistracy, Laws, Judicial Proceedings, Religion, Games, Military and Naval Affairs, Dress, Exercises, Baths, Marriages, Divorces, Funerals, Weights and Measures, Coins, Method of Writing, Houses, Gardens, Agriculture, Carriages, Public Buildings, &c., &c., &c. Designed chiefly to illustrate the Latin Classics, by explaining Words and Phrases from the Rites and Customs to which they refer.

ADAM, Rev. THOMAS;

'Rector of Wintingham, Eng.; born 1701, died 1784; a very pious, useful man, with excellent views of Christianity. His Private Thoughts on Religion are exceedingly valuable. His works are not critical, but doctrinal and practical':—

1. A Paraphrase on Romans, chs. I-II. 8vo. 1711.

2. An Exposition of St. Matthew, with suitable Lectures and Prayers. 12mo. 1805; 8vo. London, 1822. This was 'given in weekly lectures to an illiterate audience.' 'The whole is divided into 66 sections, each of which, containing an Exposition of the passage, a Lecture, and a Prayer, forms a complete religious exercise for Christian families.'

ADAMS, Rev. NEHEMIAH;

Pastor of the Orthodox Congregational Church in Essex Street, Boston, and formerly settled at Cambridge. He is author of a popular work on the duties of parents, especially in relation to baptism, entitled 'The Baptized Child,' also of 'All in the Ark,' and other occasional pieces, which have been well received.

ALIAN, CLAUDIOUS;

'A Greek author who lived at Praeneste, about A. D. 221. He was a learned sophist, and has left two works, compiled in pretty good style—a Collection of Stories and Anecdotes, and a Natural History of Animals. Of the former, one of the best critical editions was published by Gronovius, at Leyden, 1731, 2 vols. 4to. Later editions have been published by Kuhn, Leipsic, 1780, and Coray, Paris, 1805.' Enc. Am.

ÆSCHINES;

'A famous orator of Athens; born 393, died 323, B. C. Being the son of poor parents, he passed his youth among the lower classes, with whom he wandered about, partaking in their amusements, particularly in the festivals in honor of Bacchus. Encouraged by their applause, he became an actor, acquired the right of citizenship, engaged in politics, attended the lectures of Plato and Isocrates, and soon became the rival of Demosthenes, whom, however, he did not equal in power and energy, although he was distinguished by a happy choice of words, and by richness and perspicuity of ideas. He gradually lost the favor of the people, and fled to Rhodes and Samos, where he gave instruction in rhetoric till his death.

'Three orations and twelve letters of his are extant. They are to be found in the collection of Aldus, Stephanus, and Reiske, (3d and 4th vols.)' Enc. Am.

ÆSCINNES,

The philosopher, a native of Athens, who, by way of distinction from the preceding, is called the Socratic: he was a poor disciple of Socrates.

We possess, under his name, three dialogues, 'On Virtue,' 'On Riches,' and 'On Death,' which, however, are not allowed by strict critics to be genuine. The best edition is that of I. F. Fischer, Leipsic, 1786. Enc. Am.

AINSWORTH, HENRY, D. D.;

A celebrated non-conformist divine of the 16th and 17th centuries; but both the time and place of his birth are unknown.

In 1590, he greatly distinguished himself among a sect of dissenters, called Brownists; and, in early life, gained great reputation by his knowledge of the learned languages, and particularly of Hebrew. The Brownists having fallen into great discredit in England, Ainsworth was involved in their difficulties and troubles; and, at length, he was compelled to quit his native land and retire into Holland. In conjunction with Johnson, he erected a church at Amsterdam; and published a confession of faith of the Brownists, in the year 1602, which caused much contention, and a division between him and Mr. Johnson was the result; the latter removing to Emden with half the congregation, and Ainsworth remaining at Amsterdam; but Johnson soon after died, and his congregation was dissolved. Ainsworth also left his people for a short time, and went to Ireland, but returned to Amsterdam, and continued there till the time of his death. Nothing could persuade him, however, to return home; and he died, as he lived, in exile. This circumstance was, at that time, very prejudicial to the Protestant cause in general, and especially to the Puritans; and it has ever been a matter of regret, that, through a too rigorous administration, the church excluded this great and able man from the public exercise of his ministry in his native country. Very few authors are more quoted than Ainsworth, by the literati of all countries; and not only at a considerable distance of time, but by all sects and parties. To his writings the celebrated Bishop Hall paid much attention.

Ainsworth was a man of profound learning, well versed in the Scriptures, and deeply read in the Rabbins. He published several treatises, many of which excited great interest, particularly that entitled 'A Counter Poison,' &c. He is much celebrated for his 'Annotations,' printed at various times and in many sizes.

His death was sudden; and suspicion of his having been poisoned was raised by his having found a diamond, of great value, belonging to a Jew, and his refusing to return it to him till he had confessed, with some of the Rabbins, on the prophecies of the O. T., relating to the Messiah, which was promised; but the Jew, not having sufficient interest to obtain the concession, is thought to have occasioned his death. Mr. Ainsworth was a great, a learned, and a pious man; and his name will be justly handed down to posterity as worthy not only of praise, but imitation. Jones's Christian Biography; Neal's History of the Puritans; Heylin's History of the Presbyterians; Wendler's Diss. de Lib. Rar. sec. 23; Vogt. Catalogus Historico-Criticus Librorum Rariorum; Light's Treatise of Religion and Learning; Calamy's Life of Baxter; and Memoirs of Ainsworth. REL. ENC.—His chief works are,

1. Annotations on several Books of the Bible. In those on the 5 books of Moses, Psalms, and Canticles, the Hebrew words are compared with and explained by the Ancient Greek and Chaldee versions, and other records and monuments of the Hebrew.
2. A Counter Poison against Barnard and Crashaw.
3. A Treatise on the Communion of Saints.
4. A Treatise on the Fellowship that the Faithful have with God, his Angels, and one with another in this present Life.
5. An Arrow against Idolatry.

ALEXANDER, ARCHIBALD, D. D.

Professor of didactic and polemic theology in the Theological Seminary of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, at Princeton, N. J. A native of Rockbridge county, Virginia, he was educated, it is believed, at Hampden-Sydney College, in Prince Edward county, Va., and studied theology with the Rev. Mr. Graham, of Rockbridge co. He resided as a pastor in Prince Edward co., and, it is believed, was, for a time, president of the college. When the Rev. J. B. Smith, pastor of the third Presbyterian church, Philadelphia, was called to the presidency of Union College, Dr. Alexander was chosen to succeed him in Philadelphia. Here he resided a number of years, till, on the establishment of the Princeton Theological Seminary, (in 1812,) he was appointed by the General Assembly their first professor in that institution, where he remains eminently respected and beloved. Rer. W. J. Armstrong. — Among his works are,

1. Evidences of the Christian Religion; which has passed through several editions.
2. Counsels to the Young.
3. The Canon of the O. and N. T. ascertained. 1826. Lond. 1828.
4. Pocket Dictionary of the Bible. 1830.

ALLIX, PETER, D. D.

A very learned and eminent Protestant divine, born in France, at Alençon, in 1641, where he pursued his first studies under his father, who sent him, to complete his education, to Saumur, and afterwards to Sedan, where, at the age of 19, he distinguished himself by theological theses on the Last Judgment. On leaving, he was made minister at St. Agobile, in Champagne. In process of time, he became minister of the Reformed Church at Rouen, where he soon began to distinguish himself as an author, by publishing some very learned and curious pieces, by which he acquired great reputation. It was owing to this that he was called from Rouen to succeed the learned Daillé at Charenton, which was the principal church that the Reformed had in France. This was a high honor conferred upon him; and, being now in the zenith of his ferment, and finding himself in a condition for rendering great services to the church, he applied himself to the task with all possible zeal, defending the Protestant doctrine against the artful attempts of the bp. of Meaux, who was then laboring to overthrow the reformed religion. Here also he assisted the famous Claude in his new French version of the Bible. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes, Mr. Allix found himself compelled to quit France, in 1685, on which he retired into England, where he met with a most favorable reception, on account of his extensive learning, and, more especially, his singular knowledge in ecclesiastical history, for which he was particularly esteemed. 'Burnet, bp. of Salisbury, gave him a canonicate and the revenues of his cathedral; the universities of Oxford and Cambridge conferred on him an honorary doctorate. He was very zealous, and took great pains, and made many unsuccessful attempts with the ministers of Holland, Geneva, and Berlin, to effect a union of all the Protestant churches, especially the Lutherans and Calvinists.' Biog. Univ. — On his arrival in England, he applied very closely to learning the English language, which he attained to a surprising degree of perfection, as is manifest from the various publications which issued from his pen. Among these may be particularly specified his 'Reflections on the Holy Scriptures,' 'Remarks on the Ecclesiastical History of the Ancient Churches of Piedmont'; also upon 'of the Albigenses.' In these last treatises, he vindicates the Waldenses and Albigenses from the foul aspersions of Bossuet, the bishop of Meaux, and, with great force, retorts on him his own arguments, by showing that a constant and vigorous opposition to the church of Rome, founded not only on a disavowal of her authority, but also on a strenuous resistance to her corruptions in doctrine, discipline, and practice, is far from proving either heresy or schism in her opponents. In the course of his 'Remarks,' he is led into an examination of various important questions; and with freedom, learning, and impartiality, he traces the progress of the sentiments of the Albigenses into Spain, as well as their connection with the opinions of Wickliffe in England. [See W. Jones's Church Hist., 1st Am., from 4th Lond., ed., 1821.] He wrote also on transubstantiation; and, critically and theologically, on the controversies of the church; also, on the oath of allegiance to the British government; &c.

But the book which obtained him the highest credit was, 'The Judgment of the Jewish Church against the Unitarians.' This was a great undertaking, requiring an extensive knowledge of Greek and Hebrew literature, which all must allow Dr. Allix to have exhibited, and that he managed the whole controversy with equal perspicuity and erudition. He enjoyed an uncommon share of health and spirits, as appears by his later writings, in which there is not only all the erudition, but all the quickness and vivacity which appeared in his earliest pieces. Of vast erudition, he was perfectly master of the Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, and Chaldee; was consulted by the greatest men of his age, on the deepest and most intricate parts of learning; and was acknowledged to be a genius of the first order, by those whom the world have esteemed not only the most capable, but also the most unbiased critics. Dr. Allix continued his application to the last, and died in London, in the 76th year of his age, Feb. 21st, 1717; leaving behind him the reputation of a man assiduous in the discharge of all the offices of public and private life, and every way as amiable for his virtues and social qualities, as he was venerable for his uprightness and integrity, and famous for his various and profound learning. Biographic Universelle, and Jones's Biog. Dict. — His chief works are,

1. The Judgment of the Ancient Jewish Church against the Unitarians, in the Controversy upon the Holy Trinity and the Divinity of our blessed Savior.
2. Reflections on the Books of the Holy Scriptures, designed to establish the Truth of the Christian Religion. The Biog. Univ. characterizes the work as 'judicious, instructive, but ill-written, and without method.' It has been republished in the valuable collection of tracts by the late Bp. Watson.

3. Remarks upon the Eccl. Hist. of the Ancient Churches of Piedmont. 'I conceive,' says Allix, 'that it was well becoming a Christian to undertake the defence of innocence, oppressed and overborne by the blackest calumnies the devil could ever invent.'

4. Remarks upon the Eccl. Hist. of the Ancient Churches of the Albigenses. 'We should be ungrateful,' says Allix, 'towards those whose sufferings for Christ have been so beneficial to his church, should we not take care to justify their memory.'

ALTING, HENRY, D. D.

Professor of theology at Heidelberg and at Groningen, was born, 1583, at Emden, of a very ancient and honorable family. His parents were both pious. He made such proficiency in his studies, under the famous Piscator and others, that, at the age of 22, he was allowed to teach philosophy and divinity. In 1605, he was chosen preceptor to the three young counts of Nassau, Solmes, and Issenberg, together with the electoral prince palatine. In 1612, being appointed to attend the young elector into England, he there became acquainted with Abp. Abbot, Dr. King, and Dr. Hackwell, and was introduced also to King James. The marriage between the elector and the princess of England having been solemnized at London, Feb., 1613, Alting returned home, and, in the following August, was chosen professor of theology at Heidelberg. In 1618, he obtained the second professorship for Sculpetus.

Being sent with two other deputies to the synod of Dort, he greatly distinguished himself there by his learning. In 1622, Count Tilly took Heidelberg by storm, and allowed his soldiers to commit all manner of devastations. Alting had an almost miraculous escape; for, being met by a soldier, he was stopped by him in this manner: 'I have killed with these hands ten men to-day, and Dr. Alting should make the eleventh, if I could find him: who are you?' The doctor replied, 'A schoolmaster at the collegium sapientia.' The soldier did not understand this, and so let him escape. In 1623, the king of Bohemia employed him at the Hague to instruct his eldest son, and would not consent to his becoming minister of Emden, or professor at the university of Franeker — situations which were offered him. In 1627, however, he gave him leave to accept of a professorship of theology at Groningen; where, though repeatedly called to other places, he continued until his death.

In 1639, he lost his eldest daughter, and, in 1643, his wife — domestic afflictions which gave severe shocks to his health and spirits. In his last sickness, being visited by the excellent Dr. Maresius, Alting congratulated him as his designed successor; adding, 'It much rejoices me that I shall leave to the church and university, one who is studious of peace, orthodox in judgment, and averse to novelties.'

The day before his death, he sang the 130th Psalm with a great sense of God's presence and love, and passed the rest of his time in meditation and prayer. In the evening he blessed his children; and the next morning, finding within himself that his departure was at hand, he told those about him that before sunset he should depart, and be with the Lord. Grounding his faith on the blood and righteousness of Jesus Christ, with the promises of his gospel, strengthened and comforted by the gracious influence of the Holy Ghost, he waited for death without fear; bade the numerous circle of learned and pious relatives and friends around him farewell, and expressed his readiness and desire to be dissolved, and to be with his Master in heaven. Thus peacefully did this good man depart, Aug. 25, 1644.

He was, says Middleton, a man of great worth, distinguished alike for his learning, diligence, public spirit, and benevolence to mankind. Among other important commissions in which he was employed, one was the revision of the new Dutch translation of the Bible at Leyden; and another, to be sole general inspector of the county of Steinfurt, to set in order the churches, which had been threatened with an invasion of Socinianism. Alting, though attached to orthodoxy, was no quarrelsome divine, and wasted no time on insignificant matters: though zealous for ancient doctrine, he was an enemy to the subtleties of the schools; and though not fond of novelty, adhered closely to the instructions of the word of God.

His works, with the exception of his Theologia Historica, (1664), were published together in three volumes, with the title: 'Scripto Theologica Heidelbergensia.' Middleton.

Of his Theologia Historica, the Biog. Unir. says, 'It is one of the first attempts towards the History of Dogmatic Theology, which the Germans have since elevated to one of the most interesting branches of the history of the human mind; and H. Alting may be looked upon as one of the most distinguished pioneers of such as Planck, Augustus, and Münster.' [See Rev. Dr. Murdock's tr. from the latter of the 'Elts. of Dogm. Hist.', New Haven, 1830.]

'Bayle,' adds the Biog. Unir., 'gives a very imperfect list of the numerous works of H. Alting, which have now only an historical interest.'

ALTING, JAMES, Prof.;

'Son of Henry, born 1618, died 1667. He was professor of theology at Groningen, and has left works full of useful researches on different points of Hebrew antiquities and oriental philology. In his Hebrew grammar, he introduced the Systeem of Three Moras belonging to every syllable, one of the most ingenious and subtle grammatical tact has ever invented; and his system served as the basis of the magnificent developments of Schultens. His works have been published together, and with his life prefixed, by Becker, in 1687, 5 vols. fol., Amsterdam.' Biog. Unir. The chief are,

1. Hebraeorum Respublica Scholastica, seu Historia Academicum et Promotionum Academicarum in Populo Hebraeorum. Amsterdam, 1652.
2. Dissertatio maximae de Rebus Hebraeorum, in the Thesaurus Groningen, 1698.
3. Commentaries on most of the Books of the Bible.
4. A Syro-Chaldaic Grammar.
5. A Treatise on Hebrew Points.

ANACREON;

Born at Teos, in Ionia. He lived about 530 B. C. It is said that Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, invited him to his court, and gave him his friendship and favor. The voluptuous Anacreon crowned himself with roses, sang love songs, got drunk, and troubled himself little about the favors of fortune. After the death of Polycrates, Anacreon went to Athens, and Hipparchus, who commanded there, sent out a 50-oared galley to meet him. On the fall of Hipparchus, he returned to Teos, and afterwards retired to Abdera, where he lived gayly to the age of 85. He died, strangled, it is said, by a grape-stone.

Of the numerous and splendid eds. of his works, Brunck's, 16ma., published from the Vatican MS., at Strasburg, in 1786, is most generally esteemed. Biog. Unir. He is thought to have imitated Song 5:2—6. See Dr. A. Clarke, on the passage.

ANDERSON, RUFUS, D. D.

Dr. Anderson is now one of the secretaries of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, having the charge of its foreign correspondence. He was graduated at Bowdoin College, studied theology at Andover, engaged in the City Mission of Boston, and was afterwards associated with the lamented Evarts, to one of whose departments, now, by the blessing of God on the cause of missions, greatly enlarged, he succeeded.

In 1829, he visited, on behalf of the Board, the Mediterranean Missions, and, on his return, in 1830, published 'Observations upon the Peloponnesus and Greek Islands,' being a selection of facts, collected by himself and Rev. Eli Smith, (missionary in Asia Minor, &c.,) and 'aiming at perfect accuracy in their statement.' It is unquestionably the best account of missions to the Greeks.

APPIAN;

'A Greek historian, born at Alexandria. He lived under the emperors Trajan, Hadrian, and Antonine. He early established himself at Rome, where he became distinguished as a lawyer, and was named procurator, or superintendent of the domestic affairs of the emperors; and, some say, appointed governor of Egypt. Appian, in his History, (of 21 books,) speaks of the destruction of Jerusalem by Hadrian as of a contemporary event, and says in his preface, that the Roman empire had lasted 900 years; which proves that he wrote about the 11th year of Antonine. He throws great light on the history of his times, and ancient geography. Some read him with distrust, but Photius says he is full of respect for truth, and shows a great knowledge of military affairs. Indeed, the 5 incomplete books left us on the civil wars, carrying the stamp of truth on their face, are one of the most precious reliques of antiquity. The next 3 vols. are mostly preserved, as also the 12th, 13th, 17th, 23d, and extracts of the 9th and 11th: the others are entirely lost. Schweighäuser has given an excellent edition of all. Leipsic and Strasburg, 1785, 3 vols. Svo.' Biog. Unir.

APPLETON, JESSE, D. D.

The second president of Bowdoin College, was born at New Ipswich, in the state of New Hampshire, Nov. 17, 1772. [Of his early years, an intimate friend remarks, 'I have rarely, if ever, known a youth so esteemed and beloved.'] President Appleton was graduated at Dartmouth College, in 1792. It was during his residence at that seminary, that he experienced deep religious impressions; yet of any precise period when his heart was regenerated by the Spirit of God, he was not accustomed to speak. The only safe evidence of piety, he believed, was 'the perception in himself of those qualities which the gospel requires.' Having spent two years in the instruction of youth, [in which he was highly successful,] at Dover and Amherst, he studied theology under Dr. Lathrop, of West Springfield, [who did not conceal the high hopes he had formed of his pupil; hopes afterwards abundantly realized. His papers of this period exhibit the mental traits for which he was afterwards distinguished — careful thought, a disposition to form well-defined views, and logical precision.] In February, 1797, he was ordained as the pastor of a church at Hampton, New Hampshire. His religious sentiments, at this period, were Arminian. Much of his time, during his ten years' residence in that town, was devoted to systematic, earnest study, in consequence of which his sentiments assumed a new form. By his faithful, affectionate services, he was very much endeared to his people. At his suggestion, the Piscataqua Evangelical Magazine was published, to which he contributed valuable essays, with the signature of Leighton. Such was his public estimation, that, in 1803, he was one of the two principal candidates for the professorship of theology at Harvard College; but Dr. Ware was elected. In 1807, he was chosen president of Bowdoin College, into which office he was inducted Dec. 23. After the toils of ten years in this station, his health became much impaired in consequence of a severe cold, in October, 1817. In May, 1819, his illness became more alarming, his complaints being a cough, hoarseness, and debility. A journey proved of no essential benefit. A profuse hemorrhage, in October, extinguished all hope of recovery. As the day of his dissolution approached, he remarked, 'Of this I am sure, that salvation is all of grace. I would make no mention of any thing which I have ever thought, or said, or done; but only of this, that God so loved the world as to give his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' The atonement is the only ground of hope.' In health, he was sometimes anxious, in a high degree, in regard to the college; but in his sickness, he said, in cheerful confidence, 'God has taken care of the college, and God will take care of it.' Among his last expressions were heard the words, 'Glory to God in the highest! the whole earth shall be filled with his glory.' He died, Nov. 12, 1819, at the age of 47, having been president nearly 12 years. Allen. See also the Memoir prefixed to Dr. A.'s works. The published writings of Dr. Appleton 'have placed him in the highest class of theological and ethical writers of our country.' They will form a permanent bequest to his country's reputation, distinguished as they are for sound and sober thought, logical precision, and correct taste. It were to be wished that they might be diffused extensively, for the benefit of all who seek a thorough education, whether for time or eternity. It would augur well for these States, were they in high request, since the beloved and respected author (of whom the Editor hardly dares trust himself to speak, lest personal friendship should too strongly bias his language) lived not for himself, but for God and mankind.

In 1820, a volume of his addresses was published, containing his inaugural address, and 11 annual addresses, with a sketch of his character, by Rev. Dr. Nichols, of Portland. In 1822, his lectures and occasional sermons were published, in one volume, with a memoir of his life, by Rev. Benjamin Tappan, of Augusta. A new and elegant edition of his works, embracing his course of theological lectures, his academic addresses, and a selection from his sermons, with the memoir re-written and extended, was published in 1837, 2 vols. 8vo.; 'in a form,' says Prof. Packard, 'more worthy of the author's memory, with the confident expectation that the work will be regarded not only as the result of the persevering investigations and patient thought of a clear, discriminating, and powerful mind, always influenced by an ardent love of truth, but also as a valuable contribution to our literature.' The subjects of these 27 lectures, are the necessity of revelation, human depravity, the atonement, regeneration, the eternity of future punishment, the resurrection of the body, the demoniacs of the N.T., &c. The sermons are on Christ's transfiguration, Christ's universal reign, impenitent sinners without excuse, importance of ascertaining the truths of the gospel, its tendency when rejected, the young warned and reproved, the perpetuity and importance of the Sabbath, the Christian minister should give no offence, means of perpetuating the blessings of Christianity, the immortality of the soul, the influence of religion on the condition of man, the evils of war, and the probability of universal peace, true sources of national prosperity, the truth of Christianity from its moral effects, conscience, consequences of neglecting the great salvation, &c. &c.

AQUILA;

'Of Sinope, in Pontus. From a pagan he became a Christian; but, Christianity not tolerating the astrologic arts he professed, he became a Jew, in the beginning of the second century, in the time of Hadrian, [who, says the Biog. Univ., in consequence of his skill in architecture and mathematics, had appointed him to rebuild Jerusalem, under the name of Ælia, where he first became acquainted with Christianity.] Among the Hebrews, he applied himself with ardor to their language, and became able to undertake an original Greek version of the Old Testament, [which he published in 138:] and, from its being very literal, and close to the words and idiomatic phrases of the Hebrews, it was preferred in the synagogues to every other, and read publicly in them. Great use is made of it, also, in the most ancient of the Rabbinic writings, and in the Jerusalem Talmud itself, which attests that it was made by our proselyte in the presence of Rabbi Akiba his preceptor, or, as it were, under his instruction and direction. In the contest which arose under Justinian, as to the use of the versions, the use and reading of Aquila's was granted to the Hebrews by the emperor, in the 136th Novella, though made by a stranger, and disagreeing with the Septuagint. Fragments only remain, which were published by Montfaucon in the Hexapla of Origen. Some pretend, but without ground, that Aquila is the same with Onkelos. De Rossi.

'Aquila's translation was the earliest except the Sept., and done with great care, whatever Buxtorf may say, who quite absurdly denies to the author a perfect knowledge of the Hebrew. His manner is to translate word for word, and to express even the etymology of the terms. Although this version was undertaken with the design to contradict that of the Sept., used by the churches, after the example of the apostles, the ancient fathers found it in general so exact, that they often took their texts from it, as more appropriate, in certain places, to the true sense. The Hellenistic Jews also preferred it in their synagogues. Aquila joined Jewish traditions (learned from his master, Akiba) to his second edition, which was better received by the Hellenistic Jews than the first. Justinian forbade them to read it, because it contributed very much to render them obstinate in their error. The doctors of the law even forbade them to use it in the synagogues, and ordered them to confine themselves to the original Hebrew, and the Chaldee paraphrases.' Biog. Univ.

AQUINAS, THOMAS;

A celebrated theologian, to whom the hyperbolical admiration of the dark ages gave the sounding titles of the angelical doctor, the fifth doctor of the church, the eagle of dirines, and the angel of the schools. He was descended from the counts of Aquino, in Calabria, born in 1224, and educated at the university of Naples. At the age of 17, he entered into the Dominican order, contrary to the wishes of his mother, who, in conjunction with his brothers, attempted force, and every allurement, to entice him back to the world. When only 21, he taught dialectics, philosophy, and theology, in the university of Paris, with great applause. 'He was,' says the Dict. Hist., 'for theology, what Descartes was for philosophy; and, of all the scholastics of those ages of barbarism, without contradiction, the most profound, judicious, clear, and concise.' It is said that Bucer remarked of him, 'Take away Thomas, and I will overturn the Roman church.' Sixtus Senensis ranks him next to Augustin, 'whose soul might seem (if we could credit the Pythagorean notion) to have passed into Thomas Aquinas.' After having lectured on divinity in several universities, he settled at Naples, the archibishopric of which city he refused. He died in 1274, aged 48, and was canonized in 1433. The Roman Catholic church considers his writings as of high authority; and they gave rise to a sect which bore the name of Thomists. They form 17 volumes; the most celebrated of them is the Summa Theologica. Davenport, Care, &c.

ARATUS;

Of Soli, or Siloe, a town of note in Cilicia, founded by Solon, and afterwards called Pompeiopolis. He was contemporary with Theocritus, who mentions him honorably, and lived in favor with Ptolemy Philadelphus, and great intimacy with Antigonus Gonatas, son of Demetrius Poliorcetes. He was educated under Dionysius of Heraclea, a Stoic philosopher, and adopted the principles of that sect, founding his poetic works upon them. [Thus, Acts 17:28, Paul, speaking to the Stoics and others, calls Aratus a poet of 'their own.']

It is said he composed many works: the only poem of his which remains consists of two parts, his 'Phænomena', which is properly astronomical, and elegantly describes the nature and motion of the stars; and his 'Dioscuria', or Mirror, which is astrological, and shows the particular influences of the heavenly bodies, their various dispositions and relations. His poetic genius had no low esteem, when he was encouraged to correct the many errors and corruptions that had in time crept into Homer's Odyssey, and was sent for by Antiochus, king of Syria, to bestow his criticisms and emendations upon the Iliad.

Above 40 Greek scholiasts (among them Hipparchus) have commented on Aratus. Cicero says he wrote 'most polite and excellent verses,' though Quintilian says he lacks life, spirit, and variety, which indeed was, in part, the fault of his subject, which was description. His works, too, were translated into Latin verse by Claudius and Germanicus Cæsar, Cicero, and Ovid, and Festus Avienus. Ovid says his 'fame will last as long as the sun and moon'; Vossius, that he was, and is, of great authority among astronomers; Macrobius, that Virgil, in the Georgics, borrowed from him. Quintilian acknowledges that he was 'fit and sufficient for his work.'

Grotius, in his 'Syntagma Arateorum,' Leyden, 1600, gives the poem, with the above three Latin versions, and attempts to fill the numerous gaps Cicero has left. The best edition of Aratus is that of J. Bühl, Leipzig, 1793-1801, 2 vols. 8vo., with the Greek commentators, and additions from MSS. Biog. Univ.; Harwood.

ARBUTINOT, JOHN, Dr.;

The son of a Scotch Episcopal clergyman, and born at Arbutinot, near Montrose, soon after the restoration. Acquainted with Pope, Swift, and the other wits of the age, he took a share in their literary enterprises, and contributed largely to the works of Martinus Scriblerus. He died in 1735. Swift gave his character in few words. 'He has,' said he, 'more wit than all our race, and his humanity is equal to his wit.' Among his various works, part of which are medical, may be named his 'Tables of Ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures,' which are found in most large English Bibles. Darencourt.

ARISTOPHANES;

The only Grecian comic poet of whom any pieces have been preserved entire. By birth an Athenian, he appeared as a poet B. C. 427, and was distinguished among the ancients as the comedian, as Homer was by the name of the poet. Of his 54 comedies, 11 only remain, abounding in extravagances and immoralities, only to be tolerated by ancient customs and opinions. His pieces show a pure Attic dialect, and a masterly skill and care in their plan and execution. His wit and humor are inexhaustible, and his boldness unrestrained. The Greeks were enchanted with the grace and refinement of his writings, and Goethe calls him the spoiled child of the Graces. He made use of allegory in his attacks on the politicians of the day, as well as in scouring the vices and follies of his age. The freedom of ancient comedy (long considered a support of democracy) allowed an unbounded degree of personal satire, and Aristophanes made so free use of it, that nothing, divine or human, which offered a weak side, escaped his sarcasms. He incessantly reproached the Athenians for their fickleness, levity, love of flattery, foolish credulity, and readiness to entertain extravagant hopes; yet they crowned him with olive, then a remarkable distinction. After the Peloponnesian war, the license of comedy was restrained, and it was forbidden to name any person on the stage. Aristophanes died very old. See Euc. Am.

Among the best editions of his comedies are those of L. Küster, Ainst. 1710, fol.; Invernizio, Leipzig, 1791, 2 vols., with Beck's commentaries.

ARNOBIUS;

About A. D. 300, a teacher of rhetoric at Sicca Veneria, in Numidia. In 303, he became a Christian. While yet a catechumen, he wrote seven books, Adversus Gentes, in which he defended the Christian religion, and showed the folly and absurdity of heathenism with great spirit and learning, though his knowledge of the truth appears to have been somewhat defective.

The edition of this work at Leyden, in 1651, 4to., reviewed by Salmius, is preferred to all others for its notes by different learned men, and the correction of the text.

ARRIAN, FLAVIUS;

Born at Nieopolis, in Bithynia. He was a disciple of Epictetus, which, however, did not hinder him from the profession of arms, in which he soon so distinguished himself, against the Massagetae, as to attract the attention of the emperor Hadrian, who made him a Roman citizen, and gave him the government of Cappadocia, which he defended against the Alans, A. D. 131. Hadrian rewarded him with the consular dignity, and the title of senator; he was also, in his own country, made high-priest of Ceres and Proserpine. It is said he proposed to himself Xenophon as his model. In fact, as Xenophon had compiled the sayings of Socrates, Arrian wrote those of Epictetus. Xenophon published 7 books on the expedition of Cyrus, who founded the greatness of Persia; Arrian composed 7 books on the expedition of Alexander, who destroyed it. The "Greeks" of Xenophon, it is said, gave origin to the "Bithynians," and the "Alans" of Arrian. Arrian, like Xenophon, treated of tactics and the chase. Copying at once his style and character, he showed himself equally jealous of his reputation as a general and writer. Many of his works are lost, such as his Conversations of Epictetus, 12 books; The Life and Death of Epictetus; Wars with the Parthians, 17 books; Life of Til-leborus, a celebrated robber; The Events which followed Alexander's Death, 10 books, abridged in Photius; Acts of Timoleon; Dion's Deliverance of Syracuse; The Bithynians, or Origin and History of Bithynia, 8 books. Biog. Univ. His works, yet extant, are,

1. Enchiridion, or Manual of Epictetus, and Dissertations on his Philosophy. 4 books only remain of the 8.

2. Expeditions of Alexander; 7 books. Written after the lost accounts by Aristobulus and Ptolemy, who accompanied Alexander. This work is highly esteemed; it is reasonable, and has but two marvellous tales (of Aristander's predictions, and the new fountains of water and oil, which sprang up near the Oxus as soon as Alexander encamped there) to detract from its authenticity. It has been tr. into English by Rooke, 2 vols. 8vo., London, 1729.

3. The Indians; 1 book; in the Indian dialect. — The best editions of these last two, are those of Gronovius, 1704; Raphelius, 1757; Schneider, 1793; the last highly esteemed.

4. Peripus of the Euxine Sea.

5. Peripus of the Erythrean Sea; [‘doubtful,’ Enc. Am.] published in the Geographi Minores, Oxford.

6. Two Treatises on Tactics.

7. A Treatise on the Chase.

8. On the Manner of fighting the Alans. — These last 5 are published together by Blanckard, Amsterdam, 1685; also in 1750.

ASSEMANI, JOSEPH SIMON;

A Maronite Syrian, archbishop of Tyre, prefect of the library of the Vatican, &c., born 1637, died 1768. He was very well versed in ancient and oriental languages, and has published several works which place him among the most celebrated orientalists of Europe. His learned and beautiful Biblioteca Orientalis, from the press of the Propaganda, established his literary eminence. Biog. Univ. His works are,

1. Biblioteca Orientalis Clementino-Vaticana Recensio Manuscriptos Codices, Syriacos, Arabicos, Persicos, Turcicos, Hebraicos, Samaritanos, Armenicos, Æthiopicos, Gracos, Ægyptios, Ibericos, et Malabaricos, etc. jusso et munificentia Clelii XI. Romæ, 1719-28.

2. S. Ephraim, Syri, Opera omnia quæ extant, Græcæ, Syriacæ, et Latine, in 6 tomos, &c. Romæ, 1732-34.

3. De Sanctis Ferentini in Tuscia, Bonifacio ad Redempto Episcopico. Romæ, 1745.

4. Italica Historia Scriptores ex Bibliotheca Vaticana, etc., colliget et Prefatione Notisque illustrativa J. S. Assemanus. Romæ, 1751.

3. 4 vols. 4to.

5. Kalendaria Ecclesiæ Universæ, etc. Romæ, 1755-7. 6 vols. 4to.

ATHANASIUS,

The celebrated patriarch of Alexandria, was born in that city about 296. At the council of Nice, though then but a deacon of Alexandria, his reputation for skill in controversy gained him an honorable place in the council; and, with signal ability, he exposed the sophistry of those who pleaded on the side of Arius. Six months after, he was appointed the successor of Alexander. Notwithstanding the influence of the emperor, who had recalled Arius from banishment, and, upon a plausible confession of his faith, in which he affected to be orthodox in his sentiments, directed that he should be received by the Alexandrian church, Athanasius refused to admit him to communion, and exposed his prevarication. The Arians upon this exerted themselves to raise tumults at Alexandria, and, by falsehoods, to injure the character of Athanasius with the emperor, who was prevailed upon to pronounce against him a sentence of banishment. In the beginning of the reign of Constantius, he was recalled to his happy people, but was again disturbed and deposed, on accusations without proof, by a council of 90 Arian bishops, at Antioch, presided over by the famous Eusebius of Nicomedia. 100 orthodox bishops, at Alexandria, declared him innocent. The affair was carried to Rome, and accusations were sent against him and other bishops; but they were acquitted by Pope Julius in a council of 50 bishops, and his sentence was approved by more than 300 bishops of the East and West, at Sardica. Athanasius was restored a second time to his see, upon the death of the Arian bishop, who had been placed in it. Arianism, however, being in favor at court, he was condemned by a council convened at Arles, and by another at Milan, and a third time obliged to fly into the deserts: the bishops who refused to subscribe to his condemnation were also exiled. His enemies pursued him even here, setting a price upon his head, and tormenting or massacring the solitaires of that frightful country, who refused to betray him. In this situation, Athanasius composed writings full of eloquence, to strengthen the faith of believers, and expose the falsehood of his enemies. He returned with the other bishops whom Julian the Apostate recalled from banishment, and, in A. D. 362, held a council at Alexandria, where the belief of a consubstantial Trinity was openly professed. Many now were recovered from Arianism, and brought to subscribe the Nicene creed; and the moderation of Athanasius being imitated in Gaul, Spain, Italy, and Greece, harmony was restored to the church. But his peace was again interrupted by the complaints of the heathen, whose temples the zeal of Athanasius kept always empty. He was again obliged to fly to save his life. The accession of Jovian brought him back. During the reign of Jovian, also, Athanasius held another council, which declared its adherence to the Nicene faith; and, with the exception of a short retirement under Valens, he was permitted to sit down in quiet, and govern his affectionate church of Alexandria, until his death, in 373. Of 46 years of official life, he spent 20 in banishment.

'Athanasius is one of the greatest men of whom the church can boast. His deep mind, his noble heart, his invincible courage, his living faith, his unbounded benevolence, sincere humility, lofty eloquence, and strictly virtuous life, gained the honor and love of all.' His writings, whether of history, controversy, or morals, are distinguished for clearness and moderation: the best edition is by Montfaucon, Paris, 1698.

Athanasius was an eminent instrument of maintaining the truth, in an age when errors affecting the great foundation of our faith were urged with great subtlety. The Scripture doctrine of the Trinity, as explained by him, at length triumphed over the heresies which at one time met with so much support and sanction; and the views of Athanasius have been received, in substance, by all orthodox churches to the present time. Watson; Ency. Amer.; Biog. Univ.

ATHENAEUS;

A grammarian, born at Naucratis in Egypt, under the reign of Marcus Aurelius or Alexander Severus. He was living in A. D. 228, but his life is not at all known to us.

His Dipnosophists, or Banquet of the Learned, is a treasure of eruditio[n] of all kinds, and without it we should be ignorant of many matters of antiquity. It is in fifteen books, and has come down to us entire, except the first 2, which are abridged. The best edition is in 5 vols. of text and Latin translation, 8 of notes, and 1 of tables, by Schweighauser, 1801-7.

AUGUSTINE;

Sometimes called, in the short style of the middle ages, St. Austin; one of the most celebrated fathers of the church, whose writings for many centuries had almost as potent an influence on the religious opinions of Christendom as those of Aristotle exercised over philosophy. He was born, Nov. 13th, A. D. 354, at Tagasta, an episcopal city of Numidia in Africa. His parents, Patricius and Monica, were Christians of respectable rank in life, who afforded their son all the means of instruction which his excellent genius and wonderful aptitude for learning seemed to require. He studied grammar and rhetoric at Madura, until he was 16 years old; and afterwards removed to Carthage, to complete his studies. In both these cities, in all the fervor of unregenerate youth, he entered eagerly into the seducing scenes of dissipation and folly with which he was surrounded, and became not only depraved, but infamous in his conduct. In this respect, he was not improved by his subsequent connection with the Manichees, whose unhallowed principles afforded an excuse for his immorality, and threw a veil over the vilest of his actions. The simplicity and minuteness with which he has narrated the numerous incidents of his childhood, youth, and mature age, in his celebrated book of 'Confessions,' have afforded abundant matter of ridicule to the profane and infidel wits of this and the last age. The reflections, however, which accompany his narrative, are generally important and judicious, and furnish to the moral philosopher copious materials for a history of the varieties of the human heart, and are of superior value to the humble Christian for the investigation and better knowledge of his own. With a strange, though not uncommon inconsistency, few books have been more frequently quoted as authority on matters relating to general literature and philosophy by infidels themselves, than St. Augustine's otherwise despised 'Confessions,' and his 'City of God.' But, whatever else is taught in this remarkable piece of autobiography, every pious reader will be delighted with the additional proofs which it contains of the ultimate prevalence of faithful prayer, especially on the part of Christian parents. Monica's importunate prayers to Heaven followed the aberrations of her graceless son, when he settled at Carthage as a teacher of rhetoric; when he removed to Rome, and lodged with a Manichee; and when he finally settled at Milan as professor of rhetoric. St. Ambrose was, at that time, A. D. 384, bishop of Milan, and to his public discourses Augustine began to pay much attention. His mind became gradually prepared for the reception of divine truth, and for that important change of heart and principles which constitutes 'conversion.' The circumstances attending this change show that the modes of the Holy Spirit's operations was in substance the same in those early days as they are now; and time was when some of the soundest divines and most worthy dignitaries of the church of England were in the habit of referring with approbation to this well-attested instance of a change of heart.

In a frame of mind not unfamiliar to those who have themselves had 'much forgiven,' Augustine wished to retire at once from so wicked a world as that in which he had passed the first 32 years of his dissolute life. His secession, however, was only a temporary one; for he and Alpinus were, a few months afterwards, received by baptism into the Catholic church. After having composed several religious treatises in his retreat near Tagasta, especially against the errors of the Manichees, from which he had been so recently reclaimed, he was, in the year 392, ordained priest by Valerius, bishop of Hippo, now a part of the Barbary states on the coast of Africa. He there held a public disputation with Fortunatus, a celebrated priest among the Manichees, and acquitted himself with great spirit and success; he also wrote and preached largely, and to great effect, against the Donatists and Manichees. His reputation as a divine increased; and he was, at the close of the year 395, ordained bishop of Hippo, in which high station he continued with great advantage to wage war against various orders of heretics.

Augustine had hitherto directed his theological artillery principally against the predestinarian errors of the Manichees; but he was soon called upon to change his weapons and his mode of warfare, in attacking a new and not less dangerous class of heretics. In the year 412, he began to write against the injurious doctrines of Pelagius, a native of Britain, who had resided for a considerable time at Rome, and acquired universal esteem by the purity of his manners, his piety, and his erudition. Pelagius was seconded by Celestius, a man equally eminent for his talents and his virtues. Their principles were propagated at first rather by hints and intimations, than by open avowal and plain declarations; but this reserve was laid aside when they perceived the ready reception which their doctrines obtained; and Celestius began zealously to disseminate them in Africa, while Pelagius sowed the same tares in Palestine, whence they were speedily transplanted to almost every corner of Christendom. If the brief notices which have come down to us respecting their tenets, in the writings of their adversaries, be correct, they affirmed,⁴ It is not free will, if it requires the aid of God; because every one has it within the power of his own will to do any thing, or not to do it. Our victory over sin and Satan proceeds not from the help which God affords, but is owing to our own free will. The prayers which the church offers up, either for the conversion of unbelievers and other sinners, or for the perseverance of believers, are poured forth in vain. The unrestricted capability of men's own free will is amply sufficient for all these things, and therefore no necessity exists for asking of God those things which we are able of ourselves to obtain; the gifts of grace being only necessary to enable men to do that more easily and completely which yet they could do themselves, though more slowly and with greater difficulty; and that they are perfectly free creatures, in opposition to all the current notions of original sin and predestination. These novel opinions were refuted by St. Augustine and St. Jerome, as well as by Orosius, Spanish presbyter, and they were condemned as heresies in the council of Carthage, and in that of Milevum. The discussions which then arose have been warmly agitated in various subsequent periods of the Christian church, though little new light has been thrown upon them from that age to the present. In his eagerness to confute these opponents, St. Augustine employed language so strong as made it susceptible of an interpretation wholly at variance with the accountability of man. This led to further explanations and modifications of his sentiments, which were multiplied when the Semi-Pelagians arose, who thought that the truth lay between his doctrines and those of the Pelagians.

Plaisere, in his 'Appello Evangelium,' has given the following as the substance of that opinion of the order of predestination of which 'many do say that St. Augustine was the first author: 1. That God, from all eternity, decreed to create mankind holy and good. 2. That He foresaw man, being tempted by Satan, would fall into sin, if God did not hinder it; He decreed not to hinder. 3. That out of mankind, seen fallen into sin and misery, He chose a certain number to raise to righteousness and to eternal life, and rejected the rest, leaving them in their sins. 4. That for these, his chosen, He decreed to send his Son to redeem them, and his Spirit to call them and sanctify them; the rest He decreed to forsake, leaving them to Satan and themselves, and to punish them for their sins.'

Augustine also taught, that baptism brings with it the forgiveness of sins; that it is so essential, that the omission of it will expose us to condemnation; and that it is attended with regeneration. He also affirmed that the virtue of baptism is not in the water; that the ministers of Christ perform the external ceremony, but that Christ accompanies it with invisible grace; that baptism is common to all, whilst grace is not so; and that the same external rite may be death to some, and life to others.

In the various discussions which have arisen concerning predestination and the doctrines with which it is connected, some modern divines have quoted the arguments of St. Augustine against the Manichees, and others those which he employed against the Pelagians, according to the discordant views which the combatants severally entertain on these controverted points. In his 'Retractions,' he has qualified the harshness of his previous assertions on many subjects.

Many were the theological labors to which he was invited by the most eminent of his contemporaries; and hastily as some of his lucubrations were executed, it is not surprising that, among 272 treatises on different subjects, some are of inferior value, and unworthy of the fame which he had acquired in the church. After a life of various changes, and of a mixed character, he died A. D. 430, in the 76th year of his age; having been harassed at the close of life by seeing his country invaded by the Vandals, and the city of which he was the bishop besieged. Though those barbarians took Hippo and burned it, they saved his library, which contained his voluminous writings.

St. Augustine was a diligent man in the sacred calling; and that the office of a bishop, even in that age of the church, was no sinecure, is evident from several notices in his letters. At the close of one addressed to Marcellinus, he gives the subjoined account: — 'If I were able to give you a narrative of the manner in which I spend my time, you would be both surprised and distressed on account of the great number of affairs which oppress me without my being able to suspend them. For, when some little leisure is allowed me by those who daily attend upon me about business, and who are so urgent with me that I can neither shun them nor ought to despise them, I have always some other writings to compose, which indeed ought to be preferred [to those which Marcellinus requested,] because the present juncture will not permit them to be postponed. For the rule of charity is, not to consider the greatness of the friendship, but the necessity of the affair. Thus I have continually something or other to compose which diverts me from writing what would be more agreeable to my inclinations, during the little intervals in that multiplicity of business with which I am burdened either through the wants or the passions of others.' He frequently complains of this oppressive weight of occupation in which his love of his flock had engaged him, by obeying the apostolical precept, which forbids Christians from going to law before pagan tribunals. In reference to this employment, his biographer, Posidonius, says: 'At the desire of Christians, or of men belonging to any sect whatever, he would hear causes with patience and attention, sometimes till the usual hour of eating, and sometimes the whole day without eating at all, observing the dispositions of the parties, and how much they advanced or decreased in faith and good works; and when he had opportunity, he instructed them in the law of God, and gave them suitable advice, requiring nothing of them except Christian obedience. He sometimes wrote letters, when desired, on temporal subjects; but looked upon all this as unprofitable occupation, which drew him aside from that which was better and more agreeable to himself.'

'His table was frugal: upon it were ordinarily served herbs and pulse only: sometimes meat was added for his guests and the infirm; but wine was always used. Besides the spoons, which were of silver, all the service was earthen, or of wood, or marble. Upon his table were written these two lines:

Quisquis amat dictis alienam rodere famam,
Hanc mensam vetinam duxerit esse sibi —

"The backbiter will understand this table to be forbidden him." His clerks lived and ate with him, and were fed and clothed from a common purse. No woman, not even his sister, frequented or lived in his house; not that he distrustful his relations, but, as he said, "they must have female servants and visitors, and that might occasion scandal." He cared to make no visits, except to the sick, and to widows, orphans, and the poor; and exercised hospitality with that compassionate sensibility which formed his character. His maxim was, "Better suffer a bad, than refuse a good man." He left the care of his temporal affairs to faithful stewards, who accounted to him, but of whom he was not distrustful. When the church fund was exhausted, he declared to his people, as a tender father, the wants of the poor, whom he regarded as his children; and sometimes, to assist them, of ransom captives, he melted down portions of the church plate. He reprehended the faults of his ecclesiastics, or tolerated them, as prudence suggested. He would never buy land, or town or country house; but if given outright, or as a legacy, to the church, he accepted them; yet often refused important inheritances, not because they could not be of advantage to the poor, but because it seemed to him more reasonable to leave them to the proper heirs.' Dict. Hist.

The character of this eminent father has been much misrepresented both as a man and as a writer. The learning of St. Augustine, and particularly his knowledge of Greek, have been disputed; and hence the importance of his biblical criticisms has been depreciated. Dr. Lardner, however, is of opinion, that he understood that language better than some have supposed. Le Clerc himself allows that he sometimes explains Greek words and phrases in a very felicitous manner. Indeed, the commencement of his correspondence with St. Jerome proves him to have been no contemptible critic. Voltaire and other profane wits have, in the exercise of their buffoonery, impeached his moral conduct; but their charges, when impartially examined, will be seen to be founded in ignorance or in malice. One capital error, however, must not be denied — his cruel persecution of the Donatists. Mosheim observes that Augustine's high reputation filled the Christian world; and 'not without reason, as a variety of great and shining qualities were united in the character of that illustrious man. A sublime genius, an uninterrupted and zealous pursuit of truth, an indefatigable application, an invincible patience, a sincere piety, and a subtle and lively wit, conspired to establish his fame upon the most lasting foundations.' Such a testimony as this far outweighs the vituperative remarks and petty sneers of a thousand infidels. Watson; Enc. Amer.; Bib. Repos. vol. iii. REL. ENC.

'Many editions, particular and general, of his works, have been published, of which the only one which merits attention, is that of the learned Benedictines of the congregation of St. Maur, in 11 vols. fol., and bound in 8, 1679 to 1700.' Dict. Hist.

AULUS GELLIUS;

'Commonly quoted as AGELLIUS, a celebrated critic and grammarian of Rome, in the 2d century. In his youth, he went to Athens, lived in the society of several of the learned, and travelled throughout Greece for information. On his return to Rome, he chose the study of the law, and was made a judge. His Noctes Atticæ, Attic Nights, have come down to us. They were written at Athens mostly, and are a medley of various value, set down, as the author says, "without examination or order, on reading any book, on seeing any thing remarkable, or which pleased my imagination." The work is especially valued as containing fragments of authors whose works are lost.' Biog. Uni. Many editions have been published. 'Beloë has given an English translation, 3 vols. 8vo., 1795, with interesting notes.'

AURIVILLIUS, CHARLES;

AFRIVILLE, ORVILLE, or D'ORVILLE; professor of oriental languages in the University of Upsal, Author of 'Dissertationes ad Sacras Literas et Philologiam Orientalam pertinentes,' etc. Gottingen, 1790, 8vo. These Dissertations were published with a preface, by Sir J. D. Michaelis, whose recommendation is sufficient to establish their value. Orme.

B.

BACON, Sir FRANCIS,

The son of Nicholas Bacon, lord keeper of the great seal, was born on the 22d of January, 1561, entered Trinity College in his 12th year, where he studied under Dr. Whitgift, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, and by the time he was 16, had made great proficiency in the learning of those times; so that he already began to project those improvements in science, which paved the way for its complete reformation from the Aristotelian subtleties, which had so long obscured it. At the age of 19, he wrote a work, entitled Of the State of Europe, in which he gave the most astonishing proofs of the early maturity of his judgment. Soon after his father's death, in consequence of the straitness of his circumstances, he betook himself to the study of the common law; but, in his moments of leisure, we find him taking a view of the state of learning, and devising means for supplying the defects and correcting the errors he had detected. Being chosen a member of parliament in 1603, he frequently distinguished himself by the eloquence of his speeches, and though he generally appeared on the side of the court, he was regarded as not unfriendly to the interests of the people. In 1605, he published a work on 'The Proficiency and Advancement of Learning,' first in English, and afterwards in Latin, which gained him much celebrity, and drew upon him the notice of the king, to whom he dedicated it. In 1607, he was appointed solicitor-general, after which his practice increased so much, that he was retained in almost all great causes. In 1610, appeared his book 'On the Wisdom of the Ancients,' in which, launching out into a new track, he endeavors to develop the physical, moral, and political meaning couched under the fables of antiquity; and, however doubtful some of his hypotheses may appear, we cannot but admire the profundity and variety of his knowledge. In 1611, he was made a judge of the marshal's court, and, two years after, attorney-general; when, it having been objected that this office was incompatible with a seat in the house of commons, that house, from particular regard for him, overruled the objection, and allowed him to take his seat as usual. While in this office, he exerted himself much to put a stop to duelling, and his eloquent and learned charge on this subject, in the star chamber, so pleased the lords of the council, who were present, that they ordered it to be printed and published, with the decree of the court. Bacon's circumstances were now in a more prosperous situation than they had ever been previously; but his generosity, which often bordered on profusion, prevented him from amassing a fortune. He was rapidly rising, and it is much to be regretted that he sometimes exhibited too much servility in flattering the king and the court. In 1617, the aged Chancellor Egerton having voluntarily resigned the seals, Sir Francis succeeded him, with the title of lord keeper, and soon after, the king going on a progress to Scotland, he was intrusted with the conduct of public affairs in his absence, and presided at the council. In the beginning of 1619, he was made lord high chancellor of England, had the title of baron Verulam conferred upon him, and shortly after, the dignity of viscount St. Albans. This accumulation of honors added little to the fame of so great a man; but they tended to excite much jealousy, and probably contributed to his subsequent misfortunes.

He still found time, however, for philosophy. In 1620, he published his most finished performance, Norum Organum Scientiarum, which formed the sequel to his grand Instauration of the Sciences. In it he illustrates the true mode of interpreting nature by sound inductions, far remote from those puerile sophistries and metaphysical jargon which had so long disgraced the schools. It was highly appreciated by the learned men of his time, who regarded it as a standard of true philosophical inquiry; and later times have not been unjust to his memory, in styling him 'The Father of the Inductive Philosophy.'

Being of an easy temper, and naturally generous and profuse in his domestic economy, his household had been guilty of great impositions, at which he had inconsiderately connived; so that, in March, 1621, he was accused by the house of commons of having taken bribes, in causes that had come before him as chancellor. At first, he attempted to defend himself from the charges; but more accusations being brought against him, he was impeached before the lords, on which he threw himself on the mercy of his judges, and received sentence to pay a fine of 40,000 pounds, to be imprisoned in the Tower during the king's pleasure, to be incapable of holding any place of trust in the state, and never to sit in parliament, or come within the verge of the court. He was soon released from his confinement, and obtained access to his majesty, who granted him several favors, and at last remitted the whole sentence; but he never recovered himself from this disgrace.

Being now freed from the hurry of public business, Lord Bacon found full leisure for more pleasing and congenial studies, and he frequently lamented that he had been so long diverted from them by the pursuits of ambition and false glory. During the five years which intervened between his misfortunes and his death, he published a number of interesting and important works — his 'History of Henry VII.,' 'Essays, or Counsels Civil and Moral,' and the 'Third, Fourth, and Fifth Parts of the Grand Instauration of the Sciences,' by which last work, in particular, he enlarged the boundaries of science beyond all who had gone before him.

And as his philosophy dealt not in metaphysical subtleties, but in the sober results of experimental deduction, there was little tendency in his mind to doubt or oppose the great truths of religion. From many parts of his writings, he appears to have been a firm believer, and experimentally acquainted with the power of these sacred principles; indeed, much of his retirement seems to have been spent in such study, and his strongest consolations in adversity to have been drawn from this divine source. His sentiments on these subjects appear to have been what is called moderate Calvinism; that is to say, while he firmly believed the doctrine of the divine decrees, and their influence on the future character of the elect, he maintained the absolute accountability of man, the full and free invitations of the gospel, and the infinite value of the death of Christ to save all; though, through unbelief, many fall short of the blessing. [His genius has been felt in theology, turning the student from airy metaphysics to accurate biblical criticism and the strict rules of Scripture interpretation — as is daily more and more visible.]

In these pursuits he spent the years of his retirement, gradually becoming more infirm, but frequently exerting his faculties with an application beyond his strength; till he at last fell a sacrifice to his zeal, in making some experiments with regard to the preservation of bodies, and, after a week's illness, expired in his 66th year, in 1626. His contemporaries could not fully appreciate the extent of his genius, and the value of his labors. Sensible of this himself, he says in his will, 'My name and memory I bequeath to foreign nations, and to my own countrymen after some time be passed over.'

In his person, Lord Bacon was about the middle stature, with a broad and open front, a lively and piercing eye, in his appearance also pleasing and venerable, so as insensibly to excite the esteem of all who saw him. He was an eloquent and convincing speaker, an eminent lawyer, and a great statesman; and it has been shown that the charge which sullied his character, arose rather out of his too easy temper with the underlings of his office, than from any desire to participate in their exactions: it is also worthy of remark, that not one of the many decisions which he passed (and he is said to have made no less than 2000 orders and decesses in a year) was ever reversed as unjust.

His numerous works were first collected together, and published in London, in 4 vols. fol., in 1740; and Dr. Birch afterwards edited a correct and valuable edition of them, in 1765, 5 vols. 4to. Of late years, they have repeatedly been reprinted in 10 vols. 8vo. Jones's Chris. Biog.; Enc. Am.

BAINES, PAUL,

Or BAINES, was born in London, and educated at Cambridge. In his boyhood, he gave his father much trouble; but, on his conversion, became eminent in piety and holiness. 'For his eminency in learning,' says his biographer, 'he was chosen fellow of Christ's College, where he so much (through God's blessing on his studies and endeavors) improved his time and talent, that he became inferior to none for sharpness of wit, variety of reading, depth of judgment, aptness to teach, holy and pleasant language, wise carriage, heavenly conversation, and all other fulness of grace.' He was, for a time, lecturer at St. Andrews; but, being silenced by Archbishop Bancroft, he preached elsewhere 'as occasion presented, and the weakness of his body permitted him; the rest of the time he bestowed upon reading, writing, meditation, and prayer, saving what he spent in instructing and comforting the weak and the dejected, wherein his gift was more than ordinary. He was afterwards much pressed with want, (as he hath complained to his friends,) not having a place whereon to rest his head. Yet, nevertheless, he was so constant to his principles as never to comply with the bishops and their proceedings.' His heavenly temper made him reverenced, and 'his manner was to go from one gentleman's house to another, and happy were they that could get his company.' 'He was an excellent casuist, and thereupon many doubting Christians repaired to him for satisfaction in cases of conscience, which the bishop (Harsnet) would needs have to be keeping of conventicles.' Called up before the privy council, he was told to speak for himself, which he did to such effect, that one of the noblemen rose and said, 'He speaks more like an angel than a man; I dare not stay to pass sentence against him;' whereupon he was dismissed, and never heard more from them.' He died in 1617. See his Life prefixed to his work entitled

'A Commentary on the Epistle to the Ephesians, 5th ed., to which is added the Life of the Author, and a Table of all the Doctrines of each Chapter.' London, 1658.

BARNES, REV. ALBERT;

Of the Presbyterian church, Philadelphia; well known by his appropriate and widely-used 'Notes' on several books of the New Testament. They are calculated to excite a devotional spirit, and to diffuse much sound knowledge. His occasional pieces are distinguished for clearness of thought, and sustained feeling.

BASNYGE, DE BAUVAL, JAMES,

An eminent Protestant divine, was born at Rouen, in 1653, and educated at Saumur and Geneva. When the edict of Nantz was revoked, he retired to Rotterdam, and, in 1709, was chosen one of the Walloon pastors at the Hague. Being in favor with the grand pensionary, Heinsius, and still preserving his attachment to France, he rendered such services to his country, in facilitating the treaty of alliance with Holland, that he was rewarded with his recall and the restoration of his property. He died in 1723. Basnage was a man of erudition, sincerity, and virtue; and of such enlarged political views and talents, that Voltaire declared him to be more fit for a minister of state than of a parish. He was true in the smallest matters; his candor, frankness, and good faith, appear no less in his works than his profound erudition. Among his principal works are,

'A History of the Church; a History of the Jews—a vast fund of learning on all which relates to the Jewish religion and history; a History of the Religion of the Reformed Church; Annals of the United Provinces; a Treatise on Conscience, 2 vols. Euso. Amsterdam, 1696. Ecc. Am.; Biog. Univ.

BAXTER, RICHARD.

Was born at Rowton, in Shropshire, November 12, 1615. He was one of the great Non-conformist divines; and though he, in the early part of his life, labored under many and great disadvantages, owing to the irreligion and ignorance of those under whose care he was placed, he was afterwards one of the greatest men of the age in which he lived. During the first few years of his life, he was much addicted to lying, covetousness in play, fondness for romances, &c.; but, fortunately for him, his father directed his attention to the historical part of the Bible, which much interested him, and inspired him with a desire to peruse those parts which were more doctrinal. In consequence of such determination, by the perusal of the Bible and other religious books, and the conversations of his father, his mind became illuminated, and his soul converted to God. After having been for some time under the care of Mr. John Owen, schoolmaster of the free school at Wroxeter, his parents accepted of a proposal for placing him under the care of Mr. Richard Wickstead, chaplain to the council of Ludlow. This gentleman proved to be very incompetent to his charge, being an indifferent scholar, and taking no pains with his pupil. The only benefit he obtained, while under his tuition, was the liberal use of his library, which to him was of great advantage. At this time, the mind of Mr. Baxter was considerably alarmed by the fear of death, which produced in him great seriousness, and a more earnest attention to religion. Divinity became his first and favorite pursuit. Zealous in his attachment to the cause of truth, Mr. Baxter entered into the work of the ministry, after having been examined and ordained by Bishop Thornborough, of Worcester. In 1633, he became master of the free school at Dudley, in Worcestershire, where he delivered his first sermon. In 1638, he applied to the bishop of Winchester for holy orders, which he received, being at that time attached to the Church of England. 'The et cetera oath was his first inducement to examine into this point; and, though Mr. Baxter studied the ablest works, he utterly rejected the oath. In 1640, he was requested to become pastor of the church at Kidderminster, which call he accepted, and continued there two years. At this place he was eminently useful, and found much encouragement. The state of the country, at that period, was peculiarly precarious; since the civil war, in the reign of Charles I., &c., had just commenced, and Mr. Baxter was a decided friend to the parliament, which exposed him to many and great inconveniences. Notwithstanding his attachment to the parliament, he considered both parties partially erroneous. He admitted that great indiscretion, and even much sin, was displayed and committed, in dishonoring the king, and in the language used against the bishops, liturgy, and the church; but he considered that, whoever was faulty, the liberties of the people, and public safety, ought not to be forfeited, and that the people were not guilty of the faults of king or parliament, when they defended them; and, that if both their causes had been bad, as against each other, yet that the subjects should adhere to that party which most scoured the welfare of the nation. When Mr. Baxter was at Kidderminster, he was considerably persecuted, which obliged him to retire to Gloucester, where he found a civil, courteous, and religious people. There he continued a month, when many pamphlets were written on both sides of the contending political parties, which unhappily divided the nation preparatory to a war. At that time, contentions commenced between the commission of array and the parliament militia. At the earnest request of the people, Mr. Baxter returned to Kidderminster, and remained with them fourteen years; when he joined Col. Whalley's regiment, as chaplain, and was present at several sieges. He confessed himself unwilling to leave his studies and friends, but he thought only of the public good. He was, however, compelled to quit the army, in 1657, in consequence of sudden and dangerous illness, and returned to Worcester; from whence he went to London to have medical advice. He was advised to visit Tunbridge Wells; and after continuing at that place some time, and finding his health improved, he visited London, just before the deposition of Cromwell, and preached to the parliament the day previous to its voting the restoration of the king. He preached, occasionally, about the city of London, having a license from Bishop Sheldon. He was one of the Tuesday lecturers at Pinner's Hall; and also had a Friday lecture at Fetter Lane. In 1662, he preached his farewell sermon at Blackfriars, and afterwards retired to Acton, in Middlesex. In 1676, he built a meeting-house in Oxendon Street; and, when he had but once preached there, the congregation was disturbed, and Mr. Sedden, then preaching for him, was sent to the gate-house, instead of Mr. Baxter, where he continued three months. In 1682, Mr. Baxter was seized, by a warrant, for coming within five miles of a corporation; and his goods and books were sold, as a penalty, for five sermons he had preached. Owing to the bad state of his health, he was not at that time imprisoned, through the kindness of Mr. Thomas Cox, who went to five justices of the peace, and made oath that Mr. Baxter was in a bad state of health, and that such imprisonment would most likely cause his death. In 1685, he was sent to the King's Bench, by a warrant from the Lord Chief Justice Jeffreys, for some passages in his Paraphrase on the New Testament; but, having obtained a pardon from King James, through the good offices of Lord Powis, he retired to Charter House Yard; occasionally preached to large and devoted congregations, and at length died, December 8, 1691, and was interred in Christ Church.

Mr. Baxter's life was one continued scene of discord and reproach, though of most considerable piety and zeal. By multitudes he was revered, whilst by many he was despised. It has been stated that he was the author of 145 distinct treatises, most of which were polemical, and many were distinguished for their learning and simplicity. Some of the most popular of those treatises are, 'The Saints' Everlasting Rest'; 'Aphorisms of Justification and the Covenants'; 'Catholic Theology'; 'A Treatise on Universal Redemption'; 'A Call to the Unconverted.' For a detailed account of this pious and excellent man, see Baxter's Life, 4to., and Calamy's Non-conformist's Memorial; Jones's Chr. Biog.; especially, Orme's Life of Baxter.

BEAUSOBRE, ISAAC DE;

A French Calvinist. He was born in Switzerland, 1659, and died in Berlin, 1738, aged 79. He became minister to the French refugees at Berlin, chaplain of the king of Prussia, and counsellor of the royal consistory. His heart was generous, humane, compassionate, warm, but with nothing like rancor. His manners were always regular, and his conversation ready and pleasing; he loved and practised religion. In connection with L'Enfant he published,

1. A French Translation of the New Testament, with Notes, 1719, 1741. Of this, Matthew has been tr., and often published in English. To the Testament is prefixed,

2. An Introduction to the Reading of the N. T., which has been translated into English, and frequently republished. 'Of extraordinary merit; — scarce any topic needed by the young student in divinity is untouched,' says Rg. Watson, who pub. it in his Trais.

3. Dissertation on the Adamites of Bohemia. A curious book.
